PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

1. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what recent discussions he has had with the chairman of the National Coal Board regarding the present dispute.

5. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the strike in the coal mining industry.

6. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current situation in the coal mining industry.

7. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will now take steps to seek to resolve the present dispute in the coal mining industry.

8. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the dispute in the coal mining industry.

10. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current situation in the mining industry.

11. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the dispute in the coal mining industry.

12. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement on the current dispute in the coal industry.

13. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement on the coal mining dispute.

15. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Engery whether he will make a statement on the current dispute in the coal industry.

18. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the latest position in the coal mining industry dispute.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): I have had frequent discussions with the chairman of the National Coal Board upon the many problems facing the industry as a result of the unnecessary industrial action taken by some sections of the NUM.

This morning, of the 174 pits, there were only 13 without men present. Coal production was substantially increased, particularly in Scotland, Yorkshire, the north-east and north Derbyshire.

During the 19 working days of 1985, more than 10,000 further miners have returned to work.

Coal stocks at the power stations have remained at a very high level. The CEGB has reiterated its assurance that with present coal stocks and supplies there will be no power cuts due to coal shortages during 1985.

Fifty-two coal faces, including 30 working faces, have been lost since the start of the dispute.

Tomorrow, officials of the National Coal Board and the National Union of Mineworkers will meet to establish whether talks can be restarted.

The Government hope that, with the National Coal Board having offered a substantial investment programme, good pay for miners, a closure procedure better from the miners' point of view than any previous closure procedures, generous early retirement provisions and substantial resources to bring new enterprises and business to mining communities, the damaging industrial action which has taken place without a ballot will swiftly be ended by a negotiated settlement.

Mr. Powell: As the dove in a Cabinet of hawks, will the Secretary of State ensure that the eagle does not get her claws on tomorrow's talks about talks? Will he also give serious consideration to the termination of the contract of Ian MacGregor as chairman of the National Coal Board? He has caused the most disruption in the industry for 11 of the 17 months since he was appointed chairman. The strike was initiated by him and the Government.

Mr. Walker: There have been seven rounds of talks, and we know the eagle that has done the damage to every one of those rounds. It certainly has not been Mr. MacGregor, who has made an offer to miners which is better than any offer since nationalisation. He has offered better closure procedures, a bigger capital investment programme and the first ever guarantee that there will be no compulsory redundancies. It is a great tragedy for the industry that, without a ballot, the dispute has taken place.

Mr. Canavan: As it has been part of the Secretary of State's propaganda all along that no miner who wanted to remain in the industry would be forced out of his job, will the right hon. Gentleman repeat that guarantee and extend it to the 500 striking miners who have been sacked during the dispute? If the Thatcherite hawks are really looking for blood and for heads to roll, would it not be better to roll in the plastic bag the head of the person whose political appointment provoked the most damaging and longest strike in British industrial history, at a cost of more than £2·5 billion to the taxpayer?

Mr. Walker: A great deal of blood has been lost in this dispute by violent picketing of the worst sort. Judgments on whether people should be sacked are matters for the National Coal Board; but, with any employer in this country, people who commit criminal acts cannot expect to continue to be employed afterwards.

Mr. Proctor rose——

Mr. Skinner: A failed banker.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Skinner: A unit trust man.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must tell the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) that if he persists in this behaviour, it will be unfortunate for him.

Mr. Skinner: We know the score.

Mr. Proctor: In what appear to be the closing stages of this dispute, will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government's attitude will not be in any spirit of revenge or victimisation, but, rather, of looking to the future for the achievement of an efficient, productive and profitable coal industry as soon as possible?

Mr. Walker: Yes, Sir. The first objective should be to get an agreed settlement as swiftly as possible, and thereafter to concentrate on getting a united industry with united mining communities, and with the industry advancing so as to take advantage of the considerable prospects that lie before it.

Mr. Pike: Will the Secretary of State give an assurance that, for the first time in this dispute, the Government will play a positive role in trying to resolve it rather than take the negative approach, which they have taken all along and which was shown clearly in last week's statement by the Prime Minister, when she revealed that she was after not just victory but crushing the NUM? May we be assured that the Government's attitude will now be positive?

Mr. Walker: There cannot have been a more positive approach than the Government's willingness to put in thousands of millions of pounds for a capital investment programme, hundreds of millions of pounds to guarantee no compulsory unemployment, a good pay offer and, for the first time, a new enterprise company designed to bring new businesses to mining communities. Throughout, therefore, the Government have been totally positive.

Mr. Eadie: As the right hon. Gentleman has given a resumé of the history of the negotiations, will he bear in mind, on the eve of talks about talks, that this dispute could have been settled on three occasions had there not been Government intervention? May we be assured that there will not be Government intervention tomorrow? We have had enough of what one might call the fingerprints and riding boots involvement of the Government. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the way to end this dispute is for the NCB and NUM to reach agreement in principle for an honourable settlement without the involvement of a third party, by which I mean the Government?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman understates the number of times when there could have been a settlement of the dispute. There could have been a settlement on 6 March if a ballot had been taken by the NUM. On seven occasions since then it could have been settled, and it certainly could have been settled at ACAS when it put forward a compromise proposal. One man has always stopped a settlement being reached.

Mr. Adley: Further to the last point made by my right hon. Friend, has not one of the saddest features of this whole dispute been the cowardice shown by the Leader of the Opposition, who failed at the beginning of the strike to call for a ballot—[Interruption.]—bearing in mind that, if a ballot had taken place, that would have avoided the necessity for the Leader of the Opposition to hurl insults at the Prime Minister and would probably have avoided the strike?

Mr. Walker: It is true that when the dispute started one third of Britain's coalfields decided, in the normal tradition of the NUM, to have a ballot, and they balloted nearly 70 per cent. against strike action. It is also true that when Mr. Scargill changed the rules of the NUM on balloting the Leader of the Opposition said that it brought a ballot nearer. Never since then has he urged the NUM to have a ballot, and that has been a great pity.

Mr. Douglas: Will the right hon. Gentleman reflect a little on what he said today in answer to supplementary questions, particularly about the unity of mining communities? Does he accept that those, like myself, who represent mining communities, particularly in Fife, realise that a vital factor in maintaining cohesion is the need to remember that if men come out together, they go back together? That means that any dismissal action on the part of the NCB must be a matter for discussion between the NCB and the NUM, and that the Government must keep their mouth shut about the dismissal of people or having them remain outside the industry because of activities on the picket line. In other words, is the Secretary of State aware that this is a matter between the union and the NCB and that it should be settled by discussion on that basis? May we be assured that on that issue there will be no interference by the Government?

Mr. Walker: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is for the employer in any organisation, including a nationalised industry, to decide whether he does or does not sack an individual employee, and that employer has the same right as any other employer to consider criminal actions.

Mr. Hamilton: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a large number of Opposition Members have had the greatest of reservations about Mr. Scargill's behaviour and tactics since the beginning of this operation? Do the Government understand that there is a bright future for the industry, but that the miners have deep fears about that future? Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the Prime Minister to treat these problems and grievances with much greater generosity and understanding than she has hitherto shown?

Mr. Walker: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the mining industry has a good and real future. It requires high investment and a sense of unity in the mining industry and communities. The Government over which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister presides have been willing to allocate enormous resources of public expenditure to ensure that that takes place. I regret the fact that during the last year that did not happen.

Sir William van Straubenzee: Since it has been necessary throughout this dispute to distinguish clearly between the mining community and the mining leadership, would it not be in the interests of the mining community and of getting the industry to work together again if the return to work were gentle, gradual and slow? That action would make the assimilation a little easier than it might otherwise be. Will my right hon. Friend therefore not necessarily be in too great a hurry to achieve a settlement?

Mr. Walker: I am in a hurry to achieve a sensible settlement because I believe that this dispute continues to cause tremendous hardship in mining communities, takes away potential markets and loses investment that could otherwise take place. One of the encouraging features of the past few months has been the fact that, in a number of areas in which a substantial proportion of the men have returned to work, fears of divisiveness and ill feeling in the pits did not occur to the degree expected. I hope, therefore, that if there is a speedy settlement there will be a quick sense of unity within this industry.

Mr. Dormand: Will the Secretary of State bear in mind that, although some miners have returned to work, thousands are prepared to stay on strike for a long time yet and that that—this is the important point—shows their determination to protect their jobs? When will the Government, and the Secretary of State in particular, take seriously the provision of new jobs in mining areas? Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that the £5 million about which he keeps talking is piffling compared with the amount the miners would need if the Government's pit closure programme got under way?

Mr Walker: I understand the hon. Gentleman's anxiety. We set up the enterprise company with a capital of £5 million. The number of applications and inquiries during the first few weeks were very encouraging. Therefore, I immediately agreed to double the capital to £10 million. I made it clear at that time that we were imposing a £10 million limit and would review the amount required, depending upon the type of action that we could take. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I place great importance on that company's activities. There is not a £5 million limit. I have now made £10 million available, and that is not the the limit.

Mr. Andy Stewart: With expulsion hanging over the heads of the Nottinghamshire NUM members, if a democratic union has to be set up, will my right hon. Friend endorse the recognition of that union by the National Coal Board?

Mr. Walker: I do not believe at this stage that there is any point in suggesting what might occur in certain circumstances. All I can say is that during this dispute the Nottinghamshire miners have never had a desire to split off from the NUM. Their recent attitude has been affected not by their actions but by the actions of Mr. Scargill and the executive. I notice that the delegate conference that was to be held has now been put off. There is no point in speculating about what might happen in certain events.

Mr. Howard: Is there not already in existence an honourable agreement affecting matters at the heart of this dispute? Why should what was an honourable agreement for NACODS not be an honourable agreement for the leadership of the NUM?

Mr. Walker: That is interesting. I have heard no criticism from the Labour party leadership, the TUC or any other bodies of the NACODS agreement, which provides procedures for closures better than those the NUM has enjoyed under any previous Government. It has provided, as ACAS pointed out, an honourable settlement of the dispute.

Mr. Mason: Will the Secretary of State make representations to the National Coal Board, on behalf of miners who have been arrested on the picket line but not charged, to ensure that their future will not be impaired by the board? He should express the hope that there will be no victim.

Secondly, did the Prime Minister make her views known to the chairman of the National Coal Board when she stated that she expected a written guarantee from the NUM leadership that uneconomic closures should be on the negotiating list before any real talks could take place?

Mr. Walker: On the last point, the NCB issued a statement to that effect because, during the dispute, there have been seven rounds of talks during which the leader of the NUM has boasted that he has not moved and inch since March. Understandably, it wanted to ensure that these talks would be held on a constructive basis, where progress could be made.

On the first point, I shall convey to the NCB the views expressed by the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Rost: Does not section 6 of the Coal Industry Act 1977 specifically allow the Secretary of State to make further grants to assist the elimination of uneconomic colliery capacity, and was not the then Secretary of State the now discredited right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn)?

Mr. Walker: I am not sure when he was discredited, but it is true that those words were used in the legislation when the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) was Secretary of State.

Mr. Benn: Is the Secretary of State aware that the most significant part of his first answer was that he made no reference whatever to Government insistence that the NUM should agree in advance to the closure of uneconomic pits, despite the briefing from Bernard Ingham to all the press? Are not signs of the Secretary of State's recognition of the strength of the NUM that more than 140,000 employees are still on strike, that the pound is at its lowest level ever, that there is an increase in interest rates of 2 per cent., and that share values have fallen 30 points today? Have not the Government a strong interest in reaching agreement with the NUM? If not, NUM members on strike will not be prepared to return to work to see the butchery of their industry.

Mr. Walker: On the subject of uneconomic pits and the butchery of the industry, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, during the period that he was——

Mr. Benn: Answer the question.

Mr. Walker: I am answering the question.

Mr. Benn: Answer the question.

Mr. Walker: The right hon. Gentleman will not like the answer. During that period 17,000 miners took voluntary redundancy on terms much worse than those offered at the moment. In 1978, one pit that he closed had 1·5 million tonnes of reserves and another had three to four years' reserves. Throughout this dispute the right hon. Gentleman has made wrong predictions at the expense of miners.

Mr. Sackville: Will my right hon. Friend take steps to preserve jobs in energy intensive industries by ensuring that such industries do not bear a disproportionate part of the costs of the dispute?

Mr. Walker: The cost of the dispute will depend on coal stocks and the need to restock at the end of the dispute. There are still substantial coal stocks at the collieries and the power stations. They are about three times what the Opposition predicted they would be. For those reasons, it is very difficult to calculate what the cost will be.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Whatever the terms on which the dispute is settled, there can be no victors. What is the right hon. Gentleman doing to inhibit his right hon. and hon. Friends from crowing over what they believe to be a victory—which is perhaps the most crass and insensitive behaviour of recent days?

Mr. Walker: I know of none of my hon. Friends who have crowed over a victory. I agree that considerable damage has been done to the industry, the miners and the economy by a totally unnecessary dispute. The important thing is to end the dispute as quickly as possible.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: My right hon. Friend has graphically made clear the generosity of the NCB's offer, which is the envy of industries throughout the country. Would it not be a betrayal of the miners whom I represent and who have consistently gone to work if further concessions were to be made beyond those agreed with NACODS?

Mr. Walker: Yes. We should constantly remind the House that miners in my hon. Friend's constituency and in similar constituencies followed the normal traditions of the NUM by holding a ballot, and they balloted overwhelmingly, at the beginning of the dispute, not to strike. They did so because of the generosity of the offer then available. That has been the reality of the dispute from beginning to end.

Mr. Barron: The NACODS settlement has been much talked about this afternoon. Is it not true that NACODS, after hearing statements by the right hon. Gentleman and by the Prime Minister, is saying that its settlement has been put under tremendous pressure and that at present, because of what the NCB is doing, it is not prepared to sit down with Mr. MacGregor? Is not the NACODS settlement in some doubt?

Mr. Walker: The NACODS settlement is in no doubt. If the NUM wishes to accept it tomorrow, it can do so.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Is it not true that very few people wish for an unconditional surrender by either side in the dispute? Is it not also true that, bearing in mind the cost to the country and the cost in other people's jobs lost because of the dispute, no agreement should be reached that does not accept the closure of pits that have outlived their useful economic life? Only the coal miners would gain by such an agreement. Everyone else would lose.

Mr. Walker: Throughout the history of British coal mining, uneconomic pits have always been closed. Throughout every coal mining industry in the world, such pits have been closed. It is not in the interests of miners that money should be poured into pits that have no long-term future of any description when it could be invested in the future of the industry. The issue that has kept this unfortunate conflict going has always been entirely bogus.

Mr. Allen McKay: Does the Secretary of State not realise that the strike started because of a lack of trust in the chairman of the NCB, and that that trust must now be regained? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the Government should not interfere in or comment on the present delicate stage of negotiations? Does he further agree that during the past 11 months the Government have failed to provide time to debate the whole issue? Should they not have given the House a chance to discuss the situation and to highlight some of the matters which the right hon. Gentleman believes to be beneficial?

Mr. Walker: The reason for the dispute was very clear. The conflict started on a wrong issue and without a ballot. Mr. MacGregor put forward terms, and if there had been a ballot there would not have been a strike. As a well-known wet on such matters, when I discovered that the Leader of the Opposition felt that a debate would be embarrassing for the Opposition, I naturally felt for him.

Mr. Terlezki: Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that when this political strike is over—let us hope that it will be over sooner rather than later—all the miners who have worked and kept the industry going, despite intimidation and threats, will come to no harm?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Secretary of State agree that if the NUM is now seeing the economic facts of life, a settlement of the dispute can bring about a long-term and successful future for the industry? In regard to political interference, what role has Mr. David Hart played in relationships between the Government and the Coal Board? Has he liaised between 10 Downing street and the Prime Minister and the NCB?

Mr. Walker: No, Sir. As far as I know I have never met Mr. Hart.

Mr. John Townend: Will my right hon. Friend convey to the chairman of the NCB the message that the overwhelming view of Conservative Members is that under no circumstances should miners who are dismissed for violence and for causing damage be reinstated?

Mr. Walker: Sackings and reinstatements are matters for the employers to consider. I am sure that, like all employers, the NCB must take into consideration the criminal actions of any of its employees or former employees.

Mr. Redmond: Does the Secretary of State agree that he knows nothing about industrial relation? Will he assure us that, in the next two weeks, he will find time to learn a little something about industrial relations and, having that little knowledge, will avoid any repetitions of the dispute?

Mr. Walker: I always listen to the wise, shrewd and well-informed words of the hon. Gentleman with great interest. I noted every word.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it could not possibly be in the interests of the maintenance of the rule of law in Britain if those who have been convicted of serious criminal offences during the dispute were to be reinstated?

Mr. Walker: Yes. The NCB must take the same view as any other employer towards people who have committed grave criminal offences.

Mr. Lofthouse: When the Secretary of State next meets the chairman of the NCB, will he discuss the board's decision to discontinue its interest and investment in putting a drift mine down in my constituency, which would have coupled up Wheldale, Fryston and Glass Houghton collieries and given them a longer life? As 42 per cent. of all under-25s in my constituency are unemployed, and as they would normally have gone into the coal industry, if the Secretary of State fails to discuss that matter with the chairman of the NCB, will he advise them what employment prospects young men in mining communities can expect when pits are closed?

Mr. Walker: I shall convey the hon. Gentleman's views to the chairman of the NCB, but I cannot comment on any specific proposal. I am glad to say that, for any area where there are pit closures, for whatever reason, we have brought into operation an important company to assist in getting further businesses and enterprises into those areas.

Mr. Nicholls: Now that the inevitable bleating has started about allowing the NUM to cave in with dignity, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that there was no dignity for miners when they were defrauded of their right to a pre-strike ballot, that there was no dignity for policemen who were beaten up on the picket line and that there was no dignity for the families of working miners who were terrorised? Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that those factors will have to be reflected in any agreement that emerges?

Mr. Walker: There are many miners throughout the country who are also reflecting on those facts.

Mr. Welsh: The Secretary of State is aware that, since nationalisation, it has been the role of Ministers with responsibility for energy, and of other Ministers with responsibility for other nationalised industries, to hold the ring so that management and unions can discuss things and reach amicable agreements. In the past few months the Government and the NCB have been "two-oneing" the NUM. It is time that that finished. May we have an assurance that, if negotiations are entered into this week, the Secretary of State will go back to holding the ring and let the NCB and the NUM thrash it out and get an acceptable and amicable agreement?

Mr. Walker: In all previous arrangements Governments might well have been willing to produce the necessary finance to get a sensible agreement, but they have also always been dealing with someone who was willing to put up sensible proposals. In this dispute, seven times—on one occasion with ACAS holding the ring—the NUM leadership, against the wishes of all of the miners who voted, has gone on with this utterly unnecessary industrial action.

Mr. Leigh: In the light of the fact that this morning many miners were clearly dissuaded from returning to work because of the pending negotiations, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is vital that at an early stage in the talks about talks the NUM accepts that pits should be closed because they are uneconomic, lest Arthur Scargill is given a further opportunity to prolong negotiations indefinitely, thus stemming the return to work and prolonging the strike?

Mr. Walker: Today's return-to-work figures are interesting. On the morning shift alone 840 people returned to work, which is an extremely high figure and in sharp contrast to all previous figures when talks were pending. The message to Mr. Scargill must be that by far the biggest return was in Yorkshire.

Mr. Beggs: Does the Secretary of State accept that the dispute is resulting in higher costs to consumers in Northern Ireland? Does he agree that if the dispute could be settled at an early date a decision could be made to convert Northern Ireland power stations from oil to coal, thereby securing future jobs for miners?

Mr. Walker: That is one of many examples of missed opportunities this year. In 1984 I had hoped that 1,000 firms would convert to coal. Alas, many firms which converted to coal are considering converting back to oil or gas. That is a great tragedy for the industry.

Mr. Eggar: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that when the dispute is over the Government will continue to invest in the coal industry to ensure that it is competitive, supplies energy at competitive prices and provides long-term jobs for miners?

Mr. Walker: With the quality of mining machinery and coal seams that we have, the coal industry has a good opportunity for years to come. It is the Government's great desire that the industry takes advantage of that opportunity.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is the Secretary of State aware that 18 fewer miners returned to work in south Wales today? I am sure that he will want to join me in congratulating them on their solidarity and determination. Does he not recognise by now that those miners will not return to work until a proper, honourable and negotiated settlement takes place, which recognises the social and economic arguments for keeping pits open?

Mr. Walker: I know that the hon. Lady read that on the tape this morning. However, the number of miners working in south Wales is substantially higher than it was last Monday.

Mr. Holt: In the light of the comments this afternoon and the feelings throughout the country, does my right hon. Friend agree that if the 5,000 miners who have been found guilty of criminal offences were given the opportunity to go to industrial tribunals and claim unfair dismissal it would be time-consuming, a waste of public money and totally unnecessary?

Mr. Walker: I cannot interfere with the legal rights of individuals regarding industrial tribunals. Obviously, the NCB must be free to treat people who have committed criminal actions against its personnel and property as it considers fit.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Secretary of State take this opportunity to state how many power cuts or voltage reductions have taken place throughout England, Wales and Scotland because of the mining dispute? Will he ask the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to give an accurate description of the cuts that have taken place as a result of the dispute, rather than always blame them on cable failures? Will the Secretary of State give the House an estimate of the increased cost of coal and oil imported to break the mining dispute? Will he comment on the story that appeared in The Guardian of today?

Mr. Walker: I read something in The Guardian last week that was totally wrong. Voltage reductions take place every year irrespective of power stocks, and there are normally about three a year. The last figure that I have shows that there has been one so far this year. We have plenty of stocks at power stations, and in 1985 there will not be any power cuts as a result of the present level of coal stocks.

Mr. Orme: Is the Secretary of State aware that we want to see a negotiated settlement that is acceptable both to the NUM and the NCB? In that regard, will he deplore the article in The Times of last Saturday, written by Mr. David Hart, who is an adviser at No. 10. He said:

"The time for a negotiated settlement is past."

Does the Secretary of State agree with that?

Mr. Walker: The right hon. Gentleman should withdraw that. Mr. Hart is not an adviser at No. 10. The view of the Government, and certainly that of the Prime Minister, is that not only do we want a negotiated settlement, but that we believed that when ACAS intervened we would have a negotiated settlement.

2. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many employees of the National Coal Board are currently at work.

14. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many miners are currently working.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): I understand from the National Coal Board that today more than half of its employees are no longer on strike, of whom nearly 79,000 are members of the NUM, representing 42 per cent. of its membership.

Mr. Yeo: Will my hon. Friend join me in paying tribute to the courage and loyalty of those miners who have voted with their feet during the past 10 months? Is he aware that there would be widespread and fully justified outrage in the country if miners who were dismissed for engaging in criminal conduct were accepted back into the employment of the National Coal Board?

Mr. Hunt: My hon. Friend's second point would be a matter for the NCB. As to his main point, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I use every opportunity to pay tribute to the courage and determination of those who have returned to work, often in the face of mob intimidation and violence.

Mr. Fallon: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the seven men taken back this morning by the Coal Board in the north-east have not been reinstated but re-employed? Does he agree that it would be wrong to expect working miners to work alongside those convicted of serious criminal offences?

Mr. Hunt: That is a very fair point, and I shall draw the views of my hon. Friend and others to the attention of the chairman of the National Coal Board.

Several hon. Members: rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. In the interests of balance, I shall call two hon. Members from the Opposition.

Mr. Ryman: With respect to the reinstatement of NUM members who have been on strike, is it not utterly unfair for the Government to attempt to influence the chairman and area directors of the NCB when, for 10 months, the Government have flatly refused to intervene in this most serious industrial dispute?

Mr. Hunt: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, no, it is not unfair. On his second point, the Government intervened at the start of the dispute by underwriting the best offer made to miners since nationalisation.

Mr. Strang: Does the Minister accept that the international competitiveness of coal has been transformed by the fact that although the pound-dollar rate was 1·48 when the strike started, it is now 1·11? Why does he not tell the Coal Board to press ahead and take advantage of the new export markets instead of trying to implement a closure programme for which there was never any economic justification and which is now completely outdated?

Mr. Hunt: International markets depend upon the international competitiveness of British coal. That is why it was made clear at the beginning of the dispute to all those working in the industry that they had been offered the best possible deal for an expanding, competitive coal industry. Sadly, much of the momentum has been lost.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Accommodation

30. Mr. Dormand asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will make a statement on the progress being made in providing additional office accommodation for hon. Members.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): In accordance with the design brief given to the architects in the Services Committee's third report of 1983-84, the design team has developed preliminary sketch plans for phase 1 of the new parliamentary building. These plans are now under consideration by the Services Committee's New Building Sub-Committee.

Mr. Dormand: Does the Leader of the House realise that the aspect of the matter that still puzzles most hon. Members is the time that it will take before the new offices are occupied? In those circumstances, will he give assurances that he will ignore the strident voices of some of his hon. Friends who want the development to be cancelled, and that there will be no reduction in the moneys already allocated for the work? What progress is being made in transferring staff from the Palace so that their accommodation can be made available to hon. Members?

Mr. Biffen: I do not belive that there is any likelihood of this project being cancelled. I shall see what can be done to ensure that the execution of the work proceeds according to the budgeted time scales and with the appropriate finance. To date, it is up with the forecast. As for the movement of staff from the Palace so that more places are made available for hon. Members, those numbers have already been given. I shall look into exactly what changes have taken place to date.

Mr. Dykes: After so much time has elapsed, is it not desirable that at long last we should provide better accommodation for visiting European parliamentarians — [Interruption.] — as do many other national Parliaments?

Mr. Biffen: That interesting and perceptive question goes somewhat wider than the question of the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand). I should have thought that the good-natured response to it shows that it is a matter of some delicacy.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Has the right hon. Gentleman ever investigated the possibility of providing some distance away from the House extra accommodation for research assistants? Although this is not an ideal solution, if the right hon. Gentleman has not carried out such an investigation, will he please do so?

Mr. Biffen: The Select Committee on House of Commons (Services) is looking at the main proposition that it would be appropriate that the Palace should be, as it were, repossessed by hon. Members, but if that were to take place I hope that hon. Members would not then complain that they were some distance away from their beloved research assistants.

Souvenir Kiosk

31. Mr. Greenway asked the Lord Privy Seal what were the takings at the souvenir kiosk in the latest year for which statistics are available; what were the takings in the four weeks to 24 December; what plans he has for the future of the kiosk; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: The takings in the four-week period and the 12-month period to 21 December 1984 were £146,073 and £414,869 respectively. These figures include VAT. The Refreshment Department regularly reviews the range of products on sale at the kiosk, but there are no immediate plans for major developments.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend please convey the thanks of all hon. Members to Jean and Joe for their excellent service? Do not the remarkable figures that my right hon. Friend has given show that already there is a sufficiently wide range of goods on sale to attract enormous custom and satisfy hon. Members and visitors? Would it not be wholly wrong to set up a new supermarket in Westminster Hall selling anything from House of Commons champagne to parliamentary tinsel?

Mr. Biffen: The safest thing that I can do is to say to my hon. Friend that I shall convey those sentiments to the Catering Sub-Committee.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Does the Lord Privy Seal share my hope that it will be found possible to dispense with this eyesore, which is derogatory to the dignity of the House?

Mr. Biffen: I noted the comments of the right hon. Gentleman on 30 January 1984, when I took good care to hide behind the skirts of my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd). All I can say is that, again, I shall refer the comments of the right hon. Member to the Catering Sub-Committee.

Mr. McQuarrie: Will my right hon. Friend take note of the fact that, while the figures for sales that he has given are very satisfactory, there is a distinct absence of many items in the kiosks during the busiest parts of the parliamentary Session—in July and again at Christmas? Will my right hon. Friend take steps to ensure that adequate stocks are held during these busy periods so that hon. Members can obtain supplies for their constituents?

Mr. Biffen: I shall most certainly ensure that that point is further considered.

Mr. Heffer: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that during the period of the English revolution, when Parliament operated as a Parliament against the King, political pamphlets of various kinds were sold in Westminster Hall? Would it not be a good idea to return to that position instead of tolerating the present nonsense?

Mr. Biffen: Political pamphlets are normally pretty slow-moving stock. I am sure that in many parts of the House there will be sympathetic consideration of that viewpoint.

Mr. Heffer: They would not read the right hon. Gentleman's.

Mr. Biffen: No. I am not such a fool as to write them.

Statutory Instruments

32. Mr. Beith asked the Lord Privy Seal if he is satisfied with the present arrangements for parliamentary scrutiny of statutory instruments.

Mr. Biffen: I believe the present arrangements to be generally acceptable to hon. Members.

Mr. Beith: Does the Leader of the House recognise that in the time that he has been a Member of the House the amount of law made by statutory instruments has been increased dramatically and that the right of the House to debate and vote upon those statutory instruments has been reduced dramatically? Would not the right hon. Gentleman like to be the Leader of the House who went down in history as the one who reversed both those trends by ensuring that the House took control of the making of law by statute?

Mr. Biffen: That is an interesting proposition, but, for example, as long as we have our present arrangements with the EC a growing body of our law will be made that way. Of course, I shall always look sympathetically at any suggestions that are made to improve upon present conditions.

Mr. Madden: Will the Leader of the House give an assurance that the Government will not in future adopt the procedure that was adopted when they introduced a charge for entry clearance certificates, which denied the House any opportunity to debate the matter? Indeed, the Select Committee on Statutory Instruments was also denied an opportunity to consider the introduction of that charge.

Mr. Biffen: In view of the parent legislation under which action was taken, what proceeded was entirely defensible, but I take at once the hon. Gentleman's point.

Parliamentary Proceedings (Televised Broadcasting)

33. Mr. Canavan asked the Lord Privy Seal whether he will arrange for the House to have an opportunity of debating and voting on televised broadcasting of the proceedings of the House.

Mr. Biffen: Members will wish to take account of the experience in another place before deciding upon a further debate on the televised broadcasting of proceedings of this House.

Mr. Canavan: Is it not a poor reflection on the House of Commons that even the non-elected geriatric House of Lords is seen as more of an open House than this comparatively exclusive club? If this place really is the people's Parliament, why should the people not be allowed to see just what exactly their elected representatives are getting up to? Or are the Government afraid of more publicity being given to ex-Tory Prime Ministers who expose the disastrous policies of this discredited Government?

Mr. Biffen: Ignoring the commercials and addressing myself to the substance of the question, I say to the hon. Gentleman that this is clearly a House of Commons matter and I think that the House will wish to proceed by taking account of the experiment now being undertaken in another place.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will my right hon. Friend take note that many of my hon. Friends do not want a debate on the possible televising of this House, and, indeed, do not want to see their House televised at all?

Mr. Biffen: Of course I take note of that view, knowing as I do that the most rich variety of opinions will be expressed on this topic.

Dr. Owen: Will the Leader of the House give a commitment that he will definitely arrange for a debate once the experiment is over in the House of Lords and not just leave it in this rather vague way? The House deserves to know that there will be a debate.

Mr. Biffen: Yes, the right hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. The House will wish to consider the matter further and I hope that I shall be in a position to offer time when the occasion arises.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend take due note of the attendance of the Lords spiritual and temporal once the novelty has worn off? There seemed to be a remarkably large attendance on the first day. It will be interesting to see how many attend from now on.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that many in this House will monitor exactly what is happening in the other place.

Mr. Shore: If the House is to take account, as I suspect it will wish to, of the experiment in the other place, would it not be sensible if some arrangement were made whereby the Select Committee on Sound Broadcasting of this place was able to join the similar body in the other place to scrutinise and monitor the experiment?

Mr. Biffen: I suspect that that already falls within the ambit of the Committee, but I shall look at that constructive point further.

CIVIL SERVICE

Post Office Counter Services

35. Mr. Spearing asked the Minister for the Civil Service what plans he has for maintaining or increasing the use made by Government Departments of the counter services of the Post Office.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): Decisions about the use of post office counter services are not made centrally, but by the Department concerned, which, of course, seeks cost-effective and sensible ways of meeting its requirements.

Mr. Spearing: In view of the fact that the Government are committed to a comprehensive network of counter services, and bearing in mind that some transactions are inevitably more costly than others, is there not an obligation on the Government to ensure that the viability of the present network is not undermined? Therefore, is it not right that the Government should prevent the peeling off by individual Departments of individual transactions which may be convenient to them but which result in complete inconvenience to the public?

Mr. Hayhoe: That may well be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I know that she has answered questions from the hon. Gentleman on that score. It is not a matter that falls within the responsibilities of the Management and Personnel Office.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Is my hon. Friend aware that the DHSS is charged up to 38p per Girocheque passed over the post office counter? We in the House are always concerned about the gross extravagance and expense of such charges. Will my hon. Friend encourage all Government Departments to have bank accounts instead of using post office counter services?

Mr. Hayhoe: As I said just now, it is for Departments to seek cost-effective and sensible ways of meeting their requirements. My hon. Friend should address that question to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Consultancy Inspection Review Services

36. Mr. Eggar asked the Minister for the Civil Service what representations he has received about the consultancy inspection review services in Government Departments.

Mr. Hayhoe: This efficiency unit report to the Prime Minister has been widely welcomed and more than 7,000 copies of the unit's briefing note on the report, called "Helping Managers Manage" are being distributed by Departments to their managers.

Mr. Eggar: Has my hon. Friend noted press speculation that the Government now attach less priority to improving the efficiency and effectiveness of the Civil Service than they once did? Is that the case? Can my hon. Friend confirm that the recommendations of the report will be implemented?

Mr. Hayhoe: There was a report in the Financial Times on 4 January, the headline of which talked of the efficiency drive in the Civil Service "faltering". However, the headline did not reflect the contents of the article. Those of us who follow the work of sub-editors in putting headlines to stories know that that is not unusual. I can assure my hon. Friend that the efficiency drive is not faltering. The recommendations of the report will be followed through.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Minister undertake to find out which Government Departments have placed contracts with Zeus Security consultants and other private detective agencies?

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall make inquiries and write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Winnick: Is it intended that the review service will look into the ban on trade unions at GCHQ? Did the hon. Gentleman note, on the first anniversary of the ban, the huge demonstrations and protests? Is it not time that the ban on trade unions at GCHQ was lifted.

Mr. Hayhoe: I admire the ingenuity of the hon. Gentleman in getting in that supplementary question on this question. It has nothing to do with it. As the hon. Gentleman should know by now, matters concerning GCHQ are the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary.

Mr. Soley: Are there not growing complaints from the public about the deteriorating quality of service from the Civil Service? Is not this a cost-cutting exercise designed to reduce staff numbers? Is not that resulting in a lower quality of service generally and, therefore, in false economies?

Mr. Hayhoe: It is apparent from that supplementary question that the hon. Gentleman has not read the report to which the main question refers.

Mr. Skinner: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Prime Minister has a bit of a cheek to talk about an efficiency drive in all the other Government Departments, bearing in mind that according to a question answered by her only a few days ago it transpires that the cost of running her office at No. 10 Downing street has gone up by more than 100 per cent. since she became Prime Minister? Is it not a fact that, despite this efficiency drive, she is spending money like water to spy on everyone else?

Mr. Hayhoe: No, it is not a fact. If anyone in the House has cheek, it is the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

Dr. McDonald: Is the Minister aware that the financial management initiative has failed in its objective of tightening up Whitehall management and saving money and that the new consultative document "Helping Managers Manage" has merely added to the confusion? Is he aware, further, that no consultancy service can help the Government achieve their objectives so long as the Government sustain their attack on Civil Service numbers, opportunities for promotion and the level of pay and fail to resolve the bitter resentment about the trade union ban at GCHQ?

Mr. Hayhoe: The hon. Lady is wrong on every single premise of that question—absolutely wrong on every count.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Dining Rooms (Smoking Ban)

34. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will initiate an inquiry into the desirability of prohibiting smoking in all dining room places within the precincts.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): No, Sir. I am not aware of any widespread demand in the House for a change in present arrangements.

Mr. Hamilton: Does the Minister recognise that there are ample facilities for smokers other than in the Dining Rooms? Does he further recognise that there is considerable inconvenience for non-smokers who have to sit beside smokers in the Dining Rooms? Will he treat the matter a little more seriously than he appears to be doing?

Mr. Biffen: I am happy to treat the matter seriously, because I understand how the hon. Gentleman feels. However, it is a matter for the Catering Sub-Committee, and I shall refer the hon. Gentleman's point to it.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Should we not, in fact, have reverted to energy questions?

Mr. Speaker: Having dealt with Civil Service questions, we revert to the questions immediately before them. If we had run out of those, we would have reverted to energy questions.

Mr. Yeo: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I draw your attention to the fact that no fewer than 11 questions were bracketed with question No. 1 this afternoon. As a result, question No. 2 was not reached until nine minutes past 3 o'clock. Can you persuade Ministers to exercise some degree of restraint in the number of questions that are bracketed together so that we do not again have a similar position to today, when question No. 18 was answered but five questions standing higher on the Order Paper were not answered?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman's question, No. 2, was reached, so I do not think that he has any cause for complaint.

I judged that it was the wish of the House today to give a fair run to question No. 1, which is a matter of major importance. I apologise to hon. Members whose questions were not reached, although I think that they will understand the special position arising today.

Frigates (Orders)

3.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Michael Heseltine): As the House knows, I have been considering the results of a tendering exercise for two type 22 frigates for the Royal Navy. Cammell Laird, Swan Hunter and Vosper Thornycroft were each invited to tender for these warships—one, the fourth replacement for warships lost in the South Atlantic, and the other an addition to the naval programme which I authorised in 1983.

The tendering process has been unusually protracted, for several reasons. I have been concerned to obtain the best available prices and tauter contract terms than we have been accustomed to in this area of defence procurement. The earlier tender replies did not adequately contribute to this objective, and it was not possible to take a decision on the order before the validity of the tenders expired. A final round of tendering was initiated in late July last year. The results of this round met several of the concerns to which I have referred, and, as with the earlier rounds, showed that the competition had been close and keenly fought.

The House will be aware that the decision on the orders for the frigates has important implications for each of the competing yards. I have considered the implications carefully, in consultation with my ministerial colleagues.

At this point, I should say that the deplorable and unnecessary industrial action which occurred last summer at Cammell Laird would, as I made clear at the time, had it continued, have excluded the yard from further consideration in the competition. The courage and determination shown by the moderate element of the work force at Cammell Laird, in the face of the intimidatory behaviour of their former work colleagues, has averted the almost certain closure of the yard at an early date.

The cheapest solution from the point of defence procurement would be to place the order for both ships with one yard, but, in the light of the wider and relevant factors involved, I have decided that an order for one type 22 frigate will be placed with Cammell Laird and for the second with Swan Hunter, and I am prepared to authorise the necessary expenditure. This offers the prospect of survival of Cammell Laird as a major warship builder; without such a contract the yard would have closed. I hope that the yard will succeed in obtaining other business in the short as well as the long term.

Swan Hunter, which is a much larger firm and is implementing a large redundancy programme at the moment, could face further substantial redundancies even with the order which I have just announced. The Government wish to do what they reasonably can to prevent this. Last autumn we embarked on the construction of a new class of frigate, the type 23, and negotiated a first order at Yarrow on the Clyde. I have decided to negotiate an order for the second type 23 frigate at Swan Hunter as soon as this can sensibly be done, and subject to satisfactory agreement on price and other contract terms. I will expect the price for this frigate to reflect the economies obtainable with an order for two frigates rather than one; and to be competitive. In order to establish this, tenders will be invited for the third type 23 order in the same time scale from all United Kingdom yards capable of carrying out the work.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): The Secretary of State's statement will obviously be welcomed both by the Royal Navy and by the two warship yards which have been given orders to build the three new frigates. It will be welcomed especially because it seems likely that this will be one of the last statements on major equipment orders in defence which the Government will make in this Parliament. From now on it is likely to be cancellations all the way.

The statement has an air of desperation about it. The Secretary of State is desperate because the Treasury will demand, if we read the public expenditure White Paper correctly, larger and larger cuts in defence. He is desperate also because the cost of Trident over the past months has increased by about £200 million a month. For the Secretary of State to talk about "tauter contract terms" is cynical and ridiculous. When are we to see tauter contract terms for Trident, the costs of which have doubled under the Government?

Why was there delay in placing the order, especially for type 22 frigates, the first one of which will be a replacement for the one lost in the Falklands war? Why does the Secretary of State not make it clear that the delay stems from budgetary problems in his Department and not from industrial problems at the yards? What will be the cost of a type 23 frigate? Some of us remember that one of the reasons for closing Chatham dockyard was that type 23 frigates would be disposable vessels and would cost about £70 million. What is the cost of a type 23 frigate now? If the type 23 is not to be disposable after all, is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied that the Royal Navy, after he and his business partner, Mr. Levene, have finished with it, will have the necessary dockyard facilities to refit the types 22 and 23 and all the other warships of the Royal Navy?

Mr. Heseltine: I suppose that the House will sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman for talking about everything except the subject of the statement. I shall answer the relevant questions that he put to me. The delay of which he spoke has nothing to do with any budgetary problems in my Department. Anyone who has any idea of the considerations that have been brought to this matter will know that. The approximate price of a type 23 frigate now is about £110 million. We shall ensure that there are adequate servicing and repair facilities. Our problem is one of over-supply of facilities, rather than under-supply.

The House will perhaps judge the sincerity of the right hon. Gentleman's contribution to my statement against the background of the Government having increased defence expenditure in real terms by £3 billion a year, while the Labour party was committed to reducing it by a third as soon as it came to power.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that most of us on the Conservative Benches will welcome his statement, which will certainly end the uncertainty about these matters? When are the type 22s likely to go into service with the Royal Navy? Similarly, when will the type 23s, which will be following thereafter, go into service?

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. As a rule of thumb, one can broadly assume that an order takes four to five years—probably nearer four years—to complete. That will give my hon. and learned Friend and the House the answer to his question.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Has the Secretary of State seen the statement attributed to Admiral of the Fleet Lord Hill-Norton about a scandal behind the selection procedures for Her Majesty's ships, particularly in relation to the Osprey? Is the Secretary of State confident that these procedures are proper?

Mr. Heseltine: I read the newspaper report this morning and I have asked to be kept fully informed about the matter, but I understand that the story carried in The Times this morning is a very long way from the truth.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): My I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the fact that three warship yards—Vosper Thorneycroft, Yarrow and Cammell Laird—are classified as lead warship manufacturers, and, therefore, maintain appropriate design staffs? What implications does my right hon. Friend's policy have for Vosper Thorneycroft, and what expectations can the yard have of further Royal Navy orders?

Mr. Heseltine: I fully understand my hon. Friend's concern. The capacity of Vospers is well known to my Department and the yard will be able to compete for the third type 23 order to which I referred in my statement. Of course, it is competing now for other ships for the Royal Navy.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): As it appears that Swan Hunter has not had to tender for the type 23, can the Secretary of State tell us whether the same sort of situation would apply to Vospers, which is a yard with a fine record of achievement, but which now faces heavy redundancies? Can the right hon. Gentleman also tell us the price for the type 22s, following the keen competition for them?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will know that we do not announce the detail of contract prices that have been negotiated in any of the work for the Ministry of Defence. However, broadly speaking, the cost of the type 22—on the same basis as the cost of £110 million that I gave for the type 23—is about £140 million. I am sympathetic about the position of Vospers, but I did not see how I had the capacity easily to help that situation. I very much hope that Vospers is successful in some of the competitive negotiations that it is now undertaking.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, after a delay of 16 months, those of us who have Vosper Thorneycroft in our area are very unhappy about his decision? Will he make it a little easier by publishing the rules of tendering, about which there has been considerable doubt—especially on how overheads are spread—and the comparative costs that he received? It has taken so long that most of us have grave doubts about the integrity of my right hon. Friend's tendering procedures.

Mr. Heseltine: I understand my hon. Friend's concern, but I cannot add to what I said. The Ministry does not customarily produce a list of prices at which contracts are awarded or the list of those who have tendered but not won contracts. The position that the Ministry faces is that all three yards are subsidiaries of one company, which is sponsored by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. That company is more likely to lay down the rules under which tendering takes place than is the Ministry.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): As a former senior shop steward at the Cammell Laird shipyard and a Merseyside Member who has many shipbuilding workers in his constituency, may I tell the right hon. Gentleman that we welcome the decision to have one of the ships built at the Cammell Laird shipyard? That is good news for Merseyside.

However, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that it was unneccesary for him to attack the workers at Cammell Laird, who were fighting for jobs—rightly or wrongly? The fact that they fought for jobs and went to prison because of it may have helped to determine that the order announced by the Secretary of State should be brought to Merseyside.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): No.

Mr. Heffer: My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) says "No." That is a matter for him. I have given my opinion. I believe that it is vital that all workers should fight for jobs, because Merseyside has been battered more than any other area in the country.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) has put to the House his interpretation of the events that led up to my statement today. I must tell him that he is categorically wrong. Nothing was more likely to close Cammell Laird than the action of those who occupied HMS Edinburgh, which is under contract to the Ministry. The idea that any Secretary of State for Defence would place another order with a shipyard that was occupying a ship under construction is unthinkable, and I said so at the time. The men who must be praised are those who have crossed the picket lines against the abuse and intimidation of a wholly unrepresentative minority. That minority has done so much to bring to Merseyside the reputation which it should shed at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Can my right hon. Friend inform the House at this stage which points defence system has been selected for the last two type 22s and two leading type 23 frigates as an effective defence against sea-skimming missiles, which proved to be the main requirement for frigates during the Falklands war?

Mr. Heseltine: The vertical launch Sea Wolf system.

Mr. Frank Field: I thank the Secretary of State for his decision. His statement will be a relief to the men and women in the yard. All five hon. Members who represent Wirral constituencies have been equally active in pressing the needs of Cammell Laird. So that unnecessary myths are not manufactured locally, will the right hon. Gentleman again take the opportunity to stress what would have been the result of his decision today if the action in the yard of 37 people had been successful against two mass meetings at the yard which opposed that action?

Mr. Heseltine: I praise the local Members of Parliament on both sides of the House for drawing the attention of the Government to the problems that face Merseyside, and Cammell Laird in particular. I can state categorically that if there had not been an order for Cammell Laird that yard would have closed within this calendar year and 1,700 jobs would have gone.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): Is my right hon. Friend able to say which yard put in the lowest tender, which put in the second lowest and which put in the highest? Is he able to confirm that Vosper Thornycroft was beaten on tender price? Is he aware that, if he is not able to confirm that, there will be a suspicion in Southampton that Vosper Thornycroft has been punished for being able to obtain some overseas orders?

Mr. Heseltine: I appreciate my hon. Friend's concern. I am bound by the conventions of the Ministry, under which we do not provide commercial in-confidence information. No Government have ever done so. We do not provide details of prices at which contracts are let or the list of prices that fail to secure contracts. However, I can give the House an interesting figure, in that we have concluded an arrangement, in terms of the procuring of the two frigates, at a price which is lower than that which we first received on the first tenders.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I, too, welcome the fact that a decision has been made on these orders. Will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that the type 22 order is placed as early as possible with Swan Hunter, for without that order there will be further redundancies? Will he also ensure that the laying of the keels of these ships is not delayed for as long as the orders were? Has he any news about the auxiliary replenishment tankers, for which Swan Hunter is urgently waiting?

Mr. Heseltine: I have nothing yet to say about any further orders for which we are currently awaiting or considering tenders. However, it is my Ministry's intention to press ahead with the orders for the type 22s as urgently as we can.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): Will my right hon. Friend say why Hall Russell of Aberdeen and Scott Lithgow of Greenock were denied the opportunity of tendering for these vessels? Can he also say why he decided not to place the second order at Yarrows but instead to give it to some other yard in England?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend will understand that we must make judgments about where orders are sought, and I believe that the facilities at the yards to which he referred might not have been adequate for the job that we had in mind. This is not a matter which one should try to divide between England and Scotland. We had a difficult decision to make and we hope that in the new round of tendering for the type 23 there will be a wide and competitive opportunity for firms on both sides of the border.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Secretary of State be more forthcoming about orders for the type 23? I understand that he proposes to keep Yarrow as the lead yard and have the second order go to Swan Hunter. How does that reflect on the loading of Yarrow, which is designed to produce three type 23s simultaneously? Will he reflect on the employment position if further orders for type 23s are not placed there, despite the present tendering position of British Shipbuilders?

Mr. Heseltine: The position at Yarrow is not, as the hon. Gentleman will understand, a responsibility of my Department, so with some hesitancy I trespass on the preserves of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. As I understand it, Yarrow has a substantial workload which includes the construction of the first class type 23. The opportunity to tender for the third type 23 to which I have referred will be available to Yarrow as it will be to other United Kingdom yards. That aspect, together with the fact that Yarrow has tendered for additional mine countermessure vessels, which will add to the potential workload, puts Yarrow in a relatively better position than some of the other shipbuilding yards.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): Although the largest shipyard in the United Kingdom was not involved in this tender, can the Secretary of State none the less confirm that Harland and Wolff Ltd. will be retained on the list of shipyards that are invited from time to time to tender for Ministry of Defence contracts?

Mr. Heseltine: Harland and Wolff is certainly considered for Ministry of Defence contracts, and has such contracts, but the firm is not a contender for this type of ship.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I congratulate the Secretary of State, at a time when the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is busy dismantling regional policy, on showing his firm conviction and belief in that policy and sending two projects to areas of very high unemployment. We welcome the triumph of Stockton over Thatcher.

What exactly did the Secretary of State mean when he said that British Shipbuilders was more responsible for the tender terms than was the Ministry of Defence? I thought that the Ministry of Defence was the purchaser in this matter. It would, therefore, lay down its criteria, in the terms of the tender, that have to be met, and would not do so via British Shipbuilders. When does the right hon. Gentleman expect these ships to come into service?

The Secretary of State said that he would look at the problem as urgently as possible and view fresh orders. Does that statement not reflect the squeezing of the Navy's budget? That budget has been squeezed and squeezed for Trident, and we will be very lucky to have any more orders for these frigates in the next two or three years.

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to clarify what I meant when I referred to the ability of British Shipbuilders to influence the tendering procedures. Of course, the specifications are laid down by the Ministry of Defence. We are the customers. The actual decisions within British Shipbuilders about the rate of profit and rate of overhead recovery are taken by British Shipbuilders on behalf of the subsidiaries within its control. To that extent, there is a limit to the degree of competitiveness between the yards that would occur if those yards were within the private sector. I hope that that point clarifies the position.

The hon. Gentleman asked about service. I answered that question when I said that it takes between four and five years — nearer four years — for these ships to be constructed. If one takes the order date and adds that period of construction, one comes close to an answer to the question.

On the hon. Gentleman's last point, there will be more orders from the Ministry of Defence. We have substantial available cash resources to spend in part upon the orders for the Royal Navy. The Opposition's forecasts on this matter will prove as ill founded as their forecasts on everything else.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise from the statement?

Sir David Price: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In view of the totally unsatisfactory explanation by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on why Vosper Thornycroft has been so harshly treated, I give notice that I shall seek the earliest opportunity to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Business of the House

3.53 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short business statement.

Following discussions through the usual channels, I have agreed to table a motion to exempt the business on Wednesday on the inspector's report on the airport inquiries 1981-83 for a period of two hours. The motion relating to the Immigration Appeals (Procedure) Rules will now be taken on a subsequent occasion.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): May I ask a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member may do so later if he catches my eye.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): As the Leader of the House has made one announcement to change the business during this week, will he take the occasion to tell the House when he intends to arrange for either a debate or a statement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer so that we have an opportunity to hear the latest chapter in the decline and fall of the pound sterling and the further failure of the Government's economic policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to stop the shadow Leader of the House, but this statement relates to the business on Wednesday and the inspector's report on airport inquiries. The right hon. Member will have to find another occasion—not on this statement—to raise that matter, please.

Mr. Shore: We are talking about the business of the House. I am inviting the Leader of the House to consider more widely whether he can make changes in the business to meet the urgency of the nation's problems.

Mr. Biffen: I believe that the precedents are that I confine myself to the rather narrow point that I have raised. I take note of the important issue that concerns the right hon. Gentleman, and I shall convey his anxieties to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say to the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and the rest of the House that we must deal with the statement that we have before the House.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With respect, when the business statement is made by the Leader of the House, he is questioned on this week's business. It is not for him to determine upon what he will be questioned, nor, with respect, Mr. Speaker, do I believe that there is a precedent for you — [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] — to confine the questions, provided that they relate to the business of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the right hon. Member looks up the precedents, he will find that he is not correct about that. If we do not keep in order in this place, we may prejudice subsequent debates. The statement was about a motion to exempt the business on Wednesday for two hours. It was not about business generally, which is announced on Thursdays.

Dr. Owen: The House is not managed for the convenience of the official Opposition or the Government. It is managed for the convenience of all hon. Members. The fact that we are not to have a statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer today on the substantial increase in interest rates is open to serious question. It is open to the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) to question you, Mr. Speaker, as I intend to question the Leader of the House, as to why there will not be a debate on Wednesday. The Labour party may not wish to challenge the Government's economic policies, but we do, I believe that we are in order to do so, and I should like your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the right hon. Member is aware that his hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) has already given me notice that he intends to raise the matter under Standing Order No. 10. It would be wrong for the right hon. Member to seek to widen the statement into something different. The precedent is well established.

Dr. Owen: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am surprised that you think it is possible that my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) would raise the matter under Standing Order No. 10 without having discussed it with me.

I believe that the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) was in order in seeking to question the Leader of the House as to why there is not to be a debate this week on the Chancellor's statement. The Labour party may have given up using the rights and duties of the House, but I should like a ruling, Mr. Speaker, on whether you are saying that the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney was out of order and that I should be out of order in making a similar point, which is that instead of having a debate on Stansted, we should have a debate on the economy.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. One at a time. The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) raises an important point, but he and the House know that I am bound by Standing Orders and precedent. I draw his attention and that of the House to page 346 of "Erskine May", where it says, in relation to supplementary business statements,

> "On other days only business questions relating to the business of the day, or to any change in the business for the week already announced, are permitted."

That is why I ruled as I did.

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) should try to raise a quarrel with you when you are clearly acting with the authority of the House.

On future occasions, would you consider the possibility, when the Leader of the House announces a change of business at a time when there is great economic news, such as the change in interests rates, of asking him to arrange for a statement to be made in the House? There is a great deal of anxiety about the effect on jobs and so on, and we would therefore be glad of an opportunity to ask the Leader of the House for a statement to be made as soon as possible on the increase in the interest rate to 14 per cent.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think that I may be able to be of some assistance to you. As you quite rightly said, when there is a business statement on a narrow item, it is important that the leader of the Social Democratic party, if he wishes to get in on another matter ——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Skinner: I am coming to the point. It should be open to the right hon. Gentleman to use a little ingenuity. If he had said that perhaps it would have been better for the House to devote an extra two hours to the state of the economy and the fall on the stock exchange instead of to a debate on Stansted, you would have ruled him in order, he would have complied with "Erskine May", and he would have been a little wiser. However, when someone is a one-man band, power sometimes goes to the head.

Dr. Owen rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I always get a little apprehensive when the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) says that he is being helpful to me. However, in this case, that is correct.

Dr. Owen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the light of what you read out from "Erskine May", that can hardly be a ruling as to precedent. Will you consider the matter in relation to what has happened in the past?

Mr. Speaker: I shall certainly do that.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Is this another point of order?

Mr. Wilkinson: No, Mr. Speaker, it is a question on the statement of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

I thank my right hon. Friend for his statement. Is the matter to be debated on Wednesday for the extra time to be considered a party matter, or, as far as the Government are concerned, is it not?

Mr. Biffen: Whipping is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary.

Coal Industry Dispute

4.3 pm

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Government's involvement in the mining industry dispute."

The Government's actions during the past week have left the country in no doubt that they are trying to impede the resumption of negotiations. It is in terms of that specific matter that the House should be able to debate the mining dispute once again.

There cannot be a single Member in any part of the House who does not regard the matter as important. Each week that the Government prolong the dispute they are spending an estimated £80 million in their attempt to break the strike and the National Union of Mineworkers. Today there has been another increase in interest rates, which is not unconnected with the dispute. Meanwhile, miners and their families are suffering increasing hardship in their struggle to maintain their jobs and ensure a future for their communities. The matter is increasingly urgent as a result of the Government's intervention this week. Recently both the chairman of the National Coal Board and Mr. Michael Eaton stated that they believed that the only way to resolve this dispute was through a negotiated settlement. Even more recently, the leadership of the NUM has called for a resumption of negotiations without preconditions.

Despite the statements of both sides in the dispute, the Government have blatantly interfered to prevent negotiations. Last week the press briefing from the Prime Minister's Office was fully reported in the national press, and had the effect of scotching any immediate resumption of negotiations. On Saturday, Mr. David Hart, a close adviser of the Prime Minister's wrote in The Times:

"Any true negotiation now would represent defeat for the coal board . . . the time for negotiated settlement is past . . . they must be defeated".

The House must hear from the Secretary of State on this matter. The Secretary of State should make it plain to the House what the attitude of the Government is and not leave hon. Members and the country to guess from conflicting press reports. The House should have the opportunity to discuss this long and serious dispute and the implications of the Government's actions.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Government's involvement in the mining industry dispute."

I have listened with great care to what has been said by the right hon. Member. As he knows, we had a long discussion on this matter at Question Time today. I have to take account of the fact that it is hoped that negotiations are to begin tomorrow.

As the right hon. Gentleman knows, my sole responsibility in exercising my discretion in considering applications under Standing Order No. 10 is to decide whether they should have priority over the business already set down for this evening or tomorrow. I regret that I cannot find that the matter that he has raised meets those criteria, and I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Mr. Orme: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand the views that you have expressed, and I am not challenging them. However, I speak as someone who has made exhaustive efforts to promote negotiations throughout the dispute. As such, I say that it is not negotiations that are to start tomorrow, but talks about talks. The situation is one of great significance both to the Labour Opposition and to myself. If the talks were to fail, or if the negotiations did not start, I must advise you on behalf of the Opposition, that I will immediately raise the matter in the House again.

Mr. Speaker: I fully understand, and fully accept, the right hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In referring to the same matter on 24 January, you pointed out:

"I am bound to have regard to other opportunities in the House to raise these matters."—[Official Report, 24 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 1145]

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will bear in mind the great difference between discussing a matter for three hours, as under Standing Order No. 10, and having a full day in which to discuss it, which gives wider opportunities, especially to Back Benchers, to take part. If the matter were the subject for an Opposition day, it would be open to us to discuss it for a full day.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The choice of subject for Opposition days is not a matter for me.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is with some trepidation and apprehension that I raise this matter with you. I am aware of the difficulties that you must have in trying to arrive at a conclusion, but many of us who are actively involved in the dispute are aware that we have not had an opportunity to discuss it on the Floor of the House, no matter how responsibility for that is apportioned. My fear and, I believe, that of many other Opposition Members is that if there are pressures on the negotiations, the Government have opportunities, through their offices and links with the NCB, to influence, for good or ill, the course of the deliberations. The House, however, has no opportunity to ventilate the feelings of the whole nation about the dispute. I trust that you will keep that in mind in any further representations that are made to you.

Mr. Speaker: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I keep that matter very much in mind. I think that the House should have an opportunity, at the appropriate moment, to discuss this issue.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East) rose——

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): It is nice of the hon. Gentleman to look in—he has missed his question.

Mr. Nellist: I spend more time here than you do, sunshine.

Mr. Speaker: Order. My name is not sunshine.

Mr. Nellist: It seems to be one of those days.

Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In your ruling a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, you explained that the only criterion by which you are allowed to judge an application under Standing Order No. 10 is whether it should take precedence over the business set down for today or tomorrow. Would you expand on that explanation slightly, because the business that is set down for today —the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill — has already been delayed from last week. On the day on which the Bill was supposed to be debated last week, you turned down an application under Standing Order No. 10 for a debate on the miners' strike. If the Bill was not sufficiently important to be discussed last week, could it not be postponed again so that a crucially important debate on the miners' strike could take place today?

Mr. Speaker: I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to Standing Order No. 10, which sets out my discretion fully.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a different point of order, of which I gave you notice——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take that point of order later. It is a different issue. Let us deal with all this first.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is this another attempt to be helpful?

Mr. Skinner: I try to do that all the time, Mr. Speaker. In regard to the criteria by which you make a decision, you referred to the fact that there might be negotiations and gave the impression that if the House debated the matter, that could necessarily hamper the negotiations. There is a bit of a problem there in that, although the House might keep its collective mouth shut, the Government continue to open theirs. The Government feed the media in all sorts of ways and the idea of having a debate is to provide some balance. That is important and I hope that, when an application under Standing Order No. 10 is made again, you will bear that in mind.

Mr. Speaker: I most certainly will.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Although I do not wish to challenge your ruling on the application under Standing Order No. 10, are you aware that the mining dispute has now gone on for more than half of the life of this Parliament, that, so far, only one application under Standing Order No. 10 relating to it has been granted, that more than 23 have been made, that many people outside the House find it unbelievable that the mining dispute should be discussed everywhere else and affect everyone's life in some way and cause great hardship to some, although less to others, yet the House still does not give time to debate the matter? I trust that you will look favourably on a further application under Standing Order No. 10.

Mr. Speaker: I repeat what I said last Thursday. I am not responsible for the organisation of business in the House. That is done through the usual channels and with all the parties concerned. The Opposition have at their disposal an Opposition day, broadly once a week. It so happens that this week there is not an Opposition day, and I shall certainly have to take that into account if applications are made in future.

Secretary of State for Transport

4.14 pm

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the failure of the Secretary of State for Transport to respond to a court decision of 11 January 1985 that he had acted irrationally, improperly and unlawfully in compelling the Greater London council to pay a sum of approximately £50 million in excess of the sum properly required to finance London Regional Transport."

The matter is specific because it relates to a court judgment, as I have outlined, and to the judge's comments about the conduct of the Secretary of State and his subsequent inaction.

It is important, because Ministers are surely not above the law, and there are rumours that the Government are considering a change of the law and, in so doing, introducing retrospective legislation to make lawful what the judge called unlawful. The Government constantly demand respect for the rule of law of others and regularly campaign, without much evidence, as the law and order party.

The matter is urgent because as long ago as 14 January the Secretary of State claimed, while refusing to answer questions on this matter, that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks):

"will know that we have appealed against the judgment, and therefore it is sub judice." — [Official Report, 14 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 2.]

I am informed that, despite the Secretary of State's comments in the House on that day at column 2, as I have quoted, and at column 11 and column 13, to the effect that the Government intended to appeal and that he would therefore not answer questions on this matter, no such appeal has so far been received by the court. In view of the rumours that the Government are to seek a change in the law in attempt to justify the Secretary of State's disgraceful conduct, might I press you to approve this application?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the failure of the Secretary of State for Transport to respond to a court decision of 11 January 1985 that he had acted irrationally, improperly and unlawfully in compelling the Greater London council to pay a sum of approximately £50 million in excess of the sum properly required to finance London Regional Transport."

I have listened with great care to what the hon. Member has said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10, and I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Interest rates

4.17 pm

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the rise in interest rates which has taken place today."

This is a specific matter because it concerns a 2 per cent. increase in the base rate, which will have a profound impact on the economy and the Government's policy.

The matter is important because the rise will substantially increase costs to industry—they have risen by over £1 billion since the beginning of the year—and almost inevitably lead to substantial increases in mortgage interest rates for householders and others who borrow money. The rise will undermine the foundations of the Government's economic policy.

The House should give urgent consideration to the matter, not least because there will not be another opportunity to consider it in the near future. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that when a smaller increase in interest rates took place only a short while ago you allowed a private notice question and the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a statement to the House. We have had no statement today and no opportunity to discuss the issue.

I hope, Mr. Speaker that you will accept my application to provide the House with the opportunity to have a short debate on the Government's economic strategy for the future, what reserves are being used to bolster the pound, what the Government's exchange rate policy is and what will happen to interest rates in the future. I hope that you will provide the House with an early opportunity to discuss the matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the rise in interest rates which has taken place today."

I have not today received any application for a private notice question, possibly because the news came after midday. I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10, and I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Sub Judice Rule

4.20 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to raise a matter about which I gave notice to your office shortly after 10 o'clock this morning. I hope that you will rule on it, possibly tomorrow, when you have had time to reflect on the matter. It is the delicate and difficult matter of the sub judice rule.

In answer to a question, the Secretary of State for Defence said that a report in The Times was without truth. I am not concerned with the report, but simply with a quotation from a Member of Parliament, for such is Admiral Hill-Norton. In the paper of record he is reported as saying:

"One cannot help feeling that, like the Clive Ponting case, they are doing it to suppress something which may be damaging to the reputation of Government Ministers and officials. The whole thing stinks."

The House will realise that I could not personally take exception to that comment. Therefore, I feel easier about raising the matter as a general issue of principle. Someone somewhere will have to sort out what is sub judice and what is not. The rules are extremely elastic.

Last week, many points were raised with you. I spent the morning at the Old Bailey and can only report that hardened court reporters had never before seen anything quite like that comment from a Member of Parliament. Will you, Mr. Speaker, reflect on the issues raised, and possibly rule tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker: I shall certainly do that.

Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the 11 motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Redundancy Payments (Variation of Rebates) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Specialised Agencies of the United Nations (Immunities and Privileges) (Amendment) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft International Union for the Protection of New Varieties of Plants (Legal Capacities) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Water Undertakings (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft British Waterways Board (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Glasgow Underground (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft British Alcan Aluminium Limited and Lochaber Power Company (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Scottish Electricity Boards (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft British Gas Corporation (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft British Railways Board (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft British Telecommunications plc (Rateable Values) (Scotland) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Neubert.].

STANDING COMMITTEES ON EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Ordered,

That European Community Documents Nos. 9182/84, 11388/84 and 4096/85 (replacing 9469/84) concerning wine be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.—[Mr. Neubert.].

Orders of the Day

Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

4.22 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Sir Keith Joseph): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The objective of the Bill is to secure compliance with the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in February 1982. Under article 2 of the first protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights, states are obliged to respect the philosophical convictions of their citizens. The court's judgment means that a parental conviction against corporal punishment in schools comes within the terms of that article.

The United Kingdom Government ratified the convention in March 1951 and undertook to abide by the decision of the court in any case to which they were a party. There is no provision for appeal, and the court's judgment in February 1982 is therefore binding.

The question for the Government, therefore, was to decide on the means of compliance. One way of complying would be to legislate to abolish corporal punishment in state schools. That is not required by the judgment, which was concerned with respect for a philosophical conviction, and the Government reject that option. The Government are opposed in principle to forcing abolition.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has encouraged gradual elimination of corporal punishment on a voluntary basis. For many years that has been the policy in Scotland, where the circumstances are different from those in the rest of the United Kingdom, and where the process of voluntary elimination has largely been completed. The Government are at one in rejecting enforced abolition.

Outside Scotland, there is no prospect of a consensus on abolition. Many parents and teachers see a place for corporal punishment in schools; for example, last year a sample poll in England and Wales showed more than half of the teachers interviewed to be in favour of retention, compared with more than a third in favour of abolition. Therefore, a state ban on corporal punishment is not called for by the European Court's judgment. The Government are not prepared to ride roughshod over the views of the millions of parents and teachers in this country who see a place for corporal punishment.

It is all very well for the Opposition to adopt a centralist posture and say that they will ignore the views of millions of teachers and parents who believe that they should have a voice in the decision whether corporal punishment in any school should be ruled out of order. Once again the Opposition have espoused a policy of imposing their views on the country. We are going as far as we can to consult parents and teachers by the means described in the Bill.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Since the Secretary of State is so keen to give powers to parents, will he explain how the Bill deals with the position in which one parent believes in corporal punishment and the other does not?

Sir Keith Joseph: In compliance with the judgment of the court, we must give priority to the view of the parent who has a philosophical conviction, or who expresses a wish consistent with a philosophical conviction against corporal punishment.

The second option for the Government was to adopt what might be called a dual system. The Government therefore considered the possibility of a dual system of schools, some where corporal punishment was used, and others where it was not. In theory, such a dual system would allow parents to choose between the two types of school.

However, there would be enormous practical difficulties and it could be hugely expensive. The practical difficulties would be greatest in rural areas, where choice is limited by the sparsity of population. In all areas, however, there would be administrative complications for the allocation of pupils to schools. It would be expensive because of the need to provide additional schools to maintain existing patterns of choice between different types of school. Altogether it would be a wasteful use of resources. Since no parent must be penalised for seeking respect for his or her philosophical conviction, the existing provision of schools would virtually have to be doubled. Therefore, the Government rejected a dual system option.

The remaining option is that embodied in the Bill.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): My right hon. Friend spoke of the remaining option. Will he explain why he did not consider a fourth option, which is to do absolutely nothing?

Sir Keith Joseph: That is an attractive option, but for the one overriding factor that the country does not break its treaty obligations. The country subscribed to the rule of court in 1951. In 1966, under a Labour Government, the country widened its undertaking to comply from those cases where the applicant was another state to those where the applicant was an individual. Since 1966, the Government have confirmed their compliance with the treaty every five years, and the latest date of such confirmation was 1981. I am sure that many hon. Members find aspects of the Bill distasteful, but most hon. Members will agree that it would be even more distasteful for the country to fail to comply with the judgment of the court and with the treaty to which the country has subscribed.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Although I welcome the Government's commitment to trying to enforce the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights, does the Secretary of State agree that there is a wider obligation upon the Government to respect the convention which, under article 3, provides that inhuman and degrading treatment shall not be administered? Does he accept that article 3 was considered in the court's judgment which the Bill seeks to enforce and that, although the circumstances were held not to require the invocation of article 3, it remains the case that if corporal punishment is inflicted in schools, on the facts of some cases, the British Government may once again be hauled before an international court? Is it not extremely undesirable that Britain should once again face the possibility of a judgment against the Government because the Secretary of State has not sought to abolish corporal punishment?

Sir Keith Joseph: I understand that some cases under article 3 will come before the court. The Government will defend their position. It is not obvious to the Government that corporal punishment, especially when one considers the breadth of definition of that phrase, represents degrading or inhuman treatment. The hon. Gentleman should not make judgments before the court does.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): My right hon. Friend said that some aspects of the Bill might be distasteful. Does he find distasteful the fact that, in consequence of the measure, the principle of in loco parentis, and with it the authority of teachers, head teachers and governors of schools may be seriously undermined?

Sir Keith Joseph: If that were true, I would respect my hon. Friend's concern, but I am advised that the in loco parentis position of the teacher is not undermined. It is slightly reduced in connection with this Bill only, but in all other aspects of responsibility in school it remains undiminished.

The Government have adopted the only other course available—an exemptions scheme. It may not be ideal, but it is better than abolition or a dual system. In short, it is the least objectionable solution. An exemptions scheme allows parents whose children would otherwise be liable to corporal punishment in school to exempt them from such punishment. Where schools have abandoned all forms of corporal punishment, or to the extent that a school has abandoned it—I am thinking of a school with an infant class as well as junior classes—the Bill will not affect them, and there will be no obligation to consult parents. Where schools use corporal punishment, in any of its forms — I must emphasise that a slap would constitute corporal punishment—the Bill gives parents a choice. They can leave the matter to the school, in which case the child will be liable to corporal punishment, or they can opt the child out of corporal punishment.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Will my right hon. Friend make it crystal clear to me and to the House whether this is an opting-in or opting-out system? My facility to read legislative documents is not as strong as it could be, but the first part of clause 2 refers to which suggests to me that the onus is on parents to opt in if they wish their children to be subject to corporal punishment.

"maintaining registers showing those pupils who are not to be exempt from corporal punishment",

Sir Keith Joseph: The Bill is an opting-out measure. The children whose parents do not opt them out will remain on the register; it is the children on the register who will remain liable to corporal punishment. I was about to explain that with my next sentence.

Under the system to be introduced by regulations, parents who do not reply to an approach from the school will be deemed to have consented to the use of corporal punishment on their children. In effect, it is an opting-out scheme. Unless parents take the trouble to return a form to the school saying that they opt their child out, a teacher in any court action will have the defence of acting in loco parentis. The initiative of asking the question, "Do you or do you not agree to corporal punishment for your child?" lies with the school. The responsibility for saying no lies with the parents.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Is that not made clear in clause 2(4)?

Sir Keith Joseph: I had hoped that it was abundantly clear from the entire Bill, but I am glad to have that confirmation from my hon. Friend.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the Secretary of State accept that it is clear from the Bill that schools will have some administrative problems if they must take the responsibility of ensuring that a reply from a parent is kept safely? Does he accept that many schools would prefer a system in which the opposite was true, so that they had proof of the willingness of parents that their children should be liable to corporal punishment?

Sir Keith Joseph: I imagine that there are two points of view about this, and no doubt it can be argued in Committee. However, especially after the helpful results of the consultation that we have carried out in recent months, we believe this option to be the most practical.

If the school does not receive an answer from a parent, I imagine that it will be required by regulations to remind the parent that an answer is awaited. If, after a few weeks —or the period that is laid down in the regulations—no answer has been received, that parent will be assumed to have forgone the opportunity to opt out his child or children, and his or their names will be entered on the register.

As the court requires us to respect the philosophical conviction of a parent or parents, it is surely not too much to hope that a parent with such philosophical convictions will answer a question from the school and return a form.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): The Bill has given encouragement to many parents with children in schools where corporal punishment has not been available until now. Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the Bill will allow parents to opt in to corporal punishment in schools where there is at present no corporal punishment? If not, why not?

Sir Keith Joseph: I cannot answer my hon. Friend as he would wish. Where a school has already stopped using corporal punishment in any of its forms, it will not be required by the Bill to approach parents for their permission. Of course, it is open to a school to reconsider, but it will not automatically be open to parents to act under the Bill to persuade a school to change its view. If parents, singly or in a group, wish to ask a school to reconsider its position, they will be as free in the future as they are now, and have been, to try so to persuade the school.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): Could my right hon. Friend help those Conservative Members who are genuinely concerned about how to cast their votes later tonight on what appears, at the very least, to be a muddled Bill? Has my right hon. Friend received the suggestion from teachers' organisations that if there are to be two tiers of punishment—for those children whose parents are prepared to allow corporal punishment to be administered to them there will be three of the best, whereas for the others there will be 100 lines or three hours of detention —this will create the most enormous administrative problems?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, such views have reached my ears. It has been widely said, both in the House and among the teachers, that such difficulties might arise. In a few moments I propose to deal with them.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Is it not becoming apparent that if a child wants to carry out a misdemeanour he should do it with a child who is on the register because then he will not be beaten, whereas if he misbehaves with a child who is on the register he will be beaten? Is it not obvious that the legislation is absurd? Is this not the penalty that we are paying for allowing foreign institutions to decide what laws we in this country should have?

Sir Keith Joseph: My hon. Friend will find much support for that point of view. However, the fact is that the Government of this country subscribe to the treaty. Therefore, we have an obligation. The method that we have adopted in the Bill has more regard for the wishes of parents than would a Government ban on corporal punishment. If a school wishes to use corporal punishment on any pupil, it has to go to that pupil's parents to seek their views. The school is obliged to accede to the parent's wishes if the parent says no. In the most direct way possible, therefore, an exemption scheme meets the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights. Without children moving from one school, normally the one the parent has chosen, to another, parents are able to secure respect for their philosophical convictions against corporal punishment.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Does this apply to public schools, or are public schools exempt from human rights? Is the parent of a child who is at a public school—this is, in fact, a private school, but it is a curious British habit to call private schools public schools—able to prevent his offspring receiving corporal punishment? May I therefore pose to the Minister the problem of the assisted places scheme?

Sir Keith Joseph: I wonder whether the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) will permit me to deal with that precise point in a few moments.

Mr. Flannery: I do not want to create difficulties for the Minister, but can he explain what will happen to such a child?

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Member will have his chance, if he will allow me to reach that part of my speech.

The exemptions approach has been criticised — I come now to the anxiety expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle)——

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): My right hon. Friend said that the Bill provides for the rights laid down by the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights at Strasbourg. Will he make it perfectly clear to me and to the House whether, if left to his own good judgment, he would have introduced a Bill of this kind? Does he find that, as presented to the House, the Bill is in the best interests of the education of the children of this country?

Sir Keith Joseph: I shall go only so far as to say that if my right hon. Friends in the Government had offered me the chance to present a Bill on education, this is not the subject upon which we should be legislating.

An exemptions approach has been criticised as unfair. It would allow corporal punishment to be used on one child and not on another, even if both had committed the same offence. This is a very plausible argument, and I can see that it contains a good deal of force, but even within the same school individual circumstances already sometimes cause one child, perhaps because of problems at home, or because of an emotional crisis, or for some other reason, not to be subject to corporal punishment.

In the case of two schools virtually adjacent to one another and serving the same catchment area, one may have abolished corporal punishment, while the other has not. Moreover, in the same school, in particular where there is a mixed age range, although infants are not subject to corporal punishment they are occasionally slapped on the leg or the hand. In many schools, girls are exempt from many forms of corporal punishment, while boys are not. To argue that an exemptions scheme makes for unfairness between children who have misbehaved in the same way is to assume that corporal punishment is the only sort of punishment.

I hope that all hon. Members will accept that corporal punishment is used only for the most severe offences. Nor is it the only punishment. There are all sorts of punishments, including the withdrawal of rewards and privileges. This is probably one of the most widely used forms of punishment. Therefore, I do not accept that unfairness is necessarily a compelling argument.

If two children in a school have committed the same offence and one is subject to corporal punishment and the other is not, and corporal punishment is applied to the child who is not exempt, I do not accept that the child who is exempt will not be jealous of the child who is subject to corporal punishment. In certain circumstances, it could be that a child would rather have a short, sharp punishment rather than the longer drawn out punishment that might replace it. Nevertheless, I freely grant to my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) that there may well be a risk of unfairness between children, one of whom is exempt and one of whom is not.

Exempted pupils would not go unpunished. There is a range of other sanctions that teachers could use. Where pupils are caught in the same act of misbehaviour and some are exempted and some are not, teachers can decide to offer to those who are liable to corporal punishment the choice of an alternative. This choice of punishment is sometimes given now. What matters is that pupils should know that they will not go unpunished. The withdrawal of rewards and privileges can be, and perhaps is, the best alternative. Pupils are made to realise that they cannot misbehave with impunity. An exemptions scheme can therefore be made to work.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): If the philosophical argument in favour of the Bill, as opposed to the pragmatic argument, is that parents have the right of ultimate control to remove their children from activities which they dislike, whether it be religious education under the Education Act 1944 or caning under this Bill, why should we stop at that? Why should parents not have the right to withdraw their children from biased political education, such as peace studies? Are we not in danger of imposing double standards?

Sir Keith Joseph: It is open to any parent or child to complain if education is being distorted into indoctrination.

An exemptions scheme can be made to work. Practical questions arise, however, about obtaining and recording the views of parents. That is why a consultative document was issued in 1983. The Bill has benefited from that exercise, in particular because the response has shown the advantage of seeking the views of all parents whose children are liable to corporal punishment. Under the scheme outlined in the Bill, the initiative lies with the school rather than with the parents. This, together with the fact that the school will keep a list of those who are liable to corporal punishment, from which exempted children will have been excluded by their parents, reduces to a minimum the risk of errors and misunderstandings.

I come now to the main features of the Bill. The first three clauses relate to England and Wales. Clause 1 concerns the defence available to a teacher or other member of staff in civil or criminal proceedings for battery. Where a teacher has administered moderate and reasonable corporal punishment, he can at present advance the defence that he was acting in loco parentis.

The Bill provides that that defence cannot be advanced in civil proceedings in the case of pupils who have been exempted from corporal punishment. The definition of corporal punishment is necessarily wide. It extends beyond the use of the cane or tawse, to other forms of bodily chastisement. Most acts which constitute battery would be disallowed in the case of an exempted pupil.

However, there must be safeguards for staff who are obliged to intervene physically for the purpose of restraining pupils. Provided that averting immediate danger to a person or property is one of the reasons for the action, the in loco parentis defence will still be available. There is no question of destroying the in loco parentis concept. For most practical purposes, apart from that issue of corporal punishment, it stays.

Pupils would be exempt from corporal punishment unless their names appeared on a register. The requirement to keep a register will apply to all maintained schools and to non-maintained special schools in which corporal punishment is used. I repeat that where a school has given up the use of corporal punishment in all its forms, the Bill does not affect it.

The requirement to comply with the Bill will also extend to pupils whose fees are paid wholly or in part directly out of public funds. That will affect local authority placements and pupils benefiting under the assisted places scheme or the music and ballet schemes. The legislation will not apply to other pupils in independent schools.

Finally, I should stress that the clause applies to corporal punishment used by or on the authority of a member of staff, and therefore extends to others besides teachers.

Mr. Marlow: I am sorry to intervene a second time, but would a public school, or a private school as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) called it, be able to say that, as a condition of allowing a child to come under the assisted places scheme, it would require the parents to put their child on the register? If not, does my right hon. Friend expect to lose several assisted places?

Sir Keith Joseph: I should like to consider that question. My impression is that that would not be consistent with the assisted places scheme. Either my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will answer that question whether he replies to the debate if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or I shall ensure that a letter goes to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): My right hon. Friend said that schools in receipt of public money would be liable to the scheme. Does that include children of military and diplomatic officers?

Sir Keith Joseph: I must give my hon. Friend the same answer. I should like to make sure of the answer to that and then write to him. The Bill applies to those children placed by local authorities in independent schools.

Clause 2 provides for the registers maintained by schools using corporal punishment to record the names of those pupils who are liable to the sanction on the basis of consent by their parents. The clause is the framework around which regulations will be prepared. We envisage regulations which will allow a school to assume consent if the parent did not reply to the school within a specified period of, say, six weeks. We also envisage that parents could change their minds. "Parent" would be interpreted broadly. A school's initial responsibility to seek the views of parents would be discharged by sending a form to the pupil's home address.

A school or local education authority may change its policy on corporal punishment, introducing it in schools where it was not previously used, or abandoning it in others. In that case, schools would have to set up registers or abandon them as the case may be.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): Would there be some sort of gestation period, or would it be possible for a parent to phone up when he finds that his or her child will be caned and countermand that instruction?

Sir Keith Joseph: No, the thought is that regulations will provide for a few days between the decision and the effectiveness of that decision so that the teacher concerned can have no doubt about the position. Time is provided for a name to be put on or taken off the register without any misunderstanding.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my right hon. Friend, with his long parliamentary experience, remember any piece of legislation more bizarre than this? Has he ever spoken to anything with less conviction? Would he not be rather relieved if Parliament discharged him of his responsibilities this evening?

Sir Keith Joseph: I think that the answers to my hon. Friend's questions are yes, no, no, but I should like to make sure.

The main purpose of clause 3 is to define responsibility for the maintenance of registers. In a maintained school, the responsible body would be the governors; in a non-maintained special school and for pupils affected in an independent school, the proprietor; for nursery schools maintained by an LEA, and for pupils educated otherwise than at school, the LEA would be the responsible body.

Clause 4 applies to Scotland. While its provisions are basically similar to those contained in clauses 1, 2 and 3, it also takes into account certain aspects particular to the Scottish position. Such aspects include, in the case of young persons—those aged 16 or 17 years—that it will be the young person himself whose views are sought, not those of his parents. That mirrors the position accorded young persons in other aspects of Scottish education legislation; for example, rights relating to choice of school.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett rose——

Sir Keith Joseph: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not cross-examine me on Scotland.

Mr. Bennett: I want to ask about a much more general philosophical point. Why should pupils over 16 be consulted in Scotland, but not in England and Wales? The European Court was concerned with the philosophical views of parents. If we take into account the philosophical views of 16-year-olds in Scotland, surely we should do the same in England and Wales?

Sir Keith Joseph: That is not what the court requires us to comply with.

Clause 4 reflects the long-standing policy of Scotland to which I have already referred. Those authorities which have already eliminated corporal punishment from their schools need not give fresh consideration to the issue, but can rest on their past decisions.

Clause 5 anticipates arrangements for the extension of provisions corresponding to those in clauses 1, 2 and 3 to Northern Ireland. Clauses 6 and 7 are of a general nature and, inter alia, provide for different clauses to be brought into force at different times. The schedule describes aspects of the Bill which are to be covered by regulations.

The administrative cost of an exemptions scheme would be slight, confined largely to postal and other costs incidental to keeping registers. As to extra expenditure arising from alternatives to corporal punishment, I reject the notion that there must be expensive alternatives. Some period of adjustment for schools which decide not to use corporal punishment will be necessary, but in the past others have made that adjustment, either from their own choice or as a result of local education authority policy. There is no need to expand teaching forces.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): I notice that there is nothing in the Bill about savings in the cost of buying canes.

Sir Keith Joseph: I must bear that argument in mind if anyone claims that more expense would be involved.

I repeat that action was necessary to secure compliance with a ruling which has the status of a treaty obligation. I accept that any method of compliance is bound to be untidy. I do not accept that the Bill is a muddle. The Bill is consistent with upholding good discipline in schools, for which many parents and teachers regard the availability of corporal punishment as an important requirement, because, as the House will understand, there are alternatives to corporal punishment.

The Government have sought to produce a measure which keeps the additional administrative burden to a minimum. In England and Wales the reaction of many schools may be to choose abolition. If so, it will be their choice. The essential concern of the Government is to maintain the rights of the school and to consult the parents to comply with the court ruling in the important matter of discipline. I ask the House to give the Bill a Second Reading.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"That this House declines to give a Second Reading to the Bill because it does not abolish corporal punishment, leads to unfairness between pupils, creates a bureaucratic nightmare, and fails to establish the atmosphere of co-operation in which good discipline can be maintained and educational standards raised."

This is a totally unworkable Bill. As everyone knows, it is an uneasy compromise between the view held by many Conservative hon. Members that corporal punishment is good, and the binding decision of the European Court of Human Rights which, in the Campbell and Cosans case, upheld, under article 2, the rights of parents who oppose corporal punishment.

Conservative Members of Parliament, among them the Secretary of State, believe that it is right, even in the 1980s when corporal punishment is banned in all other European countries, that schools should be able to use the sanction of what outside the classroom is defined as battery—in other words, a criminal offence. The Secretary of State has tried desperately but unavailingly to square the circle between his party's prejudices and the decision of the European Court of Human Rights.

Right hon. and hon. Members will recollect that the Secretary of State produced a four-page consultative document 17 months after the court's decision. That proposed a system of opt-out, which was exactly the same as that contained in the Bill, for the children of parents who opposed corporal punishment. However, in the consultative exercise which followed, the opt-out compromise was roundly condemned by all authoritative organisations, and I think that the Secretary of State should have told the House that when he was extolling the virtues of his Bill.

I remind the right hon. Gentleman of what the organisations said to him. The Association of Metropolitan Authorities called the proposals "unworkable". The Association of County Councils said:

"a system which allowed different sanctions for the same misdemeanour . . . would be difficult to justify."

The Campaign for State Education said that the European Court had made the use of corporal punishment

"inequitable, illogical and above all impracticable."

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): These criticisms of the Bill may be justified, but why should not school governors make the ultimate decision, as the Bill provides?

Mr. Radice: I shall come to that. I want to make my speech in my own way.

The National Union of Teachers said that the Government's policy was "ill-conceived".

The Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association had the gravest reservations about the wisdom of creating two disciplinary systems.

Perhaps the most significant comment came from the National Association of Head Teachers. Right hon. and hon. Members will be aware that the consultative document stressed the central role played by heads in maintaining discipline. The head teachers warned the Government of the conflict between the decision not to abolish and the decision to retain a sanction which would be implemented on an unsatisfactory basis. Only last week the same association went so far as to urge the Government to fix a date for phasing out beating instead of introducing a measure that would bring about abolition by the back door.

On 26 October the Secretary of State told the House:

"Over 100 organisations and individuals responded, and it is clear that there is concern about an exemptions system."—[Official Report, 26 October 1984; Vol. 65 c. 735.]

If the Secretary of State is honest—and I know that he tries to be — I think that he will admit that the organisations which support him can be counted on the fingers of one hand.

The right hon. Gentleman has himself publicly accepted, as he told the House on 8 November, that an opt-out system would have "untidy consequences." Today he went even further in airing his misgivings about the Bill. Yet, despite the almost universal condemnation, despite all the warnings about unworkability and despite his own awareness of the inadequacy of the Bill, the Secretary of State has chosen to proceed with this absurd piece of legislation.

Any objective observer must conclude that the Bill's main effect is to create two patterns of discipline in the classroom—one for those pupils whose parents do not consent to corporal punishment, and the other for those pupils whose parents either support corporal punishment or have failed to reply to the school governors in writing that they are against corporal punishment.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman may wish to make some play with the term "philosophical convictions," because that is the basis of the court's judgment. However, if a parent has philosophical convictions, it is unlikely that he will fail to respond to an approach to him by the school about a subject which is as important as this one. Is not that so?

Mr. Radice: It may be that the hon. Gentleman is a better correspondent than I am, but I do not always reply to every letter sent to me. I do my best, but occasionally matters go wrong. The problem is that if a parent does not reply, the assumption is that he or she is in favour of corporal punishment. That is the difficulty. [Interruption.] In any event, as my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) points out, he may not receive the letter.

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Did not my right hon. Friend say that not only would parents receive a letter asking whether they were prepared to have their children punished corporally but, if they did not reply, that they would also receive a reminder? They would have to neglect two specific letters. On such an important matter as this, that would be extremely unlikely.

Mr. Radice: I hope that most parents would reply, but some might not. But that is not my main argument against the Bill.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is not a very good one, either.

Mr. Radice: It is not a bad one. But I am coming to the "alpha" part.

Mr. Hogg: Could do better.

Mr. Cormack: Not very good for a Wykehamist.

Mr. Radice: Let me paint a scenario for right hon. and hon. Members. Let us say that there are two pupils who misbehave. For the sake of argument, I shall call them Keith and Giles. Keith's parents do not mind him being beaten, but Giles's parents happen to mind. They have a conviction against it. [Laughter.] Right hon. and hon. Members may laugh, but this is what will happen, and it will be chaotic. The teacher may remember the wishes of the parents of the two unruly pupils, or he may have to consult the register of those parents who are in favour of corporal punishment. It has even been suggested that Keith and Giles will be wearing different coloured badges—blue for Keith and red for Giles. Whatever is the case, the two pupils are bound to resent the different punishments for the same misdemeanour—let us say, smoking in class—while the teacher will be put in the impossible position of applying different sanctions for the same offence. That is the reality of what the Secretary of State is offering the House, and right hon. and hon. Members should realise it.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Should I assume from what the hon. Gentleman has said that if a Labour Government were in power, he would say to the parents of Keith, "Caning will be abolished; you will have no say"? The hon. Gentleman must admit that at least the Bill gives parents a choice. How will he explain his attitude to parents who believe that caning is an appropriate punishment?

Mr. Radice: If parents believe in caning, they can administer it at home. The House knows that the Labour party is in favour of abolishing corporal punishment.

Once the European Court of Human Rights had made its decision, in practical terms there was no real alternative to abolition. Otherwise two classes of discipline would be created. That is the point that I have been trying to make. It is the overwhelming argument against the Bill, and the reason why hon. Members should vote against it.

The difficulties for schools do not end there. In primary and secondary schools, governors will have to write to parents and then compile a register of those who do not object in writing to corporal punishment. The procedure will be slightly different for nursery schools. I did not realise that teachers still hit three and four-year-old children. However, I am reminded by the Bill that that is a possibility. For nursery schools, local education authorities will have the responsibility of drawing up the register or, perhaps, getting rid of it—I am not sure what the Secretary of State has in mind. He appears to be offering Conservative Members in favour of corporal punishment the carrot that it might be possible to introduce more corporal punishment than currently exists. I think that that is basically dishonest because I do not believe that that will happen.

The Bill will create additional problems for schools and local education authorities. It is a farcical nonsense, and the Secretary of State, the Minister and Conservative Back Benchers are well aware of that. We are considering an absolute nonsense. It is arguable that the Bill does not even carry out the minimum requirements of the decision by the European Court of Human Rights in the Campbell and Cosans case—which is to ensure that parents who are opposed to corporal punishment have their wishes respected. If parents fail to dissent in writing, they will be assumed to be in favour of corporal punishment, whether or not that is the case.

Hon. Members should bear in mind a further point, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). He said that there are 30 cases currently before the court at Strasbourg of children having been beaten. It is possible that the court will rule that corporal punishment is not only against article 2 but against article 3 of the European Convention on Human rights, which states that no one shall be subject to "degrading treatment or punishment."

Mr. Cormack: I am somewhat comforted to know that the hon. Gentleman supports the convention so strongly. Can I therefore infer that he supports that part of it which gives parents the right to pay for their children's education?

Mr. Radice: I should like to look rather more carefully at that point. As far as I am aware, no case has arisen on that point in this country——

Mr. Cormack: Give a straight answer.

Mr. Radice: I am not prepared to give the hon. Gentleman a yes or no answer. My father paid for a privileged education for me. The important issue is what one does for one's children. I should like to know how many Conservative Members sent their children to comprehensive schools?

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: I did, for one.

Mr. Radice: Well, bully for the hon. Lady. I respect her more now.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: We chose the school because it was a jolly good school.

Mr. Radice: If the court rules that corporal punishment is against article 3, the Government will be forced—whether or not they like it—to ban corporal punishment. The tragedy is that the Secretary of State has not had the courage to take the only feasible and practical course, which is to abolish corporal punishment.

It is significant that there is a difference between the response of the Secretary of State for Education and Science and that of the Secretary of State for Scotland. I am not surprised that the Secretary of State for Scotland is not here today — [Interruption.] If the right hon. Gentleman's underlings would listen, I shall tell them why I am not surprised. On 10 July 1984, he told the House:

> "Compliance with the court's judgment . . . would be best secured by completion of the voluntary process of elimination of corporal punishment in education authority schools." — [Official Report, 10 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 448.]

Some hon. Members may conclude that the Secretary of State for Scotland is relying too much on voluntary persuasion, but he has not done too badly so far. As the House knows, the vast majority of Scottish education authorities have abolished corporal punishment. Hon. Members may wonder why the right hon. Gentleman has allowed Scottish schools to be included in the Bill and why there is not a separate Bill for Scotland, given the different circumstances about which the Secretary of State for Education and Science has been telling us. At least the Secretary of State for Scotland has understood quite clearly that the game is up. Accordingly, he has written to all Scottish education authorities urging them to abolish corporal punishment as soon as possible. That was the sensible thing to do. It would be a credible posture for the Secretary of State for Education and Science to take also; it is not credible to do what he is doing this afternoon.

Not for the first time, the Scots are taking a more progressive view than the English about education. Perhaps the Secretary of State should take a trip north of the border for a seminar on the subject. The truth is that he has ducked the issue and, instead, has brought this pathetic little Bill before us. It is an evasion of responsibility that exposes him to ridicule and derision — as we have seen already this afternoon. It has exposed our schools to an unworkable system of punishment.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have already asked the hon. Gentleman a question, which he said he would answer. He has not done so. He has constantly said that important decisions should be left to local authorities and school governing bodies. That is precisely what the Bill does. It may be that criticisms of the Bill are well founded, but why are the Opposition not allowing the school governing bodies—or, in some cases, local authorities—to decide this matter?

Mr. Radice: I have explained the reason quite carefully. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman was not listening. The decision of the Court of Human Rights has made it almost impossible—indeed, I would say wholly impossible—to continue with corporal punishment in our schools. By creating two classes of discipline, the Bill creates two classes of pupils. That will make discipline very difficult.

It would have been a legitimate position for the Government to have come to the House and said, as the Secretary of State for Scotland said, that the Court of Human Rights had reached a decision and that, therefore, local authorities should support the abolition of corporal punishment. The decision would still have been left to local authorities and school governing bodies, but at least the Government would have had a defensible position on discipline. Now, they do not have a defensible position at all.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Labour party's policy is to deprive school governors and education authorities of the power to manage schools for which they are responsible.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman had better talk to the Secretary of State for Scotland. He should try to present a logical argument. Of course, I know that he wants to defend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. We all like the right hon. Gentleman but he has introduced a "total nonsense Bill" ; I quote the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway). It is not surprising that the right hon. Gentleman has been exposed to ridicule and derision.

The Labour party is against corporal punishment in principle. It is barbaric, inhumane and degrading both to the chastiser and the chastised.

Mr. Cormack: Except on the picket line.

Mr. Radice: I know that the hon. Gentleman will be voting in the same Lobby as the Opposition tonight. I suppose that that might cause him to make cheap remarks. The Labour party is against corporal punishment in principle and also because it does not work. It is not a deterrent. It does not improve discipline. On the contrary, the evidence suggests that it can be counter-productive. The Secretary of State often quotes the Rutter study when dealing with other matters and he often quotes it at me. It suggests that there is a tendency for high levels of corporal punishment to be associated with rather worse behaviour.

I wish to reassure those who are worried and concerned that abolition had been implemented successfully in every European country apart from Britain. About 90 per cent. of Scottish schools do not practise corporal punishment. It is significant that of the 16 local education authorities which have abolished corporal punishment in England, none has reversed its position. When the Conservatives came to power in Waltham Forest they intelligently dropped their pledge to restore corporal punishment. That was a sensible thing to do.

During the debate on the Queen's Speech the hon. Member for Ealing, North asked me to provide feasible and workable alternatives to corporal punishment. As the evidence suggests that corporal punishment is counter-productive, it would be wrong to provide the options for which the hon. Gentleman asks. However he has been courageous enough to call the Bill a nonsense, and bully for him. The hon. Gentleman receives my accolade, as did the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman), who is now leaving the Chamber. I wish to reassure the hon. Gentleman, if he needs reassuring, that a high standard of behaviour is linked to a considerable extent with a firm, constructive and purposeful teaching which leads, as the Opposition's amendment suggests, to an atmosphere of co-operation in which good discipline can be maintained and education quality raised.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman rose——

Mr. Radice: No, I shall not give way.

Mrs. Kellet-Bowman: The hon. Gentleman said that I was leaving the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Lady must not persist if the hon. Gentleman who has the Floor is not giving way.

Mr. Radice rose——

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) referred to me and said that I was leaving the Chamber. I left the Chamber to get some extra paper but he is implying that I had lost interest in the debate. I asked him to allow me to intervene so that I could explain to him my reason for leaving the Chamber.

Mr. Radice: I fully accept the hon. Lady's explanation and now she has it on the record.

Mr. Cormack: Does the hon. Gentleman believe in corporal punishment now?

Mr. Radice: I was saying that good schools and good teachers have no trouble in maintaining discipline and providing an atmosphere and ethos that is conducive to learning. Of course problems and difficulties arise in the classroom but there are, as the Secretary of State said, a variety of options ranging from reprimands, reports, parental involvement, withdrawal, suspension to exclusion. These options are available to local education authorities and schools. It is incorrect to say that corporal punishment is essential in the maintenance of good discipline or that there are not other, more effective, sanctions available.

There are at least three major hurdles facing the Bill. First, there is Second Reading. I hope very much that Conservative Members will support the Opposition's amendment when the Division takes place.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Certainly not.

Mr. Radice: Secondly, there is the deliberation that the Bill will receive in Committee.

Mr. Cormack: Really.

Mr. Radice: Sometimes instruction has to be basic in this place, especially when Conservative Members are listening to me. I warn the Secretary of State that we shall try to amend the Bill to make it an abolition rather than an exemption Bill — [Interruption.] Would the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) like to intervene?

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I can never resist an opportunity to intervene. Surely the hon. Gentleman is telling us what we already know.

Mr. Flannery: What a clever boy.

Mr. Radice: Perhaps it would be a good thing for the hon. Member for Grantham to be a member of the Committee that considers the Bill. If he does become a member of it, we can try to build an alliance. I can assure him that it is quite fun being in Committee. If he does not know much about that, I hope that he will take the opportunity to increase his knowledge of such matters.

The final hurdle is the other place. I think that there is a good chance that the Bill will be defeated there or amended. I suspect that that is what Ministers are playing for. If the Bill is enacted in its existing form, I must advise all local authorities, especially Labour-controlled ones, to proceed as quickly as possible to abolition because, if chaos in our schools is to be avoided, abolition will be the only sensible response.

Of course, hon. Members will be well aware that there is a Machiavellian theory that the Secretary of State has produced an unworkable Bill because secretly he wants to abolish corporal punishment but does not dare say so. I am not sure whether he really knows his own mind on this issue. It is my view that in this instance, as with student grants, the right hon. Gentleman is out of touch with the real world.

Whatever are the motives of the Secretary of State, I am convinced that over the next five years, and whether we have a Labour or a Conservative Government, we shall abolish coporal punishment. Ironically, the main architect of abolition will be the Secretary of State, who is asking the House to give a Second Reading to an unfair and unworkable Bill. I urge all hon. Members who have regard for the good reputation of this place to vote for the Opposition's amendment.

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): Like many of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I deplore the Bill. However, I shall vote for its Second Reading this evening. I want therefore to take a moment or two of the time of the House to explain those two apparently irreconcilable statements. It is right that we should face the consequences of what we are doing. We are interfering with a power that has been vested in teachers for a long time by the common law of England to use reasonable force in the maintenance of discipline. It has been vested in them by common law because they were regarded as acting in loco parentis. My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) was right about that. At present parents do not have power to override that right, and we shall give them that power if the Bill is enacted. I shall vote for giving parents that power, but it is only right that we should face what we are doing.

The power of teachers to inflict corporal punishment is a right to use reasonable force in the maintaining of discipline. All this nonsense about barbarity and inhumane and degrading punishment is typical of the sort of argument that so overstates the case that it defeats its own ends. If a teacher did anything that came remotely within any of those descriptions, he would be as open to prosecution in the courts as if the power had never existed. All of us would support a parent who took a teacher to court in those circumstances. What we cannot stomach is the parent who takes to court a teacher who has used the mildest of force in the pursuit of discipline in circumstances that would try the patience of a saint. Let us forget all about barbarity, inhumane and degrading treatment and all that nonsense.

I hope that we shall not hear anyone say that we should not try to maintain discipline. Heaven knows, that mistake has been made often enough in our great country and has gone a long way towards undermining some of the virtues and values that we love so much.

The arguments of those who oppose the retention of the power to use reasonable force for the maintenance of discipline underestimate the position of the teacher. Have they ever tried to keep discipline in a class? If someone can keep discipline without using force, so be it; every parent tries to do that. However, it is arrogant to overlook the possibility that the teacher who has used reasonable force knew what was the best in the circumstances and what was best for the child involved and for the other children in the class. We must not forget the other children. Some unruly little brats stop a lot of other children getting the education that they deserve.

Another reason why I do not like the Bill is that it will cause administrative difficulties. However, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on meeting that problem head on and accepting it. The alternative was the abolition of corporal punishment. I caution my hon. Friends against making too much of the administrative difficulties argument.

It is not coincidental that those who oppose corporal punishment are seizing on the Bill and arguing that it cannot work and must lead to the abolition of corporal punishment. Those of us who wish parents to retain a choice should not fall into the trap of mulitplying the arguments of those who want to use the difficulties created by the Bill as an argument for getting rid of corporal punishment. I beg my hon. Friends to see that danger.

I do not believe that the administrative difficulties will be as great as some fear. I believe—and all the statistics show—that a substantial majority of parents favour the use of corporal punishment. If I am right, the number of parents who opt out may be comparatively small — probably a minority.

Secondly, I beg hon. Members not to be influenced by the argument that corporal punishment will necessarily cause terrible psychological problems for children. Children are a lot tougher than many of us give them credit for being. If I were a child, I should hate my parents to opt me out. The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) laughs, but he is not a very good example for the propositions that he has been putting forward.

If I were a child, I should not want to be opted out. First, I would not want to be thought a cissy. Secondly — I went to a school where corporal punishment was used within the limits of which I have spoken, and without causing any resentment — more often than not, one favoured the quick punishment rather than being shut up for an hour or two. There were far too many other things that one would rather be doing than being kept in detention. I much preferred to take the punishment and get it over with. As I said, I never felt any resentment and I never noticed resentment in any other boy. Let us not be too bothered about the effects in this area on children. It is far from certain that those who are still liable to corporal punishment will think that they are hard done by. I hope that parents will remember that it may be the other way round.

Yes, there will be administrative difficulties. I know a little about them because I was a Law Officer when the decision was made by the European Court and I had a part in the consideration of what should be done. However, I do not believe that the administrative difficulties will be nearly as great as some people fear. A bigger worry to me is that those difficulties may be built upon by those who wish to do away with corporal punishment.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: As my right hon. and learned Friend was involved after the decision of the European Court, can he advise us whether, if this does not work, we can go back to the court and ask permission to revert to normal?

Sir Ian Percival: Even as an old friend and colleague of my hon. Friend, I cannot advise him on that matter. It is a difficult question, and one for the present Law Officers rather than for me.

All my instincts are against what is proposed. I have tried to summarise the positive arguments, but so many of the arguments against it are so wet. There is talk about "hitting" a child of three. Has the hon. Member for Durham, North never heard of the word "smack"? Why try to make the issue emotive by talking about "hitting a child"? What is so awful about a little smack? A great swipe that knocks somebody flying is to be deplored, but emotive language unbalances the argument.

It may be felt to be unbelievable that the judgment of the European Court should have decided that corporal punishment can come within the scope of the provisions about "philosophical conviction". I thought that we all accepted that that phrase was a safeguard to prevent the indoctrination of our children with philosophical ideas with which we disagree. I applaud the British judge on the court for the clarity with which he saw the law and the independence and clarity with which he stated it in is dissenting judgment.

However, now that the court has concluded that if someone has a philosophical conviction that his child should not be subjected to corporal punishment, and there is no right of appeal, I should be interested to see whether it works the other way as well. Perhaps a parent who has a philosophical conviction that teachers ought to be able to use corporal punishment might care to take a case to the court one day. Those who say that we must give effect to the European judgment because it would allow the philosophical convictions of some parents to be met ought to realise that we ought not to go against the philosophical convictions of parents taking the other view who are just as entitled to their views.

Lastly, a Bill like this may in fact pose some danger to the cause of human rights. I suspect that every hon. Member in the Chamber, most of whom will be saying nasty things about the Bill, counts himself as a strong supporter of the cause of human rights. But I tremble sometimes for the way in which we are going. Many distinguished people in this country would make the whole European Convention on Human Rights part of our domestic law. What of that, when we see what has happened in this case about corporal punishment and philosophical convictions? There is a good deal in what my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) said a moment ago. When we have such judgments and have to act on them, many people ask why we have to go against our own philosophical convictions because foreigners tell us to do so. I do not agree with that attitude.

The Times once carried the headline:

"Fog in the Channel. Continent isolated."

We have come a long way since then. We must work with our European colleagues in this sphere, as in other spheres, if we are to further the objective, which we all share, of increasing human rights. However, there is a danger that if things go the way in which these things have gone, far from furthering the cause of human rights, we may actually put people against that cause.

Having said all that, why then shall I vote for this Bill? Because, as often happens in life, where one has few options one must take the least unattractive of them. It is not a mere matter of words for us to say that when we enter into international agreements, we must stand by them. Indeed, the decisions which it is most important we do implement are frequently those we do not like. We have no difficulty in implementing those we like. I recall the present Lord Chancellor saying that the only laws that matter are those we do not like. It is easy for us to obey those we like. We must also obey the ones we do not like.

So long as we remain a member of a convention of this type, we must implement the decisions of its court. I am glad that the Secretary of State is implementing them with the minimum of interference with the rights that we want to preserve. Parents who share my convictions and those of many of my hon. Friends will still be able to see that corporal punishment—where it is not prevented by the governors or local authority—reasonable force for the maintenance of discipline is available to those into whose care they have entrusted their children.

5.42 pm

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): This is a poor little Bill. My fear is that its opponents will be so disparate that there will be little happy conversation in our Lobby at the end of the debate. What we have had so far is akin to armed men attacking a jelly.

It might be right at the outset for me to make clear the position of my party. Liberal policy on education is to abolish corporal punishment, while recognising the need to support teachers more effectively in promoting good discipline. I share substantially the philosophy of the right hon. and learned Member for Southport (Sir I. Percival) on this subject, except that I do not believe that people take pleasure in seeing other people's children beaten when they themselves do not believe that that is right.

Sir Ian Percival: Nothing in the world that I said could suggest that anybody took pleasure in seeing anybody beaten, and I trust that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw that remark.

Mr. Freud: The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that there was a sort of justice in the imposition of corporal punishment.

Sir Ian Percival: I said nothing about anybody enjoying it.

Mr. Freud: If there is a sort of justice in it, and if one has a conviction that one does not want it for one's own child, I take the inference—and I am happy to withdraw it if the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not enjoy watching other people's children being beaten——

Sir Ian Percival: Really!

Mr. Freud: For hundreds of years it has been recognised that corporal punishment is not a satisfactory way of chastising children. In the 17th century a children's petition was presented to Parliament as a "modest remonstrance of that intolerable grievance."

In 1883 the Committee of the Privy Council on Education reported:

"the more thoroughly a teacher is qualified for his position by skill, character and personal influence, the less necessary it is for him to resort to corporal punishment."

Dr. Arnold said of corporal punishment:

"it is a defeat for the teacher and a counsel of despair."

I do not understand why we who are trying to distance ourselves from those arcane malpractices should now, when we have advanced in every other respect and when we no longer send children up chimneys or down pits, should pride ourselves on continuing corporal punishment.

A recent initiative to abolish corporal punishment came from the Plowden committee in 1967. It reported:

"The excessive use of punishment of any kind should be regarded as an acknowledgment of someone's failure."

Any punishment of a corporal nature is bad, because beating a child does not produce a better child but tends to produce a more bitter and truculent one. If I believed anything else, I would not be arguing as I am.

As the only country in Europe which retains a teacher's right to spank, hit or beat children, we are not badly advised to look again. I regret the type of Bill that this is, because I am an abolitionist. Athough the measure is designed with some intent and principle in mind, rarely can a Bill have come from the Secretary of State's Department so lacking in either of those respects, so limited in its purpose and so devoid of spine. Nor have we had many Bills which will be so incomprehensible to those whom it will affect and which will please so few people because, as hon. Members have shown, it goes too far or does not go far enough.

The Bill has no guiding principle behind it. There is no indication that the concept of discipline, self-discipline or punishment has been understood by the Department, that the right hon. Gentleman has an appreciation of the problems facing our schools and teachers or of the fact that many teachers will not punish, even if their local education authorities recommend them to do so, and that many unions are opposed to it.

Worse still, there is no analysis of the moral or educational basis of corporal punishment. On what grounds, for example, are we to be the only country in Europe to retain the sanction? Why is this measure being presented when there are over 30 outstanding cases awaiting judgment in the Commission, judgments which may render this piece of legislation outwith the convention? As the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) said, as we debate the Bill through its different stages we may be overtaken by events as the result of new judgments from the European Court of Human Rights.

To encourage the gradual introduction of other, more imaginative, forms of punishment in our schools is a sensible idea. I attended a school at which other boys were punished but, because the views of my family were known, I was not corporally punished. Instead, I was made to learn Le Morte D'Arthur and Chaucer's prologue, which I still know by heart.

Mr. Cormack: He must have been very bad.

Mr. Freud: There is nothing so bad about Chaucer's prologue.

Mr. Cormack: I meant that, as a boy, the hon. Gentleman must have been rather bad if he had time to learn it by heart.

Mr. Freud: I hope that the hon. Gentleman has an opportunity to make his own speech, when he can develop that, if he so wishes.

Why do the Government persist in seeing corporal punishment as a solution? What great virtue do they see in our spending our time discussing such a pathetic and potentially damaging little Bill? Although the Minister did not say so, one suspects that it is a crumb to help assuage the voracious appetites of his hon. Friends who gave him such a hard time when he had to explain his proposals on student grants, and who gave me a hard time because I was in the next Committee Room hoping for a well-attended meeting of the Friends of the British Council. Few turned up for my meeting, because they wanted to hear the Secretary of State. [Interruption.] A few came.

What will the Bill do for our schools? It will not do a lot. It will do even less for our school secretaries and administrators, because it will impose even more work on those overworked people. This will happen particularly in the small comprehensive schools, which are already facing increasing amounts of paper work. What is worse, the new work load will be such that teachers will never be sure whether the list is up to date or whether a mistake has been made. Teachers will feel considerable guilt if things go wrong.

What does the Bill do for parents whose rights, we are told, the legislation respects and who are trying to bring up their children with a sense of fairness and equity and to face the immense problem—to a child—of being "different"? Will parents need to explain that punishment and right and wrong have different meanings for different children? How will parents react to the ritualisation and bureaucratisation of punishment which the Bill will usher in?

How can the Secretary of State think that the Bill does anything to encourage greater responsibility by parents for their children's behaviour and more involvement in what happens in schools? If behavioural problems have as much origin in the home as in the school, relying on the simplistic answer of the cane seems naive.

Most importantly, what does the Bill do for the teacher? The teacher will now have to stop in the middle of administering a punishment and say to the child, "Hold on a minute while I check the punishment register. Stay there and do not do anything." The harassed teacher will then go to the school office and say, "Can I punish this child?

Are you sure it is this child, and not the child's brother? Are the parents separated? Do we have consent from both the father and the mother?"

To the teacher who asks, "What can I do when I am confronted by a violent 16-year-old?" I say that the Bill is no answer and that the child does not suddenly become violent. The cane is not the answer and, with respect, has never been the answer. The child will not be reformed by the imposition of institutionalised violence, nor will he be deterred, as all the evidence shows. We should be looking beyond the expression of his fears and frustrations. Those who support the Bill seem to think that there is a simple solution to these problems. I believe that it is time we thought again.

How will a teacher teach his children self-discipline or to understand what discipline means when he faces the scenario that I have mentioned? Surely the admittedly nebulous concepts of justice and equity are part of what we should include when we speak of educating our children.

In an intervention the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) asked the hon. Member for Durham, North whether, if he had such faith in the European Court of Human Rights, he would preserve the private sector. If I were asked that question, I would say that I believe in the retention of his private sector of education, but I believe that it should become truly independent. I do not believe that giving charitable status to a concept as uncharitable as Eton, Harrow or Winchester makes much sense.

Liberal Members reject the belief that caning is a solution to any problem in our schools. We reject the Bill, whose only point seems to be to meet a ruling of the European convention: this is laudable but misguided, in that there is nothing more—no reasoned defence and no attempt to make our schools better or to tackle the real problem of motivation and discipline. I hope the Minister will promise us that he will examine those education authorities which no longer impose corporal punishment and ascertain whether they have found an answer. I advise the House to follow the example of the Liberal party and to reject the Bill. As the hon. Member for Durham, North said, there are many hurdles to come—but none need come up. Kill off the Bill tonight.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I shall not follow the abolitionist path taken by the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud). I would like to send the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) to a comprehensive school for a couple of years so that they will really be at the "chalk face" and will know every aspect of this problem. They speak as though they have known comprehensive schools from the inside, but they have not.

I hope that I have not been too damaged by the accolade of the hon. Member for Durham, North, which went straight to my heart. The hon. Gentleman's points could be damaging to teachers, especially when he makes trite remarks about the need for teaching to be firm, constructive and purposeful. Tell that to the east end teachers struggling to control many children who are deprived and damaged in certain ways. The hon. Gentleman needs to go beyond such broad, sweeping statements and think of the extra problems faced by teachers.

Mr. Radice: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Greenway: With respect, I did not interrupt the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman did not dare.

Mr. Greenway: I have demolished the hon. Gentleman's arguments so many times in the House that I believe I should let him off today.

There are two separate discussions about punishment in schools. The Labour party and the National Union of Teachers hold one view. I notice that the hon. Member for Durham, North did not refer to the views of the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers, which believes that corporal punishment is a sensible form of punishment.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Gentleman should give way on that point.

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Member for Durham, North tried to give the impression that all the unions oppose corporal punishment.

Mr. Radice: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Greenway: I will not give way at the moment.

The hon. Member for Durham, North takes an idealistic line on corporal punishment and behaviour in general, as does the Society of Teachers Opposed to Physical Punishment and others who agree with him, including the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East. They say that all children are basically good and that punishment is therefore irrelevant and unnecessary. They say that it is wrong to use force to bend children to one's will. They believe that Rousseau was right when he said that children are basically self-motivated and self-motivated for good and that, if children are left to their own devices, all will be well.

The hon. Member for Durham, North should consider what the great Thomas Arnold of Rugby said:

"My object will be, if possible, to produce Christian men, for Christian boys I can scarcely hope to make."

That point should be borne in mind.

The other view on punishment in schools is held by the practical person—the schoolmaster. The hon. Member for Durham, North has conceded that I have been in comprehensive schools. I have been involved at the top of them for 23 years, so I have dealt with every disciplinary problem, and many more, in areas such as King's Cross and Lewisham.

Schoolmasters and all teachers need a practical approach. One cannot always be intellectual about the discipline one administers, but one must be intelligent about it. I would not say that no schoolmaster has never said that corporal punishment is a cure, but it is a deterrent. If sparingly, effectively and thoughtfully used, it can be a deterrent. I am not defending massive beatings by grown men of schoolchildren, but, carefully administered, the use of corporal punishment is sensible and right as a punishment for gross bullying, vandalism, and other misdemeanours.

Corporal punishment is sparingly used today. It is slowly going out of the punishment book, but it is still there. It is wrong to argue that it should suddenly be withdrawn by a sweep of the legislative pen. Corporal punishment has parental and teacher support. What is done in schools must have, if possible, parental and teacher support. That fundamental value must be considered in determining the use of corporal punishment. Children must always be given equal punishment. That punishment should be given when needed and should never be malicious.

What are the alternatives? What are we talking about? I will mention some alternatives that the hon. Member for Durham, North gave and some that he did not. There are sin bins, lines and extra maths. As I have said before in the House, what does it do for the teaching and learning of maths if a teacher says, "You will stay behind to do some maths tonight for your misbehaviour."? Punishment runs might be good. There is sarcasm. We have had a little of that in the House, and we all accept it. However, sarcasm destroys and damages a child's mind. That is much worse than a tap on the bottom or somewhere else. Do they advocate shouting or suspension? Expulsion has been advocated.

If the Labour and Liberal parties advocate suspension and expulsion as an alternative to corporal punishment, they should know that almost always those children who need to be in school for educational, social and other reasons are put outside by these, to their lifelong damage. Moderate corporal punishment is much better for those children.

What else do the hon. Gentleman and his Labour colleagues advocate? The juvenile court? The abolition of corporal punishment can bring the juvenile court much closer. Perhaps they advocate psychiatrists, but the psychology service is already overworked.

We must take account of the fact that most teachers are in favour of corporal punishment. My experience, which is long and well known to the House, is that some of the keenest abolitionists are the first to run to the head or deputy head's office and say, "That boy is out of hand. Will you give him the cane?" However, they do not advocate corporal punishment; they are against it, they always say.

I can give an example of a teacher who ran to me. No woman was keener on abolishing corporal punishment than that lady. She burst into my office one day at the end of school and said, "Two horrible boys have just let down the tyres of my car. Will you catch them and give them a good hiding?". I said, "Miss Jones, you have always been opposed to corporal punishment. What are we talking about?" She said, "I cannot have that. What is to be done about it?" That is what happens in some schools. The abolitionists do not accept what they advocate when they are challenged or upset. That is a telling indictment of them.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett rose——

Mr. Greenway: I shall not give way, because I think the hon. Gentleman will be replying to the debate.

The Bill is damaging because it permits unequal treatment in schools. I was pleased when my right hon. Friend said that in some areas there are schools side by side, one of which has corporal punishment and one of which is against it, which the parents know when they enter their child. It is in the school prospectus. That is the way that we should go. I hope that the Bill can be turned in that direction. I shall support the Bill because I shall seek to amend it.

I cannot agree with the hon. Member for Durham, North and the Liberal party because they are seeking to make the Bill an abolition Bill for the slight and flimsy reasons that they have given. The Bill must be amended. People inside and outside the House have pointed out instances that cause serious anxiety. It is wrong to damage the position of a teacher acting in loco parentis. I know that the Labour party wishes to take that away altogether.

To make teachers subject to civil actions because they have behaved as a parent might in certain circumstances, as the Bill does, is to damage the finest set of working people — the teaching profession — and to make life unnecessarily difficult for them.

The objections of the much-respected National Association of Head Teachers should be considered. It objects to the Bill and says that it creates an obligation upon schools to maintain a list of all pupils who can be subject to corporal punishment. The association feels that that is an unwarranted imposition. It argues that it would have been far better if the list merely recorded those people who were subject to parental exemption. I ask my hon. Friend to take up that point and respond to it when he replies. The association says:

> "We remain concerned that the heads and teachers will be at risk of civil action when a genuine mistake is made in the application of corporal punishment to an individual pupil who has been exempted."

Everyone can make mistakes. The Bill contains no let-out for the head or teacher who makes a mistake.

The association also says:

> "We strongly believe that only those heads and teachers who act in deliberate breach of parental wishes or who are guilty of recklessness or gross negligence, should be liable to civil action."

That would be much more reasonable than the Bill's position on that matter. I argue strongly in support of heads and teachers with whom I formerly worked and with whom I am in close contact in advancing their objections.

I am sorry to see that the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East is not in his place. He was on exceedingly thin ground when he said that we should emulate Sweden and abolish corporal punishment and not be the only country to retain it. Only a week or two ago on the radio he was arguing that we should not emulate Sweden on loans. I happen to agree with him about that, but he is trying to have the argument both ways. He should see the error of his argument.

I ask for the guidance of my hon. Friend when he replies on the subject of the hysterical pupil. The Bill does not mention, and nor did my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, the teacher who has to deal with a pupil who has become completely hysterical. In schools or anywhere else, traditionally one has had to give a good hard slap across the face or elsewhere. Sometimes that is the only possible thing to do to bring back reason. That point should be covered. It should be made clear that teachers and heads who do that are covered.

May we know how many weeks will have to elapse before parents who have not replied to an invitation to opt in and accept corporal punishment will be said to have done so? There are many parents who cannot read. They could not read a letter sent to them on that point. They may have to get someone else to read it for them. There are others who cannot write and who never respond to any letter. They are almost always the parents of children for whom punishment should be thought about carefully. I should like my hon. Friend to consider the position of such children and parents when he replies.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the hon. Member accept that any school that has the interests of such a child at heart will ask the parent to come to the school, when a decision will be taken as a result of discussions between the teacher and the parent? One of the objections to the Bill is that it does not do more to foster co-operation between the parent and the school, and to make it clear that parents have a responsibility for discipline.

Mr. Greenway: There are some parents who would never come to the school, even if one promised them £1,000 or a pint of beer. What the hon. Member for Denton and Redditch (Mr. Bennett) says sounds grand, but it is not entirely realistic.

My right hon. Friend made a valuable point when he said that we have to reaffirm our acceptance of the European Court of Human Rights, and its charter every five years. Presumably that gives us the right to renegotiate at that time on any point on which we have reservations and indeed to opt out altogether on such points. I hope that, as the European Court is making such nonsense of discipline in our schools, the Government will assure us that they will bear that point in mind when the next five-yearly negotiating time arrives.

How long will the established policy of the school have to last before it can be reversed? Once a school has established its policy under the legislation, will that policy have to last for a year, two years or five years, or could it be overturned at a week's or a day's notice?

How much notice will parents have to give of a change in their wishes for their child? That is another important point. Presumably they could not, within minutes of hearing that the child was to be given a smack, announce that, although they had formerly agreed to corporal punishment, they were now opposed to it.

I have no hesitation in voting for the Bill. Bad though it is — nonsensical though it is — I believe that it is amendable, and that the Opposition's policy is destructive or worse. In Sweden, children of five can take their parents to court for giving them a smack. That is the situation that the Labour party appears to advocate. We must avoid it at all costs.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I find it almost unbelievable that a group of reputedly intelligent human beings should be discussing such nonsense. The Bill is so backward as to be almost unbelievable. Those who are in favour of corporal punishment would be just as defeated by the passage of the Bill as those who, like me, are opposed to it. We are searching for convoluted methods of helping people off a hook on which they have impaled themselves. The situation is so silly that I defy anyone who has passed the infant school stage to believe what we are talking about.

If we examine what has been said repeatedly in the debate, we must assume the existence of some kind of British exceptionalism that we are arrogating to ourselves. Perhaps, like the prevention of terrorism legislation, the Bill should be renewed every six months. From what some people say, one might think that children were creating terror on a grand scale in our schools.

We all want discipline in school. Those of us who have taught know how necessary it is. I have been opposed to corporal punishment throughout a long teaching life. I can never understand how — witout saying it in so many words — we dare to accuse all the nations that have abolished corporal punishment of enduring utter chaos in their schools as a result, while, because we retain corporal punishment, we have wonderful discipline. That is nonsense.

The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), with whom I have worked as closely as two hon. Members on opposite sides can work, has fallen for that line. How can we possibly believe that, because of corporal punishment, we, out of the whole of Europe, have discipline in our schools, while all those poor, benighted souls in the Common Market — in which I do not believe — have schools that are in a state of chaos because of the lack of corporal punishment? It is an abuse of teachers in other countries——

Mr. Forth rose——

Mr. Flannery: I may give way later.

British exceptionalism in schools is arrant nonsense. It is akin to gunboat diplomacy.

Mr. Radice: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Flannery: I would not want the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) to feel abused. Perhaps my hon. Friend would wait a little.

As any experienced teacher knows, corporal punishment is born of sheer frustration. It eases the situation of a teacher who cannot teach any longer without caning a certain child. It is the last refuge of many good teachers; but it is the first refuge of the poor teacher.

Many years ago, when I was teaching a junior class——

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Flannery: With respect, I should like to tell my anecdote, which is absolutely true.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman rose——

Mr. Flannery: I hope that the hon. Lady will not interrupt me.

In those days, primary and secondary schools were not so neatly divided. There were junior boys and secondary boys in the school in which I was teaching, as happened in the state system. As hon. Members may remember, many teachers were needed after the war, so an emergency scheme was set up. People had only a year's training. Many of them were ex-service men. We needed them, even though they were inadequately trained. Many of them were far better teachers than they would otherwise have been, because they entered the profession after the war, after long experience of life, rather than being pushed into it by mummy.

One teacher at that school had been a lieutenant in the Navy. He was a very good person, but, as soon as there was any indiscipline, he felt that he must use the cane. Like me, he had taught primary and secondary school children. He took over a class of mine in which there were 46 nine-year-olds. I had found the class easy and friendly.

When the head asked me to move around the school and teach history and English to some of the bigger and smaller boys, the teacher to whom I have referred took over my class.

I still took the class for one or two lessons a week. On one such occasion, a little boy came and stood beside my desk and boasted, "Sir, I have been caned." I asked, "Have you, John? What had you done?" He told me about some peccadillo for which he had been caned. Another child came up with his book and said the same thing. I told him to go and sit down. I then said, "Hands up those boys who have been caned," and 46 boys put up their hands.

Caning goes on in more than 80 per cent. of our secondary schools. There is a caning every 19 seconds. It closes the channels of learning, makes it more difficult for the teacher to teach, and it has all sorts of bad effects.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Flannery: In a moment. Do not be impatient.

Most canings are contrary to law and take place in front of a full class. Often small and sensitive children are caned, and the caning makes it difficult to go on teaching them. The caning is not put into a punishment book, as it should be, and is not conducted before witnesses, except children. I fail to see how it helps teaching.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Flannery: I shall have to eventually. Very well.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that he gave his case away when he said that caning is the last refuge of a good teacher? That is precisely the argument that my right hon. and hon. Friends are using. It is a deterrent, and even good teachers need a deterrent.

Mr. Flannery: As usual, the hon. Lady is wong. Before I said that, I said that caning was born of frustration.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Look at Hansard.

Mr. Flannery: Perhaps the hon. Lady would stop interrupting me. She knows that I would never interrupt her.

Caning is born of frustration and has no impact, except a negative one. We are discussing a bizarre Bill which, like caning, is born of frustration. There is an air of panic about the Bill. Ministers have said, "The European Court of Human Rights has made a decision and we must react to it." The only real reaction is the abolition of corporal punishment, but the Tory party could not face that. It could not face abolishing one of its most cherished notions about children. The result is a half-way house which is unfair and utterly unworkable. Conservative Members will not have to implement the Bill. I wish that they would talk to the teachers who are expected to implement it. It is simply not true that teachers agree with the Bill. Even teachers who believe in corporal punishment disagree profoundly with it because they know that it is unworkable and unfair and will help nobody.

The Bill has been dreamt up by people who do not understand and have never faced the problem. They have merely a memory of what happened to them in their childhood. In many cases that was a long time ago. Teachers oppose the Bill because they know that they will not be able to implement it and that, therefore, matters will be worse.

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): The hon. Gentleman has been a teacher. Does he agree that some teachers believe that physical assaults on teaching staff by pupils are the very form of misdemeanour from which corporal punishment can safeguard them? Does he also agree that that is an important reason for keeping corporal punishment?

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman is completely wrong. Statistics prove that when corporal punishment is abolished, the incidence of assaults on teachers is reduced. There is gross indignity in one human being chastised by another, when it would be an assault outside the education system. Physically punishing people up to the age of 18 is bound to arouse passions. Schools which have relied to some extent on corporal punishment will be in most difficulty if the Bill becomes law. There will have to be discussions about how to deal with recalcitrant children.

The smaller the class, the less difficulty there is in teaching. The abolition of corporal punishment will be expensive. It means having better schools, more teachers and smaller classes. Anyone who has taught knows that there is a point at which a teacher becomes a child minder. We want classes that are small enough to enable teachers to have a one-to-one relationship with pupils and to let the pupils know that the teacher is deeply interested in their problems. Opposition Members are struggling towards that goal, as are many Conservative Members. We all know that the Bill is nonsense.

We are providing that people under the age of 18 in England and Wales can be beaten, although pupils over the age of 15 in Scotland can choose whether to be beaten. Are we really suggesting that a 17½-year-old boy or girl will walk up to a teacher and say, "I want to be beaten for what I do wrong."? That is claptrap. It is insulting for the House to be expected to vote on such rubbish. We have far better things to do. The Bill is the child of a bureaucratic mind and panic.

I am sorry that corporal punishment is so deeply ingrained in the Tory party as the best method of bringing up children. I have met ex-pupils, who were never caned in my schools, boasting about how they were caned. It made them feel manly. I have seen people standing at bars saying that caning never hurt or did them any harm. Others look at them quizzically and say to themselves, "Good God! Did it not? We all have our own opinions about that." It is all so manly being 21, starting to shave, boasting about being caned and slapping on the after-shave lotion. Caning has no part in teaching, but, unfortunately, some Conservative Members will go on with it until what is bound to occur occurs.

There is only one progressive element in the Bill. It opens the way to complete abolition, when it is proved that the Bill is unworkable and backward.

Most parents do not want their children to be caned. They do not want someone else doing what they do not do. We should not equate a little get-along slap on the leg of a child with standing over him with cane in hand. The older the child, the more terrible it is to stand over him with a cane. He may even take the cane from the teacher and snap it over his knees. That causes a great deal of trouble in secondary schools.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am sure that the words of the hon. Gentleman are widely read, so I should warn him that even a little "get-along" slap on the leg would count as corporal punishment.

Mr. Flannery: Conservative members have already used euphemisms that equate caning with the sort of little get-along that I have just mentioned. That is not the way to deal with the problem. No one is complaining about the tiny losses of temper, even though the right hon. Gentleman says that they are wrong and that one should beware of them. My point is that we cannot equate caning with a little slap of that nature.

Sir Keith Joseph: I should have completed my remarks. A slap that is given as part or as the whole of a punishment constitutes an offence under the Bill.

Mr. Flannery: I accept that. I reiterate that I am totally against slapping a child. My point is that Conservative Members are equating a slap with caning as though they were the same thing. I am against both. I want good teaching. That means not beating children, but opening the channels of learning by gaining their interest and respect without beatings.

The fact that private schools are not included in the measure shows that it is fatuous. I understand that in public schools they try to conceal the fact that children are there on public money. If a parent opts out and says that he does not want his child John caned, it will become clear that John comes from the state sector and has an assisted place on taxpayers' money. There will be a stigma attached, as there is with free meals. That is one of the tiny peccadillos of the Bill.

In its attempt to preserve the backward methods of discipline of the past, the Bill falls between two stools. By doing so, it could lessen and even cause the collapse of discipline in schools. If we had a free vote, the Bill would be rejected, because both sides of the House would oppose the middle way. Conservative Members should have sufficient courage to join us in throwing out a measure in which no one believes and which could deepen rather than solve the problems in our schools.

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): I always enjoy listening to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), and this evening I agreed with some of his points. Unfortunately, many of my right hon. and hon. Friends cannot support the Opposition amendment because of its wording, although our sympathies may be with some of the points that it raises.

I compliment my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his ministerial colleagues on all the good work that they have done since the Government took office. They have attempted to get to grips with the real problems of education in contemporary Britain. When I listened to the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) talking about the education policy of the Labour party, I thought back to the last Labour Secretary of State for Education, who now belongs to a different party. She ruined many good schools, allowed standards to decline drastically and ignored the literacy and curriculum problems of schools. Although I agree with Opposition Members who say that the Department should improve the curricula and discipline in schools, when the Labour party was in office quite the opposite occurred.

I am thankful that since 1979 the Government have been heavily involved in dealing with those real problems. Their record on teacher quality, raising pupils' levels of attainment, reviewing examination methods and encouraging greater parental involvement in schools lead us to look forward to future reforms which are in the pipeline. With such a good record, it is regrettable that the Government are obliged to introduce this Bill. It is a hindrance to the progress that they have made in many areas.

It is regrettable that Government time is being taken up by this so-called reform. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, it is not the Bill that he would have liked to introduce if he had had the choice. It cannot be denied that some measure to reform corporal punishment had to be introduced. Because of the decision of the European Court of Human Rights, the Government must make provision for respecting the philosophical convictions about corporal punishment of parents whose children are educated at public expense.

Conservative Members believe in abiding by the rule of law. The United Kingdom is a signatory to the European Convention on Human Rights and must, therefore, be bound by the rulings of the court, regrettable though they may be. To ignore its decisions would be to breach an undertaking in international law. Conservative Members could never suggest nor condone such a thing.

Having accepted that some measure of reform is necessary, and having acknowledged that the wishes of parents must be respected, one wonders what effect the Bill will have on discipline in schools, if it is left in its present form. I agree with the hon. Member for Hillsborough that that must be the criterion on which we judge the measure.

I am a former teacher, and I am only too aware of the difficulties which many teachers face in maintaining discipline. Education can be successful only in an atmosphere conducive to study. Such an atmosphere cannot exist where unruly children disrupt classes. Where corporal punishment is available as an ultimate punishment, discipline is generally maintained. Without it, unruly pupils may face a less painful punishment but a more damaging one.

Some of my Conservative colleagues have mentioned in interjections that an alternative may be to expel disruptive pupils, who then end up in a so-called sin bin. I regret that, because it means that a child's education may be further prejudiced. I accept that there are other acceptable methods of punishment and that corporal punishment is not widely used. It is rarely used, but it is a deterrent and an ultimate punishment.

Many people say that disruptive children deserve their fate if they go to a sin bin, but should a child's education be irreversibly harmed because of thoughtless childish behaviour which could be remedied by a few strokes of the cane or a smack, depending on the age of the child? I am not in favour of 17-year-olds being caned. It is not practical. However, it may be a deterrent and a punishment for younger children.

The decision of the European Court of Human Rights requires the Government only to make allowances for the philosophical convictions of parents about corporal punishment. The court did not say that the punishment was wrong. It did not decide that it was cruel or degrading, contrary to what Opposition Members have said.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: No Opposition Member suggested that the court said that in its judgment. We simply referred to the 20 cases that are pending, some of them under a different article, and the possibility that the Government might have to legislate again.

Mr. Evennett: I accept that the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman did not say that, but the hon. Member for Hillsborough suggested that it was cruel and degrading. However, I agree that the court did not say that——

Mr. Flannery: I did not say that the Court of Human Rights said that it was degrading. I said that I believed it was degrading.

Mr. Evennett: I accept that the court did not say that and that the hon. Gentleman did. It would appear that the Opposition are suggesting that the punishment is degrading.

The Bill seems to be leading us along the path of abolition, not by the will of the House, but because its provisions, if implemented, will cause serious problems to schools, and especially to teachers. They will have to abandon corporal punishment, and the result will be abolition by default. We cannot have it both ways. If we want greater professionalism from teachers, we must give them as much support as possible to carry out their duties. The Bill will not only fail to support them, but will undermine discipline, which is the essential foundation upon which teachers must rely.

Despite my right hon. Friend's interesting and informative speech, I am still a little confused about opting in and opting out. He suggested that letters will be sent to parents telling them that they have the option of putting their child on the register. It will be difficult, in schools where the majority of parents decide to opt their children out, to maintain a couple or half a dozen children on the corporal punishment list. That would be unfair to the parents and to the children. There is a large question mark against whether parents will write to the schools and say, "Yes, I want my child to be punished if necessary." The result may be that a minority of pupils at the school will be liable to corporal punishment. Many parents who saw that would then opt their children out, and corporal punishment in that institution would end.

The teachers unions, the press and nearly everyone has been against some aspects of the Bill. During the years in which I have been interested in education, no other education legislation has attracted so much criticism.

Parental choice has become a keynote of the Government's education policy. I hope that, having suggested to my right hon. Friend that parental choice could be restricted by the Bill, he will consider it slightly differently. We must conform with the court's ruling, but of the three options that my right hon. Friend mentioned in his speech, I wonder whether he would reconsider the option to designate schools and allow school governors and local authorities to determine whether a school should be subject to corporal punishment.

Recent legislation has forced schools to draw up lists of information about the subjects and facilities that they offer. When parents look for secondary schools to which to send their children, they have a choice—encouraged by the Government — depending on curriculum and opportunities available. The Bill might be better received if the Government allowed school governors and local education authorities to designate some schools as corporal punishment schools and to give parents the choice of sending their children to those schools.

Mr. David Lightbown (Staffordshire, South-East): Does my hon. Friend agree that if his proposal were enacted it would create problems for school transport? Immediately the two-mile limit for primary schools and the three-mile limit for secondary schools were breached, parents would demand, as a statutory right, that the local education authorities provided transport. That would be an expensive alternative.

Mr. Evennett: There are two sides to that argument. In urban areas, such as my constituency, it would not be a problem, because there are many schools in the area. However, in rural or outlying districts it could be a great problem. If we are dealing with a philosophical conviction — that the parent does not want his child to attend a school that has corporal punishment—the risk of a child having to travel a little further may be a consequence of his opting his child out of corporal punishment. It may involve additional expenditure, but if the Government believe in more choice for parents they should consider providing choice in this area.

Opposition Members mentioned the children who attend public schools, not because their parents pay the full fees, but because they receive a grant from the Government. As we believe in excellence in education, the opportunity for children of a certain background or from a certain area to attend schools, often of academic excellence, at public expense is greatly welcome. However, if those children come within the provisions of the Bill, schools may be less keen to take them. It will cause public schools more problems, because they will be able to maintain corporal punishment, unhindered by the Bill, for those who are not on the assisted places scheme.

I realise that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is in a difficult position, and we sympathise with him. He is obliged to introduce legislation to comply with the court's decision, and he believes the Bill to be the most practical way out of the difficulty. I understand his reservations about the alternatives, but the Bill in its present form will result in the abolition of corporal punishment by the back door. I agree completely with my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) that the Bill should be amended at a later stage.

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): If I, as a teacher, had received the Bill as a submission for A-level work, I should have been tempted to write on the report, "Your son has received an excellent education from us, but it is evident that he has been educated beyond his intelligence." It worries me that we have not talked much about the children. Children will accept many forms of discipline, provided that they believe it to be fair and just, and provided that pupils in the same class do not receive different punishment for the same offence. That is the basis not only of class discrimination but of legal discrimination.

What we should try to do in schools — I am not referring to social engineering, because I do not believe that it works — is to make each child feel when he leaves school that he will receive equal justice before the law. For children to be brought up in a society in which the rules and regulations discriminate against them creates no basis for turning them into responsible citizens of the future. When I was a teacher I did not use corporal punishment, not because the lads tended to be bigger than I was — although that would have been a reasonable enough excuse — but because in many of our city schools lads are brought up in violent areas. One very often faced lads with whom even the police could not deal.

My reason for not using corporal punishment was that its use meant that I should descend to the level that I condemned. If I had used the cane as a deterrent, I should have sown in the minds of those children the belief that might was right, that the guardian of the law was not the courts but the guy with the biggest fists and the most effective punch. That is the key argument for the abolition of corporal punishment. We are referring not to the occasional misdemeanour but to serious disruption. My experience was that if lads accepted corporal punishment they did not need it in the first place.

Already a distinction is made between the punishment that is right for girls and the punishment that is right for boys. A distinction is now to be made between the parents of those boys who write to the school and those who do not. The parents who write tend to be the more articulate parents, whereas the boys who very often need help but who get the bashing have parents who do not care. They are discriminated against at home and they are then discriminated against by the first kind of authority with which they come into contact. That is no way in which to build a one-nation society.

My condemnation of this Government's legislation is that it will create a two-nation society: the privileged and the under-privileged, the articulate and the inarticulate, those who have the resources to stand up for themselves and those who do not. That is no way in which to create a one-nation society. It will not be easy to create the kind of society that we want to create in schools. It will involve all kinds of additional resources. If the Minister wishes to create discipline in schools, by which I mean the creation of a working relationship, there must be smaller classes and more teachers and more books. However, the Minister is a wrecker. There are 1·4 million children in classes with over 30 pupils and 130,000 children in classes with over 35 pupils; 30,000 teachers have disappeared in the last four years and 20,000 teachers are due to disappear in the next two years. Again the Government are skimping on a pay claim by the teachers. The Government are creating dissatisfaction among both the pupils and the teachers whom they are there to serve and to defend.

Mr. Lightbown: Is it not a fact that every year since the early 1970s the pupil-teacher ratios in both primary and secondary schools have improved?

Mr. Young: No, not according to what needs to be done.

Who else will deal with glue sniffing? The parents, the police, the courts and this House cannot deal with it. This is another among the many jobs that have to be done by teachers and social workers. Ours is the only society that seems not to recognise that the real potential of this country rests upon the education of our young people, both at school, in industry, and in our universities. Every cut slashes at the very seedcorn upon which this country depends if it is to compete with our competitors abroad. Unless we create in our schools, because the classroom is the doorway to society, the belief that children will receive fair treatment—everybody cannot be equal but equality of treatment can be expected—and that they will not be divided from the age of five into two societies, we shall have failed in our duty to those upon whom the future of this nation rests.

I am very sad that in legislation such as this we are pandering to the maintenance of prejudice. If children do not behave in grammar schools, they can be told to go elsewhere. Where, however, does the kid from the comprehensive go? Nobody can solve that problem. There has been a great deal of discussion about handing this question over to governors. I suppose that when we next debate capital punishment we shall ask somebody else to deal with it. One of the jobs of this House is to create a better educational environment for our kids. I hope that hon. Members will support the Opposition amendment and ensure that corporal punishment is abolished. At the end of tonight's debate I, as a constituency Member of Parliament, shall be writing to my local authority asking it to make a decision that will not divide one child in a class from his neighbour in Bolton at least.

Mr. Warren Hawksley (The Wrekin): I do not intend to follow the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Mr. Young) down the abolitionist road.

I am glad that the debate is taking place this week. If it had taken place last week it would have been much shorter, had the powers that be had their way. It is crucial that we should have a long and full discussion on Second Reading of what I believe to be a very important Bill.

In March 1982 I tried to raise the question of corporal punishment for young offenders by putting down a new clause to the Criminal Justice Bill. I initiated a debate that continued in Committee for 6½ hours. The was no filibustering. It demonstrated the importance of the subject to the Committee, although one appreciates that the context was different. However, it is interesting to note that many of the arguments that are being put forward today, particularly those relating to the European Court of Human Rights, were raised then as reasons why it was not possible to consider the reintroduction of corporal punishment for young offenders.

This Bill is not concerned with whether we should allow corporal punishment. Most people think, as do I, that it may be the beginning of the end. I regret that, although I appreciate that some Labour Members hope that that will be so.

When I advocated corporal punishment for young offenders in 1982, I said that those of us who had had corporal punishment at school were none the worse for it. When the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) was being questioned about his education, I was tempted to ask whether he had ever experienced corporal punishment. If he had answered that in the affirmative, I would have gone on to ask whether he thought it did him any harm. I do not believe that it does anybody any harm to be caned to a reasonable degree. I admit that we are talking of a sparing use of the cane, not of brutal attacks by teachers which would be open to action in the criminal courts.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the hon. Gentleman feel that it does any good at all when, on occasions, pupils tell teachers who have administered corporal punishment that it did not hurt and go off to glory, first, in that fact in front of other pupils and, secondly, in the fact that they could make such a remark to a teacher?

Mr. Hawksley: I am sure that I always said that corporal punishment did not hurt when I was at school, but I have a funny feeling that it acted as a deterrent. I was slightly more careful next time about committing that offence. It is a deterrent. I appreciate that people may claim that corporal punishment does not hurt and may try to glory in it, but in their heart of hearts they must feel that it is a deterrent. It is a sanction which teachers should use sparingly, but which I believe strongly should be available to them to use as they think fit.

Is the Bill before us today because the Government disagree with corporal punishment? The answer must be no. It comes about only because the European Court of Human Rights said so in the February 1982 judgment in the case of Campbell and Cosans. We should look at the judgments of the European court. Let us spread the net a little wider. Let us consider not just that case, but the case involving corporal punishment in the Isle of Man—the Tyrer case. In both those cases the British judge dissented from the judgment which went against the British interest.

It is also interesting to note that Lord Scarman, in a judgment in another place in 1980, stressed the importance of the rule of Parliament here at Westminster. He said:

"This House's decision, even though the European Court has held the rule it declares to be an infringement of the Convention, is the law. Our courts must continue to look, not to the European Court's decision but to the House of Lords' decision."

Is it in our interest that we should blindly follow a court whose judgments have nothing to do with Britain's legal system and are not even arrived at by our judges? I should say no.

Rather than push the Bill to a vote tonight, the Government should have decided to withdraw from the European Convention on Human Rights. When that convention was ratified in 1951, we retained the right to decide that it was not for Britain. In view of the judgments that are coming forward, we should reconsider the situation. That, I hasten to add, has nothing to do with our membership of and responsibilities to the EEC. It concerns, purely and simply, the ratification by the Government in 1951.

I hope that we shall consider whether we want our law to be made in this Chamber and to be enforced by British judges.

Sir Keith Joseph: I ask my hon. Friend to bear in mind that many hon. Members had reason to welcome at least one, if not more, of the judgments of that court from which he wants us to withdraw.

Mr. Hawksley: I think that I know what judgment my right hon. Friend is thinking about, but, on balance, the argument that we should be ruled in such matters by a court in which the British judge dissented from the judgment does not appeal to me.

The right for teachers on the continent to be regarded as acting in loco parentis is not common. Although my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State says that we are dealing here with a small and fine point, that whole relationship will be endangered by the fact that we are prepared to go on accepting the edicts of the European Court. If that is continental practice, I fear that that will be inflicted on us. That is wrong.

Decisions on the system that we want in our schools and the relationship between teachers and the children that they are looking after should and must be made by the House and the other place.

I shall have no option but to vote against the Labour party's amendment, which would abolish corporal punishment and therefore cannot possibly have my support; but I shall also be unable to support the Government when we vote on this important issue tonight.

My support for corporal punishment as a sanction, and my dislike of the Europeans telling us what to do in our own country, is joined in my mind by a belief—some Opposition Members may agree with me here—that the Government's proposal to create the sheep and the goats — those children who can be caned and those who cannot—is probably the worst of both worlds.

The teachers are right to say that the abolition of the cane will lead to problems and that increased expenditure will be necessary. That point was mentioned by the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East. To a certain extent, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State skirted round that point in his opening speech, but he accepted that some slight expenditure would be necessary. At this time, when education is having to play its part in helping the economy to get back on its feet, can we possibly accept any extra expenditure on an item such as this?

There are some practical problems. I can imagine a situation where, a crime having been committed that deserves to be punished by the cane, the headmaster finds that of the two children involved one can be caned and the other cannot. If it is the ringleader who cannot be caned, is it fair that the minor party should be caned? It is not.

What safeguards are there against a 15-year-old with a single parent intimidating his mother when she has to decide whether he should be exempt from punishment? When detention slips have to be returned, one sometimes hears of children forging them. What safeguards have we to prevent these forms being returned with forged signatures? Those are practical problems which must be dealt with in Committee.

I hope that the views of the National Association of Head Teachers on retaining a list of pupils who are subject to parental exemption will be considered in Committee. What punishment will be offered as an alternative? We have heard suggestions from both sides of the House. I am slightly nervous that, at a later date, some of those may be ruled out of order by the European Court if we remain a signatory to the convention.

Some people may have read in The Times today of the 16-year-old boy from Wirral who was suspended from school because he would not be caned and whose lawyers are claiming £17,000 in compensation for him. Will that be the first of many cases? If so, it causes me great concern. I hope that, when he replies, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will deal with the future of the European Court and how those further decisions will be arrived at. According to The Times, it is unlikely that that case will be heard by the judges. It is expected that it will end in a friendly settlement. If that is the case, will taxpayers' money be used to support the parents of that child who is making the complaint?

Even at this late stage I hope that Ministers will think again and withdraw the Bill, go back to the Cabinet and ask it to agree to our withdrawal from the European convention. It is important that we retain for Britain the right to make our own decisions about how we maintain law and order.

7.10 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I find it odd that I am the sole hon. Member representing a Scottish constituency to seek to contribute to a debate that intends to amend the law of Scotland. It is odd that a proposition of this kind should not arouse the interest of either Front Bench. However, when I contemplate the reason for it a little more closely, it becomes clear that there is a certain underlying and unspoken justification for there being less interest in this debate among my Scottish colleagues than among right hon. and hon. Members representing constituencies south of the border.

When the judgment in the Scottish case of Campbell and Cosans was handed down by the European Court of Human Rights, it was recognised in Scotland that it was giving the red light to corporal punishment. Although I am not one of the greatest admirers of the Secretary of State for Scotland and have little admiration for his political courage, on this issue at least he showed the kind of leadership that ought to have been demonstrated by the Secretary of State for Education and Science. He showed a willingness to recognise that, notwithstanding the existence of a strong body of opinion in Scotland that favoured the continuance of corporal punishment—an opinion privately shared by many teachers even though many representative bodies in education were not prepared to say so publicly—he should advise local authorities to proceed with the abolition of corporal punishment. They are in the process of doing that.

The Bill seeks to change the law in Scotland and to introduce a number of bizarre anomalies. For example, a young person over the age of 16 in Scotland who is to be subjected to corporal punishment must himself say whether he wishes to receive it. In Scotland, the Bill in a sense will be a dead letter. I do not think that local education authorities will continue to accept that corporal punishment should have any place in the Scottish education system. That is a recognition of the practical difficulty of any other conclusion, in the light of the Campbell and Cosans case.

It is odd that the Secretary of State for Education and Science has not been able to resolve this difficulty south of the border in the same way that his Cabinet colleague did north of the border, and I do not find what the right hon. Gentleman said about our differences of position particularly compelling. He did not specify those differences—differences of degree or of popular opinion—on the subject north and south of the border. He did not demonstrate that there was any greater use of corporal punishment south of the border than north before the Campbell and Cosans case.

I think that the explanation lies in the natures of the two Secretaries of State. The Secretary of State for Education and Science seeks to defer to the atavistic instincts of those of his colleagues and those members of the Conservative party who wish to resist the abolition of corporal punishment at any cost. But he is signalling to his colleagues behind him that he regards this Bill as a tiresome necessity and not as a measure which he has any great pleasure in presenting to the House. He is seeking to have it both ways.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Gentleman try to be more consistent? Not too long ago, people applauded the reaction of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to what his Back Benchers were saying about student grants. Is it not consistent for my right hon. Friend to be rightly concerned about and sympathetic to what his Back Benchers may be saying in today's debate?

Mr. Maclennan: If the right hon. Gentleman tried to follow the opinions of his Back Benchers on this issue he would be in dire difficulty. A range of opinions has been expressed which is so confusing that it cannot have given him any guidance. In those circumstances, he would have been wiser to rely upon his own judgment and not to twist like a weather vane, blown by the winds of the opinions behind him.

Mr. David Young: That is what we are here for.

Mr. Maclennan: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that the views of his colleague, the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley), bear the slightest resemblance to those of the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) or those of the former Solicitor-General and of any other Government supporter who has spoken, he has been only half listening to the debate.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science would be wise to consider what has happened in Scotland since the Secretary of State for Scotland issued his advice to local education authorities, because he should recognise that there is now no significant body of opinion in favour of the reintroduction or retention of corporal punishment and that the debate in Scotland is no longer about corporal punishment in schools so much as what is to be done to maintain discipline in difficult schools in the absence of corporal punishment. That is a pressing and much-needed debate.

It is important to consider whether teachers in areas of stress and deprivation whose pupils are unruly, unmotivated and capable of disrupting classes have adequate means of instilling discipline and the circumstances which enable the education of those who wish to have it and those who would be better for it if it were to proceed.

Not enough thought has been given to the other available options. I had hoped to hear about them from the Secretary of State. It is clear that the majority of local authorities in England, as in Scotland, will recognise that the Bill is wholly unworkable and wholly inequitable. Their political complexion will not matter. They will proceed step by step inexorably down the road to abolition.

Today's debate would have been altogether more constructive if the Secretary of State had addressed himself to the circumstances that are to follow abolition. Instead, he buried his head in the sand and tried to split the difference between himself and those other hon. Members who have a more realistic appraisal of what goes on in the classroom.

I want to comment on what the hon. Member for The Wrekin said about the European Convention on Human Rights and the authority of the European Court. I have some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's point of view that it is not wholly satisfactory for Parliament to legislate to bring the United Kingdom into conformity with judgments reached in Strasbourg, especially when there is so much reluctance on the part of the Government even to commend the terms of the Bill.

The route around that difficulty would be the hon. Gentleman's acceptance—as many of his hon. Friends have accepted—of the overwhelming case to incorporate the European Convention on Human Rights into our domestic law. I introduced a Bill for that purpose during the last Session of Parliament, and enjoyed the support of a considerable number of Conservative Members. I think that 137 hon. Members, many of them Conservative, supported that principle in an early-day motion.

The hon. Gentleman is wrong to think that the principles of the convention are in any sense exotic or unsuited to this country. The convention was drafted by Englishmen in 1950 and was the product of the work of the late Lord Kilmuir, a distinguished Conservative Lord Chancellor who, at that time, was the chairman and rapporteur of the legal affairs committee of the Council of Europe on the subject of the protection of human rights. The convention was essentially a conservative measure, drawn up by lawyers well versed in the common law system and its practice. They knew what needed to be done to strengthen the protection of human rights — not abstractly in Europe as a whole, but in all the member countries of the Council of Europe.

Mr. Forth: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the United Kingdom entered a reservation against the protocol on which this whole case is based, and that that must cast some doubt on the suggestion that, even in the 1950s, the United Kingdom gave any credence to the sort of thing that has been brought before us today?

Mr. Maclennan: The protocols have been brought forward at different times, and different Governments have given assent on behalf of the British people. No doubt further protocols will be considered by the Government. Some protocols remain unratified by the Government.

There is a further respect in which the Bill is defective, which is that the issue should have been faced once and for all. It is highly unsatisfactory that this country should be dragged before the European Court of Human Rights time and again on the issue of corporal punishment—or, indeed, on any of the issues that have arisen from our alleged infractions of the convention to which we are a signatory.

In reply to my intervention earlier, the Secretary of State acknowledged that a number of cases are pending under article 3 of the convention—not under article 2 of the protocol—which may lead, in certain cases, to it being held that the corporal punishment was inhuman or degrading——

Mr. Forth: Nonsense.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman may say that, but he is not following the argument. Under the convention, it is possible that the infliction of corporal punishment in a school may be held to be inhuman and degrading. That fact was brought out not only in the Tyrer case but in the judgment on the Campbell and Cosans case. The court said:

"it follows from that judgment"—

the Tyrer case—

"that 'treatment' itself will not be 'degrading' unless the person concerned has undergone—either in the eyes of others or in his own eyes . . . humiliation or debasement attaining a minimum level of severity. That level has to be assessed with regard to the circumstance of the case."

It is quite clear that defining, in one case, that the infliction of corporal punishment is not inhuman or degrading does not end the right of another individual to take his case to the court. It is absolutely insufferable that case after case of corporal punishment should be brought before the court with the issue being decided judicially and over a protracted period. The Government must face the issue — it is time to bring an end to that form of punishment.

It is surely reasonable to study the experience not only of Scotland but of other European countries—on other occasions, the Government are quite ready to say, "We are culturally and socially close to them" — that have abolished corporal punishment in schools.

If, by some mischance, the Bill is given a Second Reading—and the SDP will vote against it—it will need to be amended if it is not to lead to the most gross of inequities and the most shocking administrative difficulties for those who have to give effect to it. I cannot envisage how the Bill can be amended to make sense. Nothing that has been said tonight by any hon. Member who has supported the principle of the Bill and has wanted to follow the Secretary of State's road has altered my view on that. They have raised questions to which there are already answers. We look forward with great interest to seeing how the difficulties mentioned by Conservative Members will be taken into account. We are highly sceptical about the Bill and oppose it in principle.

Sir. Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): To cane or not to cane, that is the question—or is it? The Prime Minister is constantly saying that she does not want anything to be fudged. This issue is something which she will have to accept is being fudged—even though she is a previous Secretary of State for Education and Science. If ever there was a Bill that fudged anything, this is it.

When I was at school, if I had been told that in 50 years I would be in the House of Commons with an opportunity to do away with caning, I would have been delighted. I would have told my chums that it could not be true, but that if it did happen it would be worth waiting for.

This is about the daftest Bill that the House has been asked to pass. It has been imposed upon us by the European Court of Human Rights. I hope that the court realises the ridiculous position in which it is putting the Secretary of State. During the 25 years that I have been in the House I have voted on a number of daft issues produced by Governments, so I am realistic enough to say that I shall vote in favour of the Bill, in the hope that when it comes out of Committee it will be improved in some way. I keep my votes and abstentions against the Treasury Bench for those occasions, which will certainly occur during this Session, and perhaps in Sessions yet to come, when the Government are being daft in what they themselves are proposing. At the moment the Government are stuck with the Bill, so we are stuck with it and have to live with it: thanks to the European Court judgement.

When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State introduced the Bill, he said that if he had had a choice of Bill to introduce he would not have picked this one. However, his name is at the top of the Bill, I regret to say, so he must put it through the House.

[Sir. Kenneth Lewis]

A number of ex-teachers have contributed to the debate. There are many more ex-teachers in the House than when I first entered it and some will say that that is splendid. At times the place seems full of ex-researchers, ex-teachers, ex-university lecturers and others of that ilk. That can be said of Members on both sides of the House. I would merely urge that teachers should not be allowed to sway us too far when they express their views on education, let alone on corporal punishment.

I happen to believe that there is much merit in allowing a headmaster to use the cane on occasions when he thinks that it is proper to do so and when he has been advised by his teachers that it should be done to keep order. The procedure was quite different when I was at school. In those days, the teachers in the classrooms used the cane. They used it pretty rapidly, pretty heavily and pretty often. That has long since changed. As I understand it, there has to be a register in a school if caning is to take place, and the headmaster is usually the person who is responsible for administering corporal punishment. I believe that that is right and that some parents would prefer that system to continue. I accept that practice varies from area to area and from school to school.

When I read the Bill for the first time, my immediate reaction was to ask myself why the matter should not be decided by parent-teacher organisations and governors. Why should there not be a democratic vote? My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is in favour of involving parents on all education issues, and I see no reason why parents should not also be involved here.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am sure my hon. Friend recognises that governors of any school have the power to prevent corporal punishment being administered, by not providing a register. That is the way in which governors can exercise their jurisdiction and come to a final decision.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: As I have said, my immediate reaction was to ask why parents should not be allowed to vote on whether a school be one where corporal punishment is allowed. However, I am told that that would not be in keeping with the terms of the European Court judgment. That being so, I presume that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State does not have the option to consult parents as a group. I hope that this matter will be thrashed out in Committee—not necessarily by me—so that we may become aware of the realities.

Many difficulties are bound to be seen as likely to arise. The House will understand that this is an opting-out Bill. Let us suppose that a parent decides on behalf of little Johnny to opt out of the use of the cane for the boy at school and that little Johnny is doubtful about being opted out and cannot convince his mum that she should opt him in. The result will be that he is opted out. Let us suppose also that then his great friend at school, Jimmy, has been opted in by his mum. That means that he will be subject to receiving the cane. It is thus probable that little Jimmy will become the hero of the class. Little Johnny may well then tell his mother that he also wants the right to be caned if he does something naughty. He will have his eye on his friend who has become a hero, and he will want the same status. That is quite likely to happen among boys at school. So it is a difficulty that will arise because of the Bill.

If a parent decides to allow his child or children to be caned during one term, will he be able to take the opposite view during the following term?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, there will be scope for parental changes of mind. A certain number of days would have to be allowed for the change of mind to be duly established on the register or removed from the register.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: That makes the position even more difficult and confusing. There may well be a class meeting at which it is decided that all the children want to change their minds except for one or two. The pupils will then return to their parents and say, "Next year, mum, you must opt us all in for caning." The Opposition are assuming that this measure will become a non-caning Bill. I feel that it might lead eventually to the abolition of caning, but, equally, it might have the reverse effect. We do not know. Parents will be able to change their minds, and so will children, and children may press upon their parents that they should exercise their authority by agreeing with what they, the children, want.

There has been talk of public schools. An important parent suggested recently that it was a sad state of affairs that if a parent wanted his child to be subject to corporal punishment and reasonable correction he had to put his hand in his pocket and pay for his child's education. That is no longer true. More than half of our public schools have opted out of caning. Many of the top public schools no longer use the cane. They have almost totally done away with the system of canings by prefects, and a great many have also taken away the right of masters to cane. Almost all the modern headmasters who are appointed to lead public schools are non-caners.

I still believe that there is some merit in a headmaster having the right to administer corporal punishment in certain situations, but it might be thought that with so many opting out of caning it is no longer possible to have a division between schools which are in favour of corporal punishment and those which are not. There is also a division between parents. It would seem that the majority of parents are against the idea of corporal punishment, so it is clear that the Bill is the thin end of the wedge and that we may be moving to a general system of education that accepts that caning is out.

In my school days there used to be a sick-note system. If Johnny was given a sick note by his parent, he would be absolved from punishment while that note was in force, and sometimes a note had effect for a long time. Now, in this Bill we have to have a letter. I shall tell a story about a famous headmaster who is now a well-known Member of this place. He is well known to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, because he was Minister of State, Department of Education and Science until a few months ago. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson) was a famous and effective headmaster before becoming an hon. Member. I have his permission to tell the story of what happened when there was trouble at one of the schools at which he was headmaster. Trouble was one of the things up with which he would not put.

Headmaster Boyson found out that the trouble was being caused by one of three boys. He kept on at them, investigated the matter, plagued the life out of them and would not let up. Although he thought that one particular boy was responsible for the trouble, he was still not sure. Eventually one young chap walked into his office and voluntarily admitted responsibility. Headmaster Boyson said, "You know that means that you have got to take your punishment—six of the best."

It seemed to headmaster Boyson that that was the end of the matter. However, a week later he discovered that he had punished the wrong fellow. Being a fair headmaster, he asked the boy to come to his study and said, "I am sorry about that, but why did you admit responsibility?" The boy said, "You were plaguing the life out of us. We could not get rid of you, so I thought that I would admit responsibility and then it would all be over."

Fair-minded headmaster Boyson then said, "We cannot leave it at that. We must do something about it." The boy replied that he did not know what could now be done about it. But headmaster Boyson did. He wrote out a note on a piece of paper on his desk and said to the boy, "There you are—a credit note for six of the best." The boy carried that credit note through the next two years he spent at the school.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is giving a wide range of caning credit notes in this Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North is the first hon. Member ever to have an incident at his school enshrined in legislation.

The Bill became inevitable after the decision of the European Court. I wish those who examine it in Committee the best of luck. I do not know how it will come out of Committee, and still less how it will come out of another place. It will be fascinating to read the report of the debate there. Indeed, I hope that they are still on the television at the time of that debate so that we can watch another place debating whether to cane or not to cane.

We could do without the Bill, but the Government had to introduce it and, because that is not their fault, I shall vote for the Bill.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): I have never heard a Secretary of State present such an unconvincing case for a Bill. The right hon. Gentleman made it clear that the Bill was being introduced only because the Government had to comply with the European Convention on Human Rights.

The House ought to tell the Secretary of State to take the Bill back, have a fresh look at it and change the Government's thinking. Conservatives have traditionally been hangers and floggers, and they are dissatisfied with the Bill because they have always supported the physical violence attached to education. There are one or two exceptions who do not support physical violence in schools, but that is not the traditional attitude of Conservatives, and the titters of some Tory Members have been noticeable throughout the debate. One Conservative Member made the crazy suggestion that schools should be designated as beating or non-beating schools. I do not see how any sensible education authority could adopt such a policy.

The Opposition say that the Bill is unworkable. Even a Conservative Member said that it was a muddled Bill which resulted from muddled thinking. I go further and say that it is a loony Bill. I predict that soon after it becomes an act it will have to come back to the House for amendment, because it will be seen to be so nonsensical that something will have to be done.

Conservatives have always supported physical punishment in education. A leading Conservative politician said that that attitude was the result of the public school and Royal Navy tradition in his party. He said that rum, sodomy and the lash were part of that tradition.

Mr. Freud: Not at the same time.

Mr. Eastham: No, not at the same time. The House knows what I mean.

The boarding schools are noted for brutality, and homosexuality is common in those establishments because of the abnormal non-family life that the unfortunate children experience during their education.

Manchester city council advises me that there is no physical punishment given in its primary or special schools and that it is rapidly dying out in secondary schools. One of the largest authorities in the country is attempting to revolutionise thinking and to concentrate more on education, which is what it is all about.

I have always contended that teachers are not policemen. Their job is to teach, and the other side of the business should come from the parents. The parents' example is usually reflected in the children. Those from good homes usually do not need the physical violence that some parents demand that their children should receive. A councillor on Manchester's education committee once told me that West Indian parents used to say to him, "You should beat my child." I do not know what that attitude has to do with education, but it seems to be the mentality of some people.

A friend of mine used to be the headmaster of one of the largest comprehensive schools in Manchester. He was a little Welshman, about 5 ft 3 ins tall, and he did not permit physical punishment in his school. Any new teacher was made clearly to understand that corporal punishment would not be tolerated. The discipline in that school was a good as, if not better than, discipline in most other schools in the city.

When I was a member of the local education committee, we received reports from various high schools, and we always noted that one of the most difficult schools in the city was one where corporal punishment was known to be meted out regularly. We resolved that once the headmaster of that school retired, we would make some changes and remove some of the violence that was taking place there.

I wrote to my Welsh friend, the little headmaster, for a considerable time, and I remember that in one letter he stated a profound truism. In effect he said, "On the day when children in any secondary school walk into the playground and tell the staff, 'We have had enough of this violence,' that is the end of physical punishment in that school." In other words, once a group of children decide that they will take corporal punishment no longer, no headmaster is able to permit physical punishment to be inflicted.

A few teachers get some sadistic satisfaction out of the corporal punishment of children. I recall a primary school where an elderly spinster teacher was known to be a most sadistic person. Even today I think of her with fear and trepidation. She instilled in her pupils not good education: only fear. Unfortunately it is not uncommon in schools for there to be the odd teacher with a violent reputation. The sooner we can put and end to such violence, the better.

I was worried some years ago by reports of what was occurring in some special boarding schools. I chaired meetings at which I had to discipline male teachers over some of the thuggery—I must call it that—that they were inflicting on children in special boarding schools. Let us not forget that for those children, being in special schools, the situation was worse because the school was their home. They were at the mercy of their teachers. They were not able to go home and complain to their parents. I agree that it is rare to come across such violent teachers, but it went on in those days, when I was concerned with education committees. For that reason, I welcome the day when it will be illegal for corporal punishment to be inflicted on children.

Parents must accept that they, too, have a responsibility for their children in school. That particularly applies to parents who object to corporal punishment. It is not good enough for them to say that discipline is the job of the teacher. Many of our problems are caused by failure not in school but at home.

Flogging does not do anything to improve children's education. Youngsters do not learn by being afraid. Better discipline can come in a variety of ways, including better staffing, the provision of equipment, and so on. Smaller classes are vital. Imagine the problems facing a teacher trying to educate 35 or 40 children in a class. What must it be like to try to maintain mutual respect and discipline in such an environment?

We must devote more resources to education and provide children with a challenge to learn. They will then know that the local authority and all concerned are interested in their education, and they will not become rebellious and frustrated.

The abolition of corporal punishment does not mean a lawless school. There are other sanctions for non-compliance by children — and there is the ultimate sanction of expulsion. That final sanction was not unknown in the authority the education committee of which occupied my attention. Parents amd children can be presented with alternative sanctions so as to gain their co-operation.

I support the call from Europe, but what makes our schools so different from those in the rest of Europe? Why should we be less able to organise our education system than, say, France, Italy and Germany? No case has been made to set us aside from the rest.

In my experience, the teacher who is a thug is usually the most unsuccessful as a teacher. In my school days, the teacher who was a thug was always despised by the youngsters. Never to his credit could he say that he educated his pupils successfully. For those reasons, I shall oppose Second Reading of the Bill.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): It is clear from the speeches of Opposition Members that the Bill has had the one effect so far of rekindling the cause of the abolitionists. The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) has made his position clear on that issue. While I do not agree with him, I respect his opinion.

The education spokesman for the Liberal party, the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) told us how, because of arrangements made by his family, he was exempted from corporal punishment. That being so, I could not understand his later comments about the Bill. I should have thought that he would wish to support a measure which would allow people to opt in and out of the system.

Last year I found myself at odds with the Government over what was then the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings Bill, a piece of legislation which I considered to be most un-Conservative in its nature. I regard this Bill in much the same light — as a surprising piece of legislation for my party to be introducing. Those two measures seem to be at odds with Conservative belief in the family and discipline. I am probably leaving myself open to being called unkind—I am prepared to take the risk—by some of my comments today.

My right hon. Friend is doing a great deal to improve standards and widen the opportunities available for our children, and I greatly admire his efforts, but I regard this measure as nonsense and I fear that it will prove to be a great mistake. The legislation has been introduced to fulfil an obligation arising under article 2 of the first protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights. As that is clearly the case, perhaps we should be discussing that matter rather than the Bill. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will not argue in defence of the Bill that this convention has never been broken before.

Teachers are an important section of society, particularly in their role in influencing young people and future generations. An essential part of their job is to be responsible for teaching young people the difference between right and wrong and for maintaining discipline in our schools. We can all think of teachers who are fine academics but who are not successful in their jobs because of their inability to maintain discipline. For many teachers an essential part of their armoury is their option to use corporal punishment, and I would certainly defend that option.

No doubt many hon. Members were on the receiving end of corporal punishment during their days at school. I went to a fairly tough school in the east end of London, where corporal punishment was administered on many occasions. I believe that in the school that I attended, and because of the circumstances under which it operated, corporal punishment was an effective deterrent, and I am not aware of any damaging psychological problems suffered by those to whom it was administered.

Mr. Freud: Would the hon. Gentleman talk about the deterrent if some of his friends had not been punished and he had been punished? Is that not the most divisive action that could occur in a class?

Mr. Amess: I certainly never found that to be the case when I was at school, and I am sure that it will not be the case in the future.

When I taught I never had to administer corporal punishment, but the option was always available. My fundamental objection to the Bill is that it is unnecessary and unjust. It perpetrates and encourages injustice. One of the best definitions that I have heard states that justice is the treatment of equals equally and of unequals unequally. Our whole system of education is founded on that principle. How often have hon. Members received a reply from one of my right hon. Friends saying that an individual case must be treated on its merits? The Bill could serve as a definition of injustice — the treatment of equals unequally. What sort of justice allows two children at a school who commit the same punishable offence to be treated differently, one receiving corporal punishment and the other, after the teacher has referred to the register, receiving detention? What sort of example does this set our young people, other than a bad example amounting to dual standards?

There are further consequences of this court judgment about punishment. The child in detention will be held by the rest of the children to have got away with his action, while the child who is caned will suffer from the thought that she or he has been singled out for special punishment for an offence that others committed as well. Grievance and dissent will spread throughout the school, with rival parents blaming the teacher, the head and the local authority. The net effect will be the lowering of standards of discipline at a time when the teaching profession is seeking to restore those standards.

I draw the attention of the House to the evidence given by the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association to the Education, Science and Arts Committee, which was investigating achievement in primary schools. That evidence demonstrated the marked deterioration in children's behaviour. At the AMMA's assembly in April 1984 Mrs. Heather Ryan stated:

"Disobedience, aggression and destructiveness are no longer the exception in classrooms or playground. Aggression includes physical and verbal abuse of peers and adults."

I can back up that statement with hard evidence. Although primary school teachers are doing a heroic job in inducing social training, some of these children will enter secondary school in the same state and with the same attitudes. The Bill will do nothing to assist secondary school teachers in enforcing discipline; in fact, it will militate against any such discipline. The bureaucracy involved in the register will mean some delay in the traditional administration of justice in schools, and that is wrong.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): At the moment, many schools have a number of nominated persons who administer corporal punishment to children who have committed a misdemeanour. Often the child is sent from the classroom to the headmaster's study, where he awaits receipt of that punishment.

Mr. Amess: I stand corrected. My hon. Friend appears to have found a defect in my argument.

The bureaucracy involved in compiling the register will be excessive. I am afraid that, after a time, people will become lax about registering their children on the corporal punishment list. A parent may take a particular dislike to a teacher and may be up in arms when his child is wrongly punished. We may then have a court case on our hands and bad publicity for the school.

We have the extraordinary case of a small group of people in the schools—teachers—seizing the opportunity the Bill presents to impose their will on the majority and thus destroy any access within a school to corporal punishment. Is that right? Is it democratic? Upholding the right of one person over the right of another when both rights are equally good is the negation of justice.

Before voting on the Bill, I must consider three views —the view of my constituents, of my party and of my conscience. In supporting this measure, I satisfy all three.

8.7 pm

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston): A number of points have emerged from the decision of the European Court of Human Rights. Are the Government concerned with conformity—with carrying out what the court believes to be right? Are the Government concerned with force —with being forced by the court to take this action? Are the Government concerned with persuasion? Each of those questions is relevant to the subject of corporal punishment.

A long time ago, I read a book by Émile Durkheim, a sociologist. He said something of value about corporal punishment—that the punishment of children by parents is personal, but by teachers is impersonal. He came down very much on the side of those opposing the use of such punishment in schools.

Like many hon. Members, I have direct connections with this subject. For many years I was the deputy chairman of the Liverpool education committee and chairman of the schools sub-committee. Inevitably, we had to consider whether as an authority we favoured or opposed corporal punishment. We considered that point about the time we were discussing reorganising education in the city. The National Union of Teachers made it abundantly clear that it wished to retain corporal punishment. It considered that if corporal punishment were taken away, it would be deprived of a means of maintaining discipline within the classroom.

We decided as a committee—I accepted responsibility for a large share of this — to visit schools and examine the punishment book. An interesting point emerged from that study. In almost all the schools, when the punishment book was brought forward by the headmaster and examined day-by-day over a couple of years, it was fairly clear that there was a pattern— Johnny Smith had been punished on one day and Johnny Smith was punished a few weeks later. There were invariably no more than three or four names repeated again and again in the punishment book.

What did the committee deduce from that? It was apparent that pupils repeated their offences and teachers repeated their punishments. The result was that there was no change in the child's behaviour. The argument that the punishment of children is an effective way to improve discipline is not proven by the evidence that I have seen within the city of Liverpool. Hon. Members may say that that is not the same in Norwich, Portsmouth, or elsewhere. I am speaking from experience. I do not believe that Liverpool is unique. A handful of repetitive punishments tends to establish that corporal punishment is not a cure for the indiscipline that exists in many of our schools.

The debate within Liverpool took place when the committee was considering secondary school reorganisation. Two grammar schools, which were in a fairly well-placed area in terms of their intake, were being amalgamated to form one comprehensive school. The headmaster of the boys' grammar school had abolished corporal punishment several years earlier. The girls and boys grammar schools became a comprehensive school. We wondered whether the headmaster of the boys school would change his decision about punishment for indiscipline when the school had a different catchment area.

I visited the school about seven years after it was established as a comprehensive because there was a change of headmaster. Being a governor, I took the opportunity to visit the school. When I raised this subject with the teachers, they said that they had not found it necessary to return to any form of corporal punishment. They had disciplinary problems—no school is free of them—but they dealt with them differently.

To pass a Bill which will result in some children in some schools being subject to punishment and other children in other schools, or in the same school, being free of it is unfortunate. It will make life extremely difficult for teachers. It may be suggested that we are interested not in teachers but in the discipline of children. That is the teachers' problem. We should be talking to teachers and to organisations such as the NUT and the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association. If the Department of Education and Science or the Select Committee on Education and Science were to set up a thorough investigation of the problem of corporal punishment and indiscipline in schools with the right to make recommendations — as was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) when he referred to the size of classes—about the resources available for schools, the whole range of problems and how best to provide education, I suggest that we might have meaningful discussions with teachers about the problem.

According to recent information—I shall no doubt be corrected if I am wrong — the NUT has shifted its position on this matter. Originally it was in favour of corporal punishment. I do not know why it has changed its views, but its experience over recent years probably tends to establish what I have said: that the same pupils are being punished repeatedly and it does not deter them or improve relations within the schools.

I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for having been given the opportunity to take part in the debate.

8.16 pm

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): We are debating this issue not because we want to but because we have to. We should perhaps debate discipline in schools regularly. It is a great shame that the Benches are so empty, when this is an issue which must affect all of us. That the debate is taking place at all is the result of a disciplinary admonition by the European Court, which has been much referred to today. The Government have responded by producing the Bill—something which many people find unpleasant to debate.

I had expected that hon. and learned Members would come scurrying from their courts this afternoon to tell us why we, as laymen, should throw out the Bill on some legal or constitutional ground. We might have expected some arguments from the anti-European lobby. I have other arguments in mind. We will not leave the European Community for the sake of letting some of our teachers beat other people's children. That old chestnut would be an excuse, not a reason. We could do worse than ask ourselves why discipline is better in other European schools, where no cane is employed. It might be because there is a stronger form of family discipline and responsibility, which is perhaps lost in this country. It might be something to which we should be looking in the future, rather than lamenting the passing of the cane, which I suspect will be the result of the Bill.

As a child in the 1950s, the backs of my bare legs—short trousers of course—were hit regularly with a ruler as an aid to learning mathematics. It was entirely counter-productive. Later, school prefects administered an automatic cumulative points system for enforcing discipline, punctuality and tidiness at school. I must admit that I failed the bed-making test. The boy who beat me is now an acclaimed film producer, and the school is all the better for having changed the system. At about the same time, my eldest brother was doing his national service. The Queen visited his barracks by train, and the day before was spent by those national servicemen sandpapering the railway lines. On the day itself, they were usefully employed painting the grass green.

I mention these examples to illustrate two important principles. First, a sensible teacher never sees physical violence as an aid to learning, and rarely as an aid to discipline. Children whose work falls short of acceptability can usually be separated into the idle, slovenly and disobedient, and those whose academic progress needs encouragement and incentive. Secondly, though teachers of every kind and generation recognise discipline and indiscipline when they see it, the consequences and punishments, mercifully, have changed, along with the demands and perceptions of those in authority. Calls for a return to national service often come from those who remember the daily routine bounded by the automatic discipline of Queen's regulations. The services are different today, and so are the schools.

In the 17th century Samuel Butler said:

"Love is a boy, by poets styled;
Then spare the rod, and spoil the child."

We have heard about the distinction between a smack and a caning. There have been occasions when my own children have felt the physical representation of my wrath. That does not mean that I caned them, or sought corporally to punish them. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southport (Sir I. Percival) is a most gentle and distinguished Member of the House. He presented us with many arguments, but I have to say that my experience leads me to different conclusions.

In 16 years as a schoolmaster, I only once caned a boy. It happened in my first year in the profession. That was the system. It was loathsome. It was humiliating for both of us. For the rest of my teaching career, I neither needed nor used the cane. Indeed, after I moved south of the border, I was not allowed to use it. A distinguished headmaster said to me this weekend that people who cannot control children without recourse to physical assault should be in some other business.

Mr. Forth: I have listened to my hon. Friend's speech with rapt fascination. Does he agree that we do not in fact need any legislation? He has just given the perfect example of a system that works. Either the teacher makes his own decision whether or not corporal punishment is efficacious, or the school or the local authority does so. Why do we need legislation?

Mr. Key: We have no option in the matter. We must produce a Bill of some sort. In my view, the Government have got it as nearly right as is possible.

In all our best schools, whether in the maintained or the private sector, the cane is not used. Conversely, in the more difficult schools and the more deprived local communities, the cane is used more. The use of corporal punishment is an excuse for failure to attack the root causes of indiscipline. That is not a reason for continuing to support it.

I regret to say that many head teachers who say that they have not used the cane for years and would not do so will not come clean with their parents and children, on the ground that they still need to have a deterrent in the cane cupboard. That is a strange moral argument and a negative approach to discipline. A number of headmasters and teachers have begged me not to identify their schools because this is a sensitive issue. What are they afraid of?

The Bill is so dotty that it could safely be supported by abolitionists as well as by retentionists. It is a clever Bill. It is not what it seems. However, we should not underestimate the opposition to the Bill. Of parents with children at primary school, 54 per cent. are in favour of retention. Of parents with children at secondary school, 67 per cent. favour retention. Only 36 per cent. of teachers favour abolition, against 52 per cent. who are retentionists —the majority of them women.

Great strides are being made by the teaching profession in all areas of discipline in schools. Teachers are not helped by the silly, ideological and political excesses of local education authorities, nor by strident and negative lobbying by pressure groups. Some hon. Members still believe—basing that belief on their own school days—that there can be no discipline without corporal punishment. They should remember that they were at their secondary schools—whether in the public or the state sector—for only four or five years, some years ago, when the demands on schoolchildren were very much less and the problems facing parents and teachers were fewer. It would be encouraging to think that my hon. Friends would take note of the views of the small number of us who spent much longer in the world of schools. Parents had sufficient confidence in us then to entrust their children to us. I have tried to teach the sons of several right hon. and hon. Members, including my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, whose admirable son was a model pupil.

It is always dangerous to judge schools today by one's own experience as a child. Indeed, I have some reservations about the Government's proposal for more parental involvement in schools. I have seen teachers' morale lowered and progress delayed, both on school governing bodies and on local education authorities, by well-intentioned but reactionary governors trying to recreate what they believe to have been the happiest days of their lives, some 30 years before. I predict that the Bill will meet opposition of that kind in the other place.

What are the alternatives? With what could we replace corporal punishment? In the schools where, as we are told, it is used two or three times a week, it is said that the system is good for certain children, often those whose parents do not support the teachers or the schools. Where does one draw the line? Should one cane girls? Is 10 years old too young? Is 16 too old? One must draw a line somewhere. The issue cannot be fudged. Teachers who use the cane often say that it works best on pubescent 11 to 13-year-olds. However, the Secretary of State identified that group this afternoon as perhaps unsuitable for caning.

Who still uses the cane? Is it the older teachers who have always done so? Do women teachers have more discipline problems and refer children on to senior management for a semi-automatic beating? In my experience, the best disciplined schools usually rely on a series of steps. The more steps that the teacher can apply, the better. Schools which have tried withdrawal classes for disruptive pupils have found that that is a rather doubtful solution. Children often like being sent to a withdrawal class with other children who have offended the social code of a school. Similarly, suspension from school can be popular among the children whom it is designed to improve. More successful in my view is withdrawal of freedom and privileges in school. That can often disrupt family life and force parental attention on to the problem, and that is one of the keys to discipline.

Another point that is often overlooked is the folly of moving teacher to pupils, rather than the other way around. I know of one teacher who, in a school of 1,700 children, taught in 11 different rooms during the week. That school had problems. The teacher is now working in another school where he has his own classroom, which he can personalise and which strengthens the bond between children and teacher. The system works. That school has fewer problems.

We should not forget the importance of resources in schools. Staff numbers matter, not only from the point of view of supervision, but from that of the positive role of pastoral care. Many pastoral heads of year in our schools have only four periods a week for pastoral care. That is not time enough in which to deal with 180 children. Often academic teachers are rewarded with pastoral work. Both aspects of their career suffer, and so do the children.

Those are management problems, but nothing is as important as the tripod on which successful teacher recruitment depends. An experienced teacher from a comprehensive, which is not in my constituency, told me only yesterday:

"Two of our worst teachers are the best qualified men in the school".

Teaching depends on three things—academic ability, aptitude to teach and attitude to education. It was never true that those who can, do and those who can't, teach. Much more should be done to encourage positive attitudes to discipline and responsibility in schools. I have mentioned a few alternatives which work, but there are many more. Much more needs to be done in teacher training and retraining. I shall never accept that there is no alternative to corporal punishment. There most certainly is, and it works.

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) said that there was no underlying principle to the Bill. He is wrong, because if the Bill has a principle it is a democratic one. This is the most democratic option that was open to the Government within the narrow range available. There has been a voluntary elimination of corporal punishment in Scotland. That should be a lesson to us all. The Bill is important because it means that there will be no heavy hand from Whitehall telling local education authorities what to do. Education authorities can phase out the cane, as can governors. Parents will effectively have to opt in, as far as I can understand it, if their school or authority operates a register. If parents cannot be bothered to write in, they will be opted out by default. That is a matter for debate, which we might have to consider closely in Committee. I should say that it is a matter which those who are on the Committee will have to consider carefully.

Among the implications of maintaining a register is the time and money involved in maintaining it and the good will of teaching and non-teaching staff, which will be under additional strain. That is a valid point for the teaching unions to argue. They are mostly abolitionists, so I am surprised that they do not support the Bill on that ground alone.

I believe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State means what he says about strengthening the role of parents, as is explained in his Green Paper on parental influence in schools. The Bill gives parents a choice and requires them to get appointed or elected to governing bodies if they wish their views to prevail. It also requires them to get elected as councillors and on to the local education authority to be sure of getting their views over. If there is one thing wrong with local democracy at the moment, it is that people do not take it seriously and therefore do not vote, and that the people who make the most noise do not wish to stand and take on the onerous tasks involved in being on a local authority.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State knows very well—more of us should realise it—that the Bill is not really about caning. It is about who runs the schools and the future of discipline in them. The hard-line opponents of abolition are not addressing themselves to the issues that face parents and teachers in 1985—nor are the hard-line egalitarians who insist on throwing out the baby with the bathwater by abolishing speech days, prizes and every other simple incentive to which children respond so naturally. We all respond to a mixture of sticks and carrots, and if we abolish sticks we shall need more carrots, not fewer.

The Bill is not about beating children, but about the whole structure of discipline and responsibility in schools. It has always been clear that the Government are concerned with standards and with an extension of responsibility towards schools, teachers and parents. That is why schools now issue prospectuses, why my right hon. friend wants more parent-governors with some direct financial control and why teacher appraisal is not just about removing bad teachers but about making good teachers better.

The Bill, expedient and dotty as it might seem, will concentrate all our minds wonderfully. I believe that we should give it a Second Reading.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next hon. Member, I should say that five hon. Members still hope to speak before the winding-up speeches start at about 9.15 pm. I appeal for brevity so that all five hon. Members can get in.

8.33 pm

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): It is a pleasure to speak after the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key). He made an excellent speech in favour of abolition and then baffled the House with a bizarre, perverse and tortuous argument in support of the Bill. If it was an attempt to get on the Front Bench, we should welcome him there, as he has sane and liberal views on discipline. He would be an embellishment to the Front Bench but I fear that it will take more than such perverse logic.

Undoubtedly the hon. Member for Salisbury would have agreed with Roger Ascham. As a former school teacher he is probably one of the few hon. Members who knows who Roger Ascham was. He was the tutor to Queen Elizabeth I. As a former teacher, the hon. Gentleman will probably remember Roger Ascham's work entitled "The Scholemaster", which was one of the first on educational theory. He referred to corporal punishment with an enlightened attitude for his day. He wrote:

"Even the wisest of your great beaters do as oft punish nature as they do correct faults."

I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees with that. Unfortunately, we have heard a great deal of noise from Conservative Members who profess to be great beaters, but they are not among the wisest of their kind. They seem to have learnt nothing in the past 400 years. In supporting the Bill, which is an utterly ill-considered compromise and which satisfied neither them nor Opposition Members, they do no credit to their case or to the seriousness of the subject.

When I read the Bill, I thought that there were considerable drafting problems. I am sorry to have missed the Secretary of State's speech but I gather that he gave way a good deal on the drafting implications. I also understand that he has sorted out many of them. I look forward to reading his speech tomorrow, and perhaps examining the drafting in greater detail in Committee.

The implementation of the Bill has taxed the House. That is right, as it will create many problems, not least for children who, as many hon. Members have said, will now find that they are punished differently for the same offence. That is the worst possible example of justice and effective discipline for children. I am also worried about implementation in regard to teachers. If a head teacher is faced with two children, one of whom he is allowed to beat and the other of whom he is not, what is he to do? Should he beat one and not the other, knowing that he is behaving unfairly, unreasonably and unjustly, or should he amend the punishment for both children although his professional judgment—in my view mistaken—is that he would be correct to beat both? It is nonsense that he should change his professional judgment because the parents of one child do not want that child to be caned.

There is also a problem with what is to go on the register. How are parents to be communicated with? I understand that the Secretary of State said that a letter would be sent home. Is it to be sent by post? That would be expensive. Moreover, what would happen if, by chance, the Royal Mail did not get through and the parents did not receive the letter?

Mr. Freud: Nobody gets beaten.

Mr. Fisher: On the contrary, I understand that parents have to opt out and therefore they must receive the letter and return it. The vagaries of the mail might determine whether a child is on the list. There are also difficulties associated with recording the views of parents. What happens when parents are separated or divorced or indecisive? What happens when the father takes one view and the mother takes another? What will happen with children in care?

Mr. Dunn: When there is a divorce and parents live apart, the view of the parent who wishes the child to be exempted will prevail.

Mr. Fisher: I am grateful to the Minister, but it would be helpful if that were made clear in the Bill. Perhaps it can be amended. The views of parents in regard to step-parents and foster parents is also a contentious isue. If the Minister wants to amend the Bill to clarify the matter, I hope that the Government will table such an amendment.

Legal responsibilities if things go wrong with the implementation of the Bill are also a vexed issue. I understand from clauses 2 and 3 that governors have the responsibility to maintain the register. Presumably, if a child is beaten in error, even if it is not the error of the governors in maintaining the register — it could be a clerical error by the school secretary — the governors will be responsible. Will a parent whose child has been beaten against his wishes and his record on the register be able to take a suit for battery against the governors? That would be a thoroughly unsatisfactory position. That is a thoroughly onerous responsibility for governing bodies, which may meet only once a term.

The shambles comes about because of the Secretary of State's dilemma. He consulted, and more than 100 professional bodies and people responded and said that his three options were all rotten, but that this option was the most rotten and unworkable of the lot. Despite that response, he introduced this measure. That is perverse in the extreme. Conservative Members ask what else the Secretary of State can do, and argue that he is circumscribed by the European Court. That is not true. Other European countries have abolished corporal punishment. He could have taken a straightforward abolitionist line and solved his problem. Instead, he is frightened of his Back Benchers. He is wrong to be frightened of them, because he has taken the wrong decision.

Labour Members are almost unanimously in favour of abolition, both on the principle and because it is the only effective and efficient option. Because Conservative Members, the beaters, have spent a lot of our time discussing this matter, it is important to state the principal case for abolition. Corporal punishment is beating. It is the infliction of bodily pain and the punishment of the body. It does not address the mind, which has occasioned the offence. Would Conservative Members inflict corporal punishment? As the hon. Member for Salisbury said, it is an extremely unpleasant task. I doubt whether many of them, being gentle souls despite their misguided views, would wish to do it. I doubt whether they believe in beating pets.

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Gentleman served on a local education authority, and he speaks with vigour. Does he not think that those arguments should take place in the council chamber of a local education authority, so that others may be persuaded of the rightness of his case? The local education authority should not rely on the strong hand of central Government dictating that it should abolish corporal punishment by law.

Mr. Fisher: That is a feeble argument. The Secretary of State is introducing a measure to change discipline in schools, and because he cannot bring himself to abolish, which he knows in heart of hearts to be right, he seeks to devolve the responsibility to local government. As the Government have a responsibility to respond to the European Court, they should abolish corporal punishment. They know that the principal argument for abolition is correct.

I am sure that Conservative Members do not believe in beating dogs. Why then do they believe that beating children is such a good idea and so suitable? Judicial beating was abolished in 1948. The Army, showing an amazing degree of prescience and sanity, abolished corporal punishment in 1868. Why should it still exist in schools? What is it about children that makes them susceptible to violence? Is it that Conservative Members believe that children can understand only violence, and that they cannot understand reason? That is nonsense. It is not justifiable in principle and it is not effective in practice. No schools or authorities which have abolished corporal punishment have regretted it. There is no sign that discipline in those schools is any the worse for it. Indeed, the evidence that exists, suggests that discipline improves.

The only argument that has force — it is surprising that it has not been used — is the in loco parentis argument. One form of logic is that if parents have the right to beat children and schools are in loco parentis, schools have the right to beat children on behalf of parents. That is the logic behind the non-exemption that allows schools to continue beating pupils. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary nods as though he agrees, but it is a poor piece of logic.

If parents hit their children, they do so in the heat of the moment, in the context of a close and, I hope, loving and complex relationship, in the confidence of knowing each other, and with an opportunity to forgive and recreate that relationship. If a child is beaten in school it is right that it should be beaten in this way — in a cool, objective judicial atmosphere, possibly by the head, whom the pupil may not even know, a long time after the event, and with no opportunity to restore the relationship. There is no similarity between the position of parents and schools.

For schools to suggest to parents that it is intelligent to give their consent to beating, and to approve the idea of generalised consent is extremely unintelligent and unsatisfactory. Parents cannot know the context of the offence, what the alternatives were, what was passing through the mind of their child or what the position in the classroom or school was. Yet they are being asked to give generalised consent by opting on to the register for beating, or off it for being exempted. The Government should have addressed themselves to a proper structure of discipline.

The Government should have provided an entirely new contract for teachers and children. They should have said to the education world, "We shall give you a decent context for education. We shall give you books, buildings and resources so that you as teachers can do a good job. We shall give you a good pastoral context to create good discipline in schools." The Government should have said to the children, "We shall give you a society in which it is worth being educated, worth having the prospect of a job and therefore worth behaving and getting the most from education. In return we shall expect discipline and self-discipline from all members of the school community."

Instead, the Government have given teachers poor buildings, too few materials, too little in-service training, large classes, no supply teachers and insufficient staffing levels to maintain a good pastoral organisation. Teachers are overstretched and undervalued. Recently, the Secretary of State told them that their standards were too low and that they were failures as teachers. No wonder teachers' morale is low.

How do pupils react in such a position? If the Government manifestly do not rate and value the teachers, why should pupils respect them? Throughout the country, pupils are looking at the estates on which they live, the schools where they are educated, and the prospects for them when they leave school and saying, "If the Government do not rate us or teachers, why should we care or behave?" The Government have removed the carrot of the prospect of worthwhile education. Now they are removing part of the stick. The Government are inadvertently fostering any discipline problems that exist by their educational neglect. By their faulty Bill they are compounding those problems and making a bad position worse.

The only way to achieve better discipline, better relationships and a better atmosphere in schools, is through smaller classes, a full and proper pastoral structure, and teachers with time to spare to form relationships with pupils and to know what their problems are.

Mr. Pawsey: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the pupil-teacher ratio in our schools is at the highest level ever, and that the per capita spending is also at its best level? How does he reconcile those two points with the picture of real privation that he paints? That is not the case. Unfortunately, and I am sure unintentionally, the hon. Gentleman is misleading the House with his 18th-century description of education.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. Gentleman referred to the highest pupil-teacher ratio, when he meant the lowest pupil-teacher ratio. It has undoubtedly come down, but like all those who read much and understand little about education, he does not understand the difference between pupil-teacher ratios and class sizes. Classes are extremely large. As pastoral roles have improved and developed in schools from a rudimentary start 10 years ago, class sizes have not improved to reflect the undoubted improvement in the pupil-teacher ratio. If the hon. Gentleman doubts my description of low morale in schools, he should visit the schools in his constituency and ask teachers whether they believe that the Government value them, and whether their morale is high or low. He will obtain only one answer: that morale is low because teachers feel neglected. If they feel neglected, so do pupils.

The only way to achieve discipline is to have a better atmosphere, smaller classes and pupils who believe that education is worth while. That will come, but certainly not from this Government. It will come only from a Government who have a vision of education and who care about the future of children. Only in that context can good discipline be fostered.

8.50 pm

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I do not follow the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) too far down the road that he signposted. Since he talked about my constituency, I should tell him that, perhaps unlike him, I take the trouble to visit the schools in my constituency regularly. I visit most schools at least once every two years, so I have a good idea of what happens in schools. Teacher morale is not as low as the hon. Gentleman would have us believe. Generally, teachers appreciate what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is doing—for example, with teacher assessment.

The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) said that the Bill was unworkable, but, in the immortal words of Mandy Rice-Davies, "He would, wouldn't he?" He is an outspoken abolitionist, so clearly nothing in the Bill commends itself to him. Therefore, most of his speech should be dismissed for what it was.

Mr. Radice: Do not consider the argument.

Mr. Pawsey: The argument was persuasive, but unfortunately the hon. Gentleman had not bent his mind to it. He usually contributes much to our debates, but on this occasion his intellect was not focused on the problem before the House.

When considering the Bill, my worst prejudices about Europe come to the surface. The judgment by the European Court of Human Rights has helped neither Britain nor the House. We have been making our own laws for hundreds of years without the benefit of European advice and interference, and our laws reflect our customs and our traditions. The latter are not always those of France, Italy or Belgium. However, the United Kingdom has signed the European convention on human rights, and it must abide by the consequences of that signing.

The Bill sets out to meet the requirements of the European Court and to make the best of a bad decision. The decision was made not by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, nor by the Government, but by European judges. The only alternative to this Bill is the complete abolition of corporal punishment, which is clearly unacceptable to the majority of hon. Members. No doubt we shall see after the Division this evening who is right on that point, as on all the other points that we have discussed.

Mr. Ian Grist (Cardiff, Central): Does my hon. Friend agree that it would have been better to have not a whipped vote but a plain statement of the opinions of hon. Members?

Mr. Pawsey: My hon. Friend knows as well as I do that, sadly, it is sometimes thought necessary to impose disciplines on hon. Members, in the same way as we seek to impose them on others outside.

The alternative to the Bill is the total abolition of corporal punishment, which I believe would be a retrograde step. It would not endear us to parents or teachers, and it would leave schools without one of their principal deterrents—a deterrent that helps to counter defiance. Opposition Members have not said what they would put in place of corporal punishment. They have tried, but they have not proved their case. Until they do so, and provide a viable alternative to corporal punishment, the status quo should remain.

It is not necessary for the cane to be often used and, as I know, it is hardly ever used in the best schools. The knowledge that it exists is usually sufficient. We have heard the argument this evening that what is good enough for European countries should be good enough for us. Hon. Members have said that if European states can manage without corporal punishment, why should not Britain? That is a short-sighted argument that does not take into account the fact that, in the United Kingdom, the teacher is in loco parentis. That is not understood in Europe, and that is one reason why the European Court's judgment was in error. The court did not appreciate the basic point that, in Britain, the teacher stands in for the parent.

In the United Kingdom, the cane is the traditional punishment for misdemeanours. In many European countries, the punishment is suspension or detention. In France, if a child is suspended for poor attendance at school, the social security benefits that they would normally attract are also suspended for that period. The punishment affects not only the child, but the rest of his family. Do hon. Members put that forward as a viable alternative? Of course not, because it would be impossible to introduce. In eastern Europe, the child's misdemeanours are posted on the notice board of the factory in which his father works. One can imagine the outcry, especially from Opposition Members, if we suggested using that method in the United Kingdom.

Sovereign nations have evolved methods of maintaining discipline in schools, and the United Kingdom has evolved its method——

Mr. Fisher: Beatings.

Mr. Pawsey: No, not beatings. That is an emotive word. The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that the usual terminology is "caning". I noted that during his speech he did not use the word "caning". It was either a mistake or a deliberate attempt to mislead the House into believing that most schools administer the sort of treatment that he may have experienced at his school.

Opposition Members have not suggested a punishment that would provide an effective deterrent in place of corporal punishment.

Parents need to understand that if corporal punishment is abolished and their child misbehaves, he will probably receive more detentions and a greater loss of privileges. In severe cases, that may result in positive suspension from school. When parents know that those are the alternatives, I believe that they will decide that corporal punishment is the lesser evil.

If, for example, in country areas a child is put into detention, it may mean that he misses the school bus home. In many country areas the only bus to get the child home is the school bus. Such punishment would undoubtedly exceed that of corporal punishment were it to be used in country schools.

We should not seek to minimise the difficulties created for head teachers by the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights. I appreciate the difficulties surrounding the need to record the names of those who can be caned, but I do not believe that they should be overstated. When one considers the alternatives, I believe that, problems or no problems, we should support the Bill. I believe that parents will decide not to opt out of the system. Because they will recognise the clear need to maintain school discipline, I believe that parents will co-operate with head teachers and teachers. In view of the increase in parental choice that the Bill provides, I believe that parents will opt in. I further believe that my right hon. and hon. Friends have tried and, in general, succeeded in salvaging a working measure from the wreck of the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights.

Mr. Sean Hughes (Knowsley, South): If the debate has served one purpose, it has emphasised the fact that the sooner the House of Commons is televised the better. The country will then have an opportunity to watch and listen to some of the antediluvian arguments which are put forward by Conservative Members.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) said that this is a very important Bill. I believe that it is trivial in the extreme, compared with the real needs of education. Some Conservative Members are obsessed by such punitive issues as this. I believe that they are totally irrelevant to educational problems and that it is one of the most negative ways of looking at education, its development and its problems. Having listened to Conservative Members, with the honourable exception of the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), one would think that the use of the cane and the strap is crucial to the maintenance of standards and discipline. What utter nonsense. Of course the Bill has been forced upon us by the decision of the European Court of Human Rights. However, as my hon. Friend the Minister for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) said, it should have been used as an opportunity to get rid of an uncivilised, punitive irrelevance.

To put my comments in perspective, I could never be considered to be a trendy, middle-class ex-teacher. I believe very much in educational standards and quality. I am consious of how a deprived environment distorts educational aims. The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) asked us to consider the plight of the harassed teacher in a deprived area. I suggest the cane is not the way in which to overcome deprivation. I taught for 13 years in one of our most deprived areas. I noted that the hon. Member for Ealing, North suggested that the hon. Member for Cambridge, North-East (Mr. Freud) should spend a few years in the classroom of a large comprehensive school. That is what I did. It was an area of massive youth unemployment, whose educational ethos was non-existent, but the school in which I taught did not practise corporal punishment. That experience over 13 years taught me that one cannot whack excellence into children, or beat them into examination success or cane them into discipline.

I do not want to exaggerate the incidence or extent of corporal punishment. Indeed, I am not very convinced by some of the sociological arguments against corporal punishment, although I accept that corporal punishment might cause psychological damage to children. I simply do not know whether the occasional whack promotes in a child the belief that might is right. In my case it did precisely the opposite. However, I accept that the worst schools overuse corporal punishment and that it adds to an atmosphere of violence. I accept equally, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) mentioned, that when he is at the end of his tether even the most civilised, rational, decent-minded teacher can be goaded into contemplating meting out a good hiding to somebody.

Although I accept that the environment distorts educational achievement and behaviour, I accept, too, the concept of original sin.

Why then do I oppose corporal punishment? It is simply because the sight of a 40-year-old man hitting with a stick the outstretched hand of a 12-year-old boy is distinctly distasteful and wholly unnecessary. Conservative Members have said that it is a deterrent. All the evidence points to the fact that it is the same child who is repeatedly beaten, caned or strapped, as my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne) said. Either that means that, apparently like some Conservative Members, they like it, or that it is not a deterrent.

I am opposed to corporal punishment because I hold it to be uncivilised. My experience tells me that it is unnecessary. It distracts us, as it has done today, from debating the real reasons for educational deprivation and inequality. That is why I hope that the House will support the Opposition amendment.

9.5 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Unfortunately, I must restrict my comments severely because of the hour, but I want to put forward an argument that we have not yet heard. I want to return to the genesis of this measure and to see why it is that what we are told is inevitable is not so at all.

Let us go back to the original debate in the Council of Europe in 1951 when the origin of this measure was considered. We have been told repeatedly that the people who wrote the European convention on human rights and the protocol on which it is based had in mind corporal punishment and its effect on children. Nothing could be further from the truth.

I wish to quote the words of Mr. Teitgen, the rapporteur in the Council of Europe at the time. He said:

"it is essential for our Protocol to protect the rights of parents in the field of education and teaching against the danger of nationalisation, absorption, monopolisation, requisitioning of young people by the State".

In other words, the intention of the original protocol to the convention had nothing whatever to do with corporal punishment in schools; it concerned the post-war context and the fear of the then generation of undue political influence in the educational process.

That is bad enough. It is also relevant that even then, and in the light of that, the United Kingdom entered a reservation to the protocol on which the judgment is based, distancing itself from the protocol as then expressed and using such vague and rather difficult words as "philosophical conviction".

On the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights we have the excellent dissenting opinion of Sir Vincent Evans, the British judge in that court. He said that the original aim, as I have set it out, and as the words of the rapporteur suggest, give no basis for the judgment which was passed down by the court against his dissenting opinion.

The way in which our continental friends conduct their legal proceedings takes no account of the original intention of those who pass the law. They feel free to graft on to that law a meaning which may suit them at the time. Therefore, 30 years after the original passing of the convention and the protocol we find a judgment by the court which bears no relationship to the circumstances of the 1980s.

It is for that reason that I believe the oft-quoted convention and protocol, as laid before us, do not have the strength, relevance or directness which have been suggested to us over and over again during the debate. Therefore, we are entitled to decline to accept the solution that has been offered to us and that has been so rightly criticised on both sides of the House. We are right in asking the Government to think again, probably at great length, and possibly to return with another half-baked solution. In other words, we should have time to reconsider whether we should have anything to do with the European convention on human rights, which was created 30 years ago in such different circumstances; to reconsider whether we should still be signatories to and supporters of the protocol which was based on a different time and in different circumstances; and to reconsider whether Britain should allow itself to be subject constantly to interpretations and reinterpretations of conventions and protocols—116 of them—which have been cumulatively created by the Council of Europe over the years.

It is for that reason, and that reason principally, that I shall be unable to support the Government in what they have brought before us today. I look forward to the day when we seriously reconsider our membership of the Council of Europe and our adherence to the European convention on human rights in order that we may obviate and eliminate the repetition of an unfortunate case such as we have before us this evening.

9.10 pm

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Croydon, North-West): This has been a long debate, but I am reminded of the words of an old schoolmaster friend of mine, Mr. Tom Peacocke, who said:

"For the boy, the stick. For the politician, the red hot poker."

I think that he had it right on one count at least.

Unfortunately, the Bill falls between two stools. It introduces for the first time a two-tier system and, in trying to please everyone, I suspect that the Government are likely to end up pleasing no one.

The argument is not about the merits or otherwise of corporal punishment. I support corporal punishment, provided that it is used appropriately, and I believe that my view is widely shared. As a punishment it has the merits of being immediate, quickly over with and easily associated with the offence, and in many cases it is far less damaging to the pupil than its logical alternatives of expulsion or suspension. Those latter punishments often cause long-term resentment in children and long-term damage to a child's education, since they may interfere with examinations. Apart from all else, when a school suspends or expels a pupil, it is an admission of failure by the school. In the borough of Croydon, we tend to suspend some 300 pupils per year, often for long periods, with resultant disruption to their education and family life.

There are a number of problems with the Bill. First, it appears that either parent has a right to object to corporal punishment. One parent may be strongly in favour, the other may be against. The "against" view will prevail, which may cause rifts and divisions in the family.

The situation could arise where a parent objected to corporal punishment for one of his two children but not for the other. That could only result in divisions between children in the same home.

At the school, for an identical offence two children might be punished in different ways. Is that not bound to cause divisions between children and between staff at the school?

Given that public and parental opinion can change, the possibility is there of a child being subject to corporal punishment or not, as the case may be, at different stages in his education.

The message is clear. A two-tier system of punishment is divisive both within the school and within the family. Children respect principles of certainty, consistency and, above all, equality of treatment. Passing the Bill opens the way to enormous divisions and resentments when those well-established principles are breached.

The extraordinary picture emerges of two children, perhaps the best of friends, starting together on the same day at the same school. From the moment that they enter the school gates together, they are subject to wholly different regimes. In punishment, the word "choice" does not seem to be wholly relevant. There is much more merit in the word "consistency".

I put a few short points to the Minister. There is reference in the Bill to "a parent". Who is a parent? Does a divorced parent qualify? Even though he has no rights of access to or custody of the child, can he exempt a child of his from corporal punishment? If a child is in care, does the local authority make the decision, or does the parent or either parent make the decision? If a child is subject to a supervision order, is the position different from that of a child under a care order? Who carries the can? Who makes the decision? We have not heard about these matters, and I hope that we shall do so before the debate ends.

I am sure that no hon. Member has ever had any difficulty in distinguishing between the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg, established by the convention, and the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg, established by the Treaty of Rome. However, for understandable reasons, the two courts are inevitably confused.

Many people will think that the Bill is being foisted on us by the EEC, which it is not. Even the Daily Telegraph political staff slipped into that error last Wednesday when it said that the deferment of the Bill had averted a second rebellion over the EEC. We must distinguish between the two courts. It is not an EEC matter that is being foisted upon us.

We must recognise that a large number of people in Britain are beginning to resent some of the interference from the Court of Human Rights. We are beginning to feel that these are matters that we can best deal with ourselves. We do not have a great deal to learn about human rights from a number of the signatories to the convention. A bill of rights for us and a withdrawal from the convention are matters for another day.

9.15 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): The Government have been on a hiding to nothing in this debate, and there has been very little support for them. Even the Secretary of State did not really recommend the Bill to the House with great enthusiasm; he was obviously only too well aware of the many internal inconsistencies in it. He found little support on the Conservative Benches. At best, Conservative Members said that they would support it because it is making the best of a bad job.

I used to be a teacher and I now regret that I sometimes inflicted corporal punishment at one or two schools, where the ethos expected it of teachers. I always felt ashamed when I caned a pupil. I also felt that somehow I had failed to carry out my duties as an effective teacher. Equally, as a school governor, I was responsible on one occasion for pressing very hard and successfully for a teacher to be appointed particularly and specifically to reduce the amount of corporal punishment in that school. The level of violence in that school was unacceptably high. Unfortunately, the teacher turned out to be disastrous, which was unfortunate for him and the school.

I have no illusions that getting rid of corporal punishment in any school is an easy task. It must be done over a period, especially where a school has consistently relied upon it. I also believe that we cannot effectively teach in an atmosphere of fear. Conservative Members who have spoken about deterrence are really saying that schools should work through an atmosphere of fear. It is essential that we get rid of that element from our educational system.

We must remember that one of the key features of education is teaching young people self-discipline. The approach of many head teachers, teachers and local authorities who have set deadlines of six or 12 months for the ending of corporal punishment is the correct way to tackle the problem. The Secretary of State for Scotland gave a good and effective lead when he suggested that all local authorities should aim to phase out corporal punishment within 12 months. It is commendable that all but two regions in Scotland are moving in that direction. The reality is that in the two regions which, apparently, will try to retain corporal punishment, the number of children who are caned or strapped is extremely small.

We must measure the Bill against that background. It is a tragic missed opportunity because it fails to abolish corporal punishment and to make positive proposals for improving school discipline. Shortly before Christmas the Opposition suggested that the Bill should be subject to the Special Standing Committee procedure so that Parliament could have an opportunity to discuss school discipline, find ways to deal with the problems created by the court's judgment and come forward with positive proposals to incorporate in our legislation. It is sad that the Government refused. No doubt they anticipated trouble with Conservative Back Benchers.

The Secretary of State talks almost continually about wanting to raise standards in schools, and one of the keys to high standards in good behaviour. The right hon. Gentleman should have sought by means of the Bill to give schools positive help in achieving good behaviour. Instead, he has offered them muddle and compromise. The Bill does nothing to help schools improve the discipline of pupils.

At the very beginning of the debate I pressed the Secretary of State to tell the House which parent would have overriding responsibility. The Bill does not tell us which parent will have the right to decide if two parents have different views. The Minister has said in an intervention that that issue will be dealt with in the regulations. That may be, but unfortunately the Bill does not give the right to one parent or the other. If, as the Secretary of State said earlier, the one parent who wants to opt out of corporal punishment for the child will have the right to do so, how will this be done? The right is not set out in the Bill and it seems that this issue will have to be dealt with in the regulations. That is unsatisfactory.

The Secretary of State said that he had a relaxed view about who should count as a parent. I think that the Bill should have referred to parents or guardians. That is the term that is used in much of our family legislation. It is not especially appropriate to lay down who will have responsibility for carrying out this parental right only in the regulations. It would be far better to set it out clearly in the Bill in order to make it clear that responsibility lies with the parent or guardian. As the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) said, we need to know the position of the child who is in care, for example.

We have heard during the debate about the opt-out procedure. It has been put to me by several people in education offices that the procedure that is set out in the Bill is the most difficult one to administer. It relies on a letter being sent from the school to the parent. It relies also on an assumption that the parent receives and understands the letter. The Secretary of State has told us that if necessary the school will send a second letter, but we all know that in practice some children move from one household to another. Sometimes they are looked after by a granny, sometimes by an aunt, sometimes by one parent and sometimes by the other. In these circumstances it will not be particularly easy to establish in a court of law that a letter was sent by the local authority to the parent.

Another issue will be whether the letter has been returned by the parent. The pupil concerned may insist that the letter was handed in at the school office. How will the school office record that the letter is with it? It has been put to me by those who are involved in education administration that it would be much better to have the alternative system which would require the school to have in its possession a letter that states, "I am the parent of X and I agree to corporal punishment being administered to my child if it is necessary." The Minister must address himself to these practical issues. I understand the political reasons that led him to go for the opt-out system but in administrative terms the opt-in system is much more positive and easier to deal with by the authorities.

Mr. Freud: I have been following closely the hon. Gentleman's remarks. Surely an opt-in system would mean opting in by both parents, step-parents, guardians and aunts and grandparents where necessary.

Mr. Bennett: I accept that argument. I do not want to spend too long trying to improve the Bill. However, I have some sympathy for the local authorities which will have to administer a measure that will cause them problems. I is a measure that the Minister should not have introduced.

I wish that the Secretary of State had dealt more fully with suspensions. It is disturbing that many local authorities and school governing bodies have gone increasingly for suspensions. This seems to be a development within the education world and is not the result of the phasing out of corporal punishment. Several Conservative Members expressed the fear that considerable harm could be caused to children who are kept out of school for long periods as a result of suspensions.

The Government argue that the Opposition should not oppose the Bill because we favour giving powers to local authorities. The Government claim honour for the fact that they are returning power to local authorities, schools and parents. We would have more sympathy with that argument if the Government were prepared to allow local authorities to have control over their own finances. But the Government say to local authorities that they are taking away control over expenditure and other important matters and giving back only the small right to make decisions on such matters as corporal punishment. I welcome the support of the Liberal party and the SDP for our reasoned amendment.

The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) misrepresented the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers when he said that it did not object to the Bill. The union favours corporal punishment, but it objects to the Bill. It is one of the many groups involved in teaching that feel that the legislation is unworkable.

Mr. Greenway: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bennett: No. The hon. Gentleman would not give way. He said that he favoured corporal punishment because it was quick. In most secondary schools and in many junior schools it is no longer quick. There is almost always a member of staff designated as the person to administer corporal punishment. In mixed schools, punishments for boys and for girls are administered by different people. The member of staff has to be found and usually wants an explanation of why corporal punishment is to be administered before even considering it. In many instances, it is a long-drawn-out process. The hon. Gentleman should reconsider his view.

Mr. Greenway: In my experience, corporal punishment is very quick. However, that was not the defence that I advanced. I said that it was a suitable deterrent and punishment for grossly serious crimes, such as bullying and some forms of vandalism. I said that the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers supported corporal punishment. I did not mention its position on the Bill.

Mr. Bennett: I am sure that in practice corporal punishment is not quick. If it were such a good deterrent, we would not have the problems of bullying and bad behaviour.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) made the valid point, echoed by other hon. Members, that we should look at the experience of other countries. No one has suggested that discipline in European schools is a major problem because they do not have corporal punishment. Discipline in almost all the other countries of Europe is as good as, if not better than, the discipline in our schools, even though there is no corporal punishment in those countries.

The hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) mentioned the sanctions that were available in France and some other countries. I am told that the withdrawal of social security benefit because of a child's non-attendance at school is a rarely used sanction in France.

Mr. Pawsey: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, even if it is used rarely, the threat exists, so the deterrent effect is the same as that of the cane being available in schools? The cane may not be used frequently, but the fact that it is available puts children off. They will behave.

Mr. Bennett: That is a doubtful argument. On the whole, deterrents which are not used fall into disrepute.

The hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) suggested a system under which one school would practise corporal punishment and another would not. Probably all hon. Members accept that that would not be a practical solution. There are already too many problems when parents want to choose between schools and we find that what they want does not fit in with what is available.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) expressed great enthusiasm for the deterrent—he spoke of his school days — and suggested that corporal punishment had not done him any harm. Presumably it did not deter him, either. I suggest that he defeated his own argument.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton South-East (Mr. Young) was rightly concerned about the way in which pupils would perceive the situation, and he questioned whether they would think the arrangement fair —a point echoed by almost all hon. Members. Two pupils involved in the same offence would not feel it fair if one was punished in one way and the other was punished in another. Several hon. Members pointed out that, even worse, two pupils involved in the same type of offence might find that the one who had committed the least serious aspect of the offence was subject to corporal punishment and the other not. That would be seen by pupils as unfair.

The hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) pointed out that more than half the public schools, the better ones, had already abolished corporal punishment.

The hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) referred to injustice resulting from different treatment. He should reflect on the situation that would be created if, for an offence, one pupil got one type of punishment and a second received the cane. Both would feel that injustice had occurred. But mistakes are made in schools, and it might be discovered later that neither pupil should have been punished. One of the two may have been given detention or some other punishment which had not yet been inflicted, but little could be done about the pupil who had already been caned. Thus, great resentment could arise.

The speech of the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) came as a breath of fresh air and enlightenment from the Government Benches. He probably summed the Bill up best when he said that it was so dotty that it could enjoy support from hon. Members on both sides of the House. Conservative Members who take the trouble to read his speech will note with interest his account of the well-run school in which corporal punishment is unnecessary. That is the type of school for which we should be striving. It is regrettable that the Bill will do little positive in that direction. Rather, it will help to produce a bureaucratic nightmare.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) spoke of the problems and cost involved in writing to parents. He also spoke of the errors that can occur. Mistakes also arise because several pupils on the register can have the same or similar names. It is not too difficult to avoid confusing, say, two John Smiths. One is aware of Smith being a common name; hence, the teacher is wary of making mistakes. But it is surprising how often quite uncommon names crop up and there are two children with the same name.

Are we to have "John Smith the cane" and "John Smith the detention" as the names by which teachers remember which boy is which? I suggest that the possibility of error will be horrendous and that, in practice, the majority of schools will decide to abolish corporal punishment rather then get involved with that type of bureaucracy.

The Government should take this measure away and go to the local authorities and say, "We want you to get a debate going in your area so that we can establish a framework for discipline by which parents and schools are clear about their roles when trying to ensure good discipline." Teachers should examine the alternatives to corporal punishment. There should be debate on how the schools administer those alternatives, the role of suspension in schools and, if a pupil is suspended by the school, the duty of local authorities to ensure that, after a short period, the child is found another school to attend. In some authorities pupils remain suspended for a term or more, and that is most unsatisfactory.

We need much more discussion between local authorities about the implication of withdrawal groups in schools and what happens if a local authority creates what one might call "sin bin" schools. What are the implications for Warnock-type integration if we try to integrate children from maladjusted schools into other schools? What are the implications of excluding pupils for punishment reasons?

I suggest to the Government that they advise local authorities to address themselves to the question of how to create an atmosphere in all their schools where self-discipline prevails, where good behaviour is the order of the day and where all teachers and senior staff need to spend little time in enforcing discipline. That has already been achieved in a few schools, but it needs to be achieved in all our schools. The Bill does nothing to achieve that end. The Government should take the legislation away and bring forward proposals to abolish corporal punishment and to create a positive framework within which good discipline can evolve in our schools.

9.35 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): We have had a long debate on a difficult subject. We have heard speeches from my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southport (Sir I. Percival), my hon. Friends the Members for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett), for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley), for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis), for Basildon (Mr. Amess), for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey), for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) and for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins), and by the hon. Members for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud), for Bolton, South-East (Mr. Young), for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham), for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), for Preston (Mr. Thorne), for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), and for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes). In the time available to me I shall attempt to deal with the points of substance and political dogma, and I undertake to write to those hon. Members whose points I cannot answer now.

The House will know that I have looked forward to this debate since the Queen's Speech last November. In recent weeks, the words of George Canning have gone through my mind. He said:

> "Give me the avowed, the erect, the manly foe;
> Bold I can meet—perhaps may turn his blow;
> But of all plagues, good Heaven, thy wrath can send,
> Save, save, oh! save me from the Candid Friend!"

But I had no need to quote those words tonight because this debate has been amiable, good natured, cheerful and enthralling. It has been a debate on a serious and difficult subject, and the Government have faced a dilemma.

The debate has been good natured, except for the contribution by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central who overstated his case by the language he used and the intemperance he brought to it. One had the idea that Wackford Squeers had not died 100 years ago, but was alive and well and replicated throughout our education system. The draconian and irresolute picture painted by the hon. Gentleman is not one of fact today.

Some Opposition Members have accused us of bringing forward a Bill which is not based on any principle. That was referred to in a most elegant speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key). The Bill is based upon a principle which should unite every Member of the House — the principle that local education authorities should decide whether to permit the application of corporal punishment in their schools, and those local authorities that so decide will allow school governors and parents to decide the matter in each school.

If any parent wishes to have his or her child exempted from corporal punishment, he has the right to seek that objective. We have debated this subject in the knowledge that some of the views expressed have been at odds with the views of the people we represent. I am convinced that if I were to have an opinion poll in any part of my constituency, I should find that the vast majority of my constituents are in favour of the retention of corporal punishment in schools, as are those represented by Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Has the Minister asked the GLC?

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Gentleman brings a peculiar affectation to our debate. I always think that he has the fervour of a poodle dog attempting to seduce a wellington boot. If he is to learn from my answers, he should remain silent for a little longer.

The Daily Telegraph, in its column written by John Izbicki, pointed out that a Gallup poll showed that 69 per cent. of the people polled believed that discipline had become worse in our schools; 19 per cent. thought that it was about the same; and only 3 per cent. thought that it had improved. That is the background to the debate and the Second Reading that we shall undoubtedly give to the Bill.

Mr. Forth: Does not the point that my hon. Friend has made reinforce the fact that the European Court of Human Rights in its judgment is as far from the opinion of the people of this country as many of us have suggested? Is that not the problem that the Government have had to face? How does he relate the results of the opinion poll that he has given with the court's judgment?

Mr. Dunn: I do not intend to do so tonight, if my hon. Friend will forgive me. I am sure that his remarks about the European Court of Human Rights will be noted by my right hon. and hon. Friends who have responsibility for those matters.

Mr. Fisher: We are overcome by the Under-Secretary's theatrical and seductive winks to the Opposition Front Bench. When he is taking these straw polls in his constituency, does he consult teachers and head teachers? Will he confirm that the vast majority of those whom he is expecting to administer corporal punishment are against the Bill?

Mr. Dunn: If I thought that were the case, I should be the first to admit it. The hon. Member has known me long enough to accept that. I am conscious that last year a sample poll mounted by NOP for The Times Educational Supplement showed 52 per cent. of teachers interviewed to be in favour of retention, compared with 36 per cent. in favour of abolition. In the north, and the midlands where the hon. Member has his constituency, the comparative figures were 64 per cent. and 27 per cent.

Mr. Radice: Is any teachers' trade union in favour of the Bill?

Mr. Dunn: I dare say that if I researched for long enough, I might find one. However, the question that the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) should address is whether those trade union leaders are acting in the interests of the members they purport to represent. Probably they are not doing so.

The Bill is before the House because of a judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Campbell and Cosans. We cannot accept some judgments and discard others, picking and choosing between those that we like and those that we do not like. The case was vigorously defended by the United Kingdom, but the judgment went against us. We have an obligation to abide by the judgment of the court, and that obligation will be fulfilled by the scheme that the Bill introduces. Failure to act would place us in breach of a treaty obligation and expose us to the possibility of a succession of cases under the European convention on human rights and the further possibility of compensation awards.

Mr. Silvester: I am sorry to give my hon. Friend such cause for pause, but if he feels that we are under an obligation, are not the Government also under an obligation—before we commit ourselves to a Bill which my hon. Friend has hardly defended with vigour—to provide time for the House, for the first time in history, to make a judgment on whether we wish the European Court of Human Rights to operate in that way?

Mr. Dunn: My responsibility tonight is to steer the Second Reading debate to a satisfactory conclusion. The matters to which my hon. Friend refers are for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, whose attention to such matters is known to all.

We cannot pick and choose between judgments, and we must act to give effect to the ruling. Our obligations on the matter date back to 1951, when the Government of the day accepted the court's jurisdiction in cases brought by another state in which the prior agreement of this country had been obtained. In 1966, the Labour Government accepted the right of individuals to make complaints under the convention. That acceptance has been renewed by successive Governments. The latest renewal was in January 1981 and was to last for five years. Consequently, we must give effect to the ruling.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dunn: I do not have much time. I apologise to the hon. Gentleman.

The Opposition parties would have preferred our action to take the form of abolishing corporal punishment. Opposition Members who have spoken tonight appear to be united in their determination to abolish corporal punishment, whether they belong to the Labour party, the Liberal party or the Social Democratic party.

Mr. Maclennan: Will the hon. Gentleman explain why no Scottish Minister has participated in the debate, even though the Bill applies to Scotland? Am I right in saying that Scottish Ministers are in total disagreement with the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. Friend, believing that corporal punishment should be abolished — advice that they have already given to local authorities?

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Gentleman is churlish. We have been supported throughout the debate by a representative of the Scottish Office.

Mr. David Young: Can the Minister name any education authority which supports the educational apartheid proposed in the Bill?

Hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Dunn: I had some difficulty in hearing the hon. Gentleman, but I undertake to answer his question in the fullness of time. I was not able to hear the hon. Gentleman's speech, but if he asked that question during the course of it, I undertake to give him a genuine reply.

Mr. Home Robertson rose——

Mr. Dunn: I must press on.

Mr. David Young rose——

Mr. Dunn: I have many questions to answer.

The Opposition parties have made it plain that they want corporal punishment abolished. We accept that the Bill is a response to the European Court's ruling. It deals with some problems and not with others. The Labour party has made it plain that it would solve the problems facing us, if it were in government, by abolishing corporal punishment. It is consistent with the theme that we have heard often since I came to the House in 1979. Labour would abolish corporal punishment, private education, the assisted places scheme and local authorities' discretion whether to permit corporal punishment in their schools. The Labour party has the answer to everything—the abolition of circumstances in which people get together and do something of which the state does not approve.

Our theme has been consistent with the view of many parents and teachers in England and Wales who want the sanction of corporal punishment to be retained. We believe that the Government should not legislate to force abolition. That centralist line might appeal to Opposition Members, but it has no appeal to the Government.

The court's judgment was not about banning corporal punishment, but about the right of parents to exempt their children from such punishment. We have proposed such a right. We examined the alterntives carefully. On close examination, the possibility of some schools being able to use corporal punishment while others could not—the so-called dual system—proved utterly impractical. Having rejected abolition and the dual system, an exemption scheme was clearly the only practical solution. As we have said, it might not be perfect but criticism has greatly exaggerated the difficulties. An exemption scheme can work. Schools which wish to retain corporal punishment will make it work, and I am sure that the common sense of parents and schools will make an exemption scheme workable.

Some people have claimed that the system is unfair. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has exposed the weakness of that argument. Schools which wish to offer exemptions while retaining corporal punishment should be free to do so. That is the basis of the Bill. It confers rights, whereas Opposition Members, who made it clear that they are committed to abolition, would like to withdraw rights.

Several detailed questions have been asked and some of them are matters for consideration in Committee. I look forward to joining battle in Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford referred to a dual system. I am sure that the House agrees that such a system would be costly and difficult to administer. It would entail virtually doubling existing provision so that parents could gain respect for their convictions without losing the range of school choice that they have now. That would be impossibly expensive. Moreover, such a system would create practical day-to-day difficulties in the allocation of pupils to schools. Indeed, the problems for local education authorities, especially those serving country districts, would be colossal. The House would need to face the fact that children in a particular school would have to be treated differently because of the change of status in that school. That would pose unique and particular problems for the parents of those children during that difficult transitional period.

Hon. Members referred to the problems of cost and asked whether the scheme would be expensive to administer. We accept that it will involve extra work for schools which attempt to administer the scheme.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury asked about the children of military or diplomatic personnel who are being educated in the private sector. Public moneys received for that purpose will be regarded as emoluments of salary and will therefore not be covered by the Bill. We took clear legal advice on that matter. I hope that my hon. Friend, who has a great interest in that matter, will be happy with my explanation.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough asked what the Bill meant for children in receipt of assisted places. We envisage that the question whether a child should be liable to corporal punishment will be put to parents after the pupil has been accepted by the school. If the parents of such a child seek exemption, the school will be obliged to respect their wishes.

Independent schools will be free, but not obliged, to offer the choice of exemption to all parents. The hon. Member for Hillsborough mentioned the stigma that may be attached to assisted-place children. His interpretation and general thrust are wrong. There is no stigma attached to being a recipient of a right. The parents of an assisted-place pupil will have a right which will be embodied in legislation. I accept that some independent schools will extend that right to all parents. In such circumstances, the assisted-place pupil will not be distinguished from others.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North referred to the problem of parents changing their minds. There will be a requirement for some delay—a few days—before a change of mind in favour of exemption can come into force. My hon. Friend also asked what would happen if the school changed its policy. He accepts, as I do, that a school can change its policy at any time, but clearly it will not wish to continue to change its approach.

This has been an interesting and thoughtful debate. We were invited earlier to join battle in Committee. As I have already made clear, I relish the prospect of victory both in Committee and tonight. I promise hon. Members whose points I have not answered that I shall answer them. I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the Opposition amendment and in favour of this important legislation.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Bill read a Second time and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Brunei and Maldives Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. —[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

EDUCATION (CORPORAL PUNISHMENT) BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other Act.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

Brunei and Maldives Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Renton): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The purpose of the Bill, which has been approved in another place, is to make minor amendments to certain United Kingdom enactments to take account of the recently acquired status of Brunei and the Maldives as members of the Commonwealth. It will have no effect on the laws of Brunei and the Maldives.

Britain's historical connections with those two countries are particularly interesting. The sultanate of Brunei first entered special treaty relations with the United Kingdom in 1846 and subsequently enjoyed the status of a protected state until 1971. Subsequently, the United Kingdom continued to exercise direct responsibility for Brunei's external relations until 31 December 1983. On that date, Brunei resumed her status as a sovereign and independent state and was admitted to the Commonwealth with effect from 1 January 1984.

Britain's connections with the Maldives date back to the 18th century when, on taking possession of Ceylon, we extended our protection to the Maldives. In 1948, the Maldives were granted self-government, but the United Kingdom continued to maintain control of their external relations. In 1965, the Maldives became a fully independent sovereign state outside the Commonwealth but were admitted to the Commonwealth, at their own request, as a special member in July 1982.

Brunei and the Maldives are thus united in their membership of the Commonwealth. They are both small in area and in population and predominately Moslem, but in many respects they are strikingly different and they have their own roles to play.

As the House knows, Brunei has been endowed with abundant resources of petroleum and natural gas. The associated revenues make her one of the wealthiest nations in Asia, with substantial foreign reserves. She is actively developing an individual foreign policy commensurate with her economic strength as a member of the United Nations, the Commonwealth and the Association of South-East Asian Nations. Brunei is already playing her part with her ASEAN partners — Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand — in contributing towards promoting stability in south-east Asia.

At a time when Brunei has been taking up her international role in the United Nations and within ASEAN, we are particularly proud of the fact that she has elected to join the Commonwealth and will continue to maintain her close traditional ties with the United Kingdom. We attach importance to assisting in the continued development of Brunei. Britain has long provided teachers and other experts for Brunei, and about 2,000 Brunei students are studying in Britain. We retain major investments in the Brunei economy, particularly in the vital energy sector. We are a major trading partner.

Through those various channels we keep in the closest contact with modern day Brunei, thus preserving a tradition extending back for more than a century. Then, as now, both Brunei and we have benefited from our happy association.

[Mr. Tim Renton]

The Maldives, on the other hand, have been endowed with one of the most idyllic locations in the Commonwealth, as an ever-increasing number of British tourists are finding out for themselves. As Lord Alport was moved to say in another place:

"You will certainly find there a very hospitable, very delightful and very attractive people to meet and you will find as well charming islands and a charming environment."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 20 November 1984; Vol. 457, c. 513.]

We remember with much pleasure that President Gayoom made a successful visit to Britain in May 1982, as a guest of the Government, during which he called on the Prime Minister, lunched with Her Majesty the Queen and announced the Maldives' application for membership of the Commonwealth. We were pleased to welcome him back to London in June 1984 and were delighted that he was able to address the Royal Commonwealth Society conference on the important and appropriate subject of small states in the Commonwealth.

Our long association with Brunei and the Maldives has made our relationship with both particularly close. It remains so now that they are independent, as was demonstrated by the warm reception that the Bill received in another place. Many noble Lords described their connections with both Brunei and the Maldives and expressed their good wishes to both countries.

I know that those sentiments are shared by many hon. Members on both sides of the House. In particular, I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris), who is sorry that he cannot be here, has expressed personal interest in, and support for, the Bill.

Therefore, it gives us great pleasure to welcome the admission of Brunei and the Maldives to the Commonwealth—a process on which the Bill puts the seal. We are confident that we shall continue to build on our long-standing friendship with both countries.

The amendments which the Bill makes to United Kingdom enactments follow the precedents of the Papua New Guinea, Western Samoa and Nauru (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1980 and the New Hebrides Act 1980. These precedents relate to countries which, like Brunei and the Maldives, required only such legislative provision as was consequent on their accession to membership of the Commonwealth.

In the case of former British colonies, the relevant independence Act passed on the achievement of independence, and almost simultaneous accession to the Commonwealth, includes these necessary amendments to other United Kingdom legislation which place the state on the same footing as other Commonwealth countries. However, both Brunei and the Maldives have achieved full sovereignty and membership of the Commonwealth without the need for such an independence Act.

Clause 1 and the schedule provide for the necessary modification of United Kingdom enactments. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the schedule provide for amendments to section 427(2) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 and to the Whaling Industry (Regulation) Act 1934. Because nationals of Brunei and the Maldives will be brought within the definition of "British subjects" in enactments passed before the coming into force of the 1981 Act, it is necessary to amend the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 and the Whaling Industry (Regulation) Act 1934 in such a way as to exclude Brunei and the Maldives from their application.

Paragraph 3 of the schedule provides for an amendment to the Imperial Institute Act, as amended by the Commonwealth Institute Act 1958. Brunei and the Maldives will thereby be included as countries which may be represented on the board of governors who are consulted when arrangements for the Commonwealth Institute are changed.

Paragraphs 4, 5, 6 and 7 of the schedule provide for amendments to Acts relating to Commonwealth forces and their discipline while on visits to the United Kingdom. These amendments make provisions for forces raised in Brunei and the Maldives similar to those which apply to forces raised in other Commonwealth countries.

Paragraph 8 provides for an amendment to the British Nationality Act 1981. The Maldives will be added to the list of Commonwealth countries under schedule 3 of that Act. Paragraph 8 applies to the Maldives only. The similar consequential change with regard to Brunei has already been effected by Order in Council.

I am sure that all hon. Members will wish to join Her Majesty's Government in welcoming the Bill. Although the amendments which it introduces have practical implications in only limited fields, they are changes which should be made if nationals of Brunei and the Maldives are to be given their proper Commonwealth status in this country.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): The Minister's warm words of welcome are shared by Opposition Members. It is a pleasant surprise of our Commonwealth history that two such different territories can be brought together in one Bill. It illustrates the unique nature of the historical development of our colonial or, in this case, quasi-colonial past.

Both countries, as the Minister said in what one might describe as his fascinating history lesson, went through a period as British protectorates, and for a time we were responsible for the external relations in both countries; both are somewhat artificial in geographic terms; both have populations fewer than 200,000 people; both are mainly Islamic in religion; and both have historic links with our military forces—one thinks of the problems we had in the mid-1970s in our relationship with Gan and of the Gurkha detachment in Brunei.

The similarities between the two territories end there. The Maldives with their 20 coral atolls depend on fishing and are relatively poor. Brunei with its oil wealth is per capita one of the richest countries in Asia. Brunei has, however, a number of problems. Behind the wealth and apparent stability there is, as I am sure most friends and observers note, a need to modernise its political structures. The elective parts of the constitution have been in abeyance for some time. Sadly, Brunei has a number of political prisoners. Brunei faces the problem faced by most Islamic countries—the need to work out its relationship, in terms of its laws and so on, in line with the new radical impulse of Islam.

Recently, there were difficult negotiations over the future of the Gurkhas. It would be helpful if the Under-Secretary of State explained whether there are any circumstances in which the Gurkha battalions — still under the control of the Ministry of Defence—could be used for internal purposes. In 1962, the Gurkhas were used to suppress the rebellion which followed the success of the Brunei People's party in the only democratic elections held in the territory in 1961. In another place, Lady Young, speaking on behalf of the Government, said that the presence of the Gurkhas contributed to the stability of Brunei and of the surrounding area. Is the Minister confident that the guidelines are sufficiently clear? Is he confident that, in an internal emergency, there would be no misunderstanding between Britain and the Sultan about the role that the Gurkhas can play at such a time?

There is much that is positive about development in the Maldives and Brunei and much that is to the credit of the Sultan's Government in terms of the development of welfare services and looking ahead to the period when the oil runs out. The Brunei people will then need to depend very much on their own resources, particularly agriculture. The fact that there is a lack of personal income tax makes other people in other countries jealous of Brunei.

The problem in Brunei is not shortage of cash but the lack of the trained human resources which are necessary for the development of that country. There is a shortage of key personnel and a need for technical assistance. I am pleased to note how much our Government and the Governments of neighbouring Commonwealth countries have done to assist Brunei in its technical development. The Under-Secretary of State referred to the fact that there are about 2,000 students from Brunei in Britain. It is especially gratifying to note that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and Malaysia and Singapore have given a helping hand to Brunei in training diplomatic personnel and in introducing Brunei, step by step, to international organisations. We are confident that that co-operation within the Commonwealth can be further developed.

As the Minister has said, the Bill is relatively minor and technical. It marks the fact that both territories have achieved their independence in a mood rather different from that to which we are accustomed with the majority of our Commonwealth countries. Hence, the Bill makes minor consequential changes to United Kingdom law, making a formality of the end of the quasi-dependent relationship. For example, under paragraph 8 of the schedule, the addition of the Maldives to the countries whose citizens are defined as Commonwealth citizens under the British Nationality Act 1981 will make no practical difference to that country.

We look forward to welcoming the two territories to full Commonwealth status, and we shall do all that we can to make them full members of the Commonwealth family. It is good to know that they see advantages in joining the Commonwealth. It illustrates the diversity which is, perhaps, the strength of the Commonwealth connection.

I understand that as yet no application has been made by either territory to join the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, but I am confident of their eventual membership. They will be welcome in that organisation. We wish both countries well. We look forward to continued co-operation within the Commonwealth family to our mutual benefit.

10.45 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Our welcome is no less enthusiastic for the Bill and the accession to the Commonwealth of these two states. I shall not emulate my noble Friend Lord Taylor who, when the matter was discussed in another place, was able to point to the fact that three generations of his family, culminating in his grandfather, had been made hereditary rulers of Sarawak by the Sultan of Borneo in the 19th century, an arrangement which lasted well into this century. I make no such claim.

I emphasise our enthusiastic support for Brunei's accession to the Commonwealth and for British relations with Brunei. There is a well-established trading relationship and Brunei has an increasing stake in the British economy. Strong trading relations must be maintained between our countries.

Brunei is the 49th full member of the Commonwealth. I hope that it will not be long before similar legislation is before us to welcome the 50th, which should be Namibia. The sooner the better, because that story has been going on for too long. The Maldives have been independent since 1965 and have special membership of the Commonwealth, enjoying all the benefits of membership without being involved in Heads of Government meetings. Both countries are small states, within the normal definition of that term, and 70 per cent. of the smaller states are members of the Commonwealth. Both must be aware that small, while being beautiful, can also mean being vulnerable. The matter of vulnerability was thrown into sharp relief by the Grenada crisis.

The Commonwealth Heads of Government have set in train a study of the special needs of small states including their defence and economic needs. The presence of the Gurkhas in Brunei and Brunei's interest in the protection of its territory has been mentioned.

We must also be aware of the economic vulnerability of the Maldives. It is a poor country, and we hope that it will benefit from the tourism, to which the Minister referred, and strong links with and support from Britain. Interest has been expressed about the development of permanent trade and political representation in London. We hope that that will come about.

The hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) mentioned the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. It has published a report on the security of small states and has explored the Commonwealth dimension in that. We must all hope that those ideas can be developed.

The Commonwealth is an extraordinary community of nations to which those two have been added. It covers more than one third of the world's population and one third of the nations with membership of the United Nations. The fact that on achieving independence so many of those territories have chosen freely to become members of the Commonwealth is remarkable and a great tribute to the Commonwealth's potential and possibilities.

There are links of language, culture, history and shared institutions, but we in Britain must remember how much we have to do to sustain that connection, and the arrival of two more states within the Commonwealth in recent years, of which this Bill is the culmination, should remind us of that. In all Government policy, whether we are talking about overseas students, broadcasting services to the Commonwealth or other policies, we must remember our side of the commitment to the Commonwealth and how much that should imbue every aspect of Government policy. We also hope that involvement in the Commonwealth will be the means of widening and spreading democracy in all its members.

Mr. Renton: I thank the hon. Members for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) and for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) for their interesting contributions to our short debate. The hon. Member for Swansea, East referred to the disparity between the two countries covered by the Bill. He was quite right, but what is interesting—the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed picked up this theme—is the fact that, despite that disparity, those two countries are now united not only in that both are independent and have a long association with this country but also in their membership of the Commonwealth. That is a striking feature of the Commonwealth.

Like the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, I read the speech made by Lord Tanlaw. It would be hard for any hon. Member of this House to emulate the close four-generation connection of the Brooke family with the development of Brunei, but what we can do is to show the high regard in which we hold the two countries in question. That is a tribute to the friendship between the United Kingdom and Brunei and the Maldives, and bodes well for our future relations.

The hon. Member for Swansea, East referred to the question of the Gurkhas. The Gurkha battalion is being retained in Brunei at the request of the Sultan. He believes —as do Her Majesty's Government—that its presence contributes to the stability of Brunei and the surrounding area. Other members of the Association of South-East Asian Nations have shown their understanding of the arrangement. The arrangement is also beneficial to the United Kingdom in that the battalion is found in rotation from the Hong Kong garrison and has, in Brunei, opportunities for training that are unavailable in Hong Kong. The battalion remains an integral part of the British Army, under the operational control of the Ministry of Defence. It is the intention that the battalion will normally remain in Brunei.

The Governments of the United Kingdom and of Brunei are committed to consult on matters of mutual concern under their treaty of friendship and co-operation of 1979. There should therefore be no possibility of misunderstanding such as the hon. Member for Swansea, East feared.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed rightly referred to the special needs of small states. That is a singularly appropriate point in reference to the Maldives. He will be pleased to note the encouraging progress made with the study commissioned at the 1983 Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in New Delhi, which the British Government continue strongly to support. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office made an initial contribution to the study for the Commonwealth Secretariat in June 1984 and our memorandum, published by the Select Committee in July, is the fullest statement to date of British policy in that area. The committee that was set up continues to make its inquiries and undertake its research, and we await with great interest the conclusions of the study.

It is probably worth stating that our basic approach is to emphasise the objective of prevention rather than cure, through greater regional co-operation by the small states themselves, the provision of technical assistance and training assistance for the armed and police forces, an active information policy, the promotion of political and cultural links and the maintenance of an adequate diplomatic presence in as many small states as possible. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed spoke in moving terms about the development towards democracy in many countries throughout the world and how many of them have become members of the Commonwealth. I am sure that the whole House wishes to welcome these two countries as members of the Commonwealth. I should like all hon. Members present to join me in expressing our desire that our close friendship with Brunei and the Maldives should be long and fruitful. We are proud to see them as fellow members of the Commonwealth and it is in that vein that I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

VE Day (40th Anniversary)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lang.]

10.57 pm

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I am glad of this opportunity to discuss in more detail than has hitherto been possible the celebration of the 40th anniversary of VE day.

I welcome the fact that the Government appear to have changed their earlier attitude. I tabled a question to the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in November last year, asking about the details of the anniversary celebrations. I was shocked to get a curt and peremptory reply from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, which ran:

"We have no present plans for any official British celebration of this anniversary."—[Official Report, 27 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 453.]

That struck me as unacceptable, so I pursued the matter by letter with the Foreign Secretary and eventually received a reply from the noble Lady, the Minister of State, which caused some consternation when it was published a couple of weeks ago. The most surprising and, to me, disappointing comment in that letter was her conclusion that the celebration of the 40th Anniversary of VE day, such as I had suggested, would be "at best nostalgic and at worst anti-German".

It may be my advancing years, but I cannot see much wrong with nostalgia, especially nostalgia for a momentous event in the lives of many people. It has become clear that many of our colleagues in the Federal Republic of Germany are not opposed to the idea of celebrating the 40th anniversary of VE day. Many of my friends there have made it clear that they are as anxious as any one else to celebrate the end of the Nazi regime. They point out, with considerable justification, that the first victims of the regime were Germans. They are glad to celebrate the sort of things which we have in mind.

I endorse what the Prime Minister has said and share her objectives in commemorating the 40th anniversary of VE day. As I understand it, she is saying that we should first pay tribute to those who gave their lives during the war. That is absolutely right. It is also right to emphasise the reconciliation that has taken place between ourselves and the nations that were our traditional enemies in Europe. We should celebrate 40 years of peace in Europe. We should give thanks for the new Europe which emerged from the old at the end of the war and in which nations which were for generations at each other's throats are now close allies. All those matters are worth celebrating.

I also wish to refer to VJ Day. I have received many letters from people who say, "We were the forgotten army in the far east. Do not let us be the forgotten army again at any celebrations". That is a fair point. I do not know whether it would be better to combine celebrations of the end of the war in the far east with celebrations of the end of war in Europe, or to have a simple, separate and wholly appropriate celebration at the appropriate time. Whatever we do, we must not give the impression that everything finished with the war in Europe and overlook the contribution of our countrymen who fought in the far east.

I wish to urge some aims and motives on the Government and to make some sensible suggestions. First, I wish to see the broadest possible celebrations and commemorations in the United Kingdom. Secondly, I hope that whatever we organise will be genuinely international in character and involve both our former enemies and allies.

The events should involve ordinary people. Ordinary families bore the brunt of the war and made the sacrifices demanded by it. Celebrations should not, therefore, be limited to national leaders, to the great and the good, but should involve a broad cross-section of ordinary people. We should seek the participation of the veterans of the war to whom we owe so much.

I hope, however, that we shall also try to involve young people. They have benefited from the peace, and our future depends on them. They sometimes fail to understand what the war was about, and how much we owe to those who fought it on our behalf. I hope that celebrations will not be limited to a national event at Westminster abbey or the Cenotaph, important though such a function may be. It would be a tragedy if the commemoration were London dominated. There must be local events, such as church services, which make clear the contributions of all communities, towns and villages, to the war effort.

I hope that the commemoration will be seen not simply as a solemn and serious occasion. It should undoubtedly have its solemn and serious content. However, my abiding recollection of VE day in 1945 is of street parties. I still feel the great sense of relief that the war was over. Street parties are part of our folklore. The ability to organise them passes from generation to generation. We do not do that often enough. We tend to do it on great occasions, such as coronations and jubilees. The 40th anniversary of VE day is a good basis on which to organise street parties. I know from my postbag that much work is being done in many communities, and I hope that the Government and local authorities will do all they can to encourage such a popular celebration.

This was not just a national war; it was a war that involved several of our allies. I have already mentioned the need for reconciliation and the need for the involvement of the Federal Republic of Germany and, indeed, the German Democratic Republic, if it wishes to be involved. We must also involve our allies, and the Americans will be an important element in the celebrations. I say that with self-interest, because I grew up in Lincoln during the war and I remember that Lincoln was surrounded by Royal Air Force and United States Air Force bases. Many Americans gave their lives, not only in the air force but in other forces, for our future in Europe. Clearly, Commonwealth nations should also have the opportunity to take part.

Perhaps the most controversial suggestion is that we should seek to involve the Soviet Union in the celebrations. There has been a suspicion that the Soviet Union will be restricted to ambassadorial involvement. I would not support such an approach, which would be a cold and formal involvement. I was interested to see the letter of 12 December from Lord Carrington to Mr. Martin Dent of the University of Keele, in which he endorsed the idea of an international celebration. He said:

"I have much sympathy with the view that it would be right to plan the celebrations in a way which emphasises the reconciliation between those combatants who are now partners in the Atlantic Alliance and the hopes which we all have for a more constructive relationship with the Soviet Union."

We should aim to achieve that in our commemoration of the 40th anniversary of VE day.

[Mr. John Cartwright]

I say that ambassadorial involvement will not be sufficient, because there was, and still is, an understanding in Britain of the extraordinary contribution of the Russian people to the winning of the second world war, and there is a case for a much more imaginative involvement of the Soviet people in the commemoration of the peace. It has been suggested that the sword of Stalingrad, which was forged in Britain as a token of the respect and admiration of the British people for the defence of Stalingrad, should return to Britain for display. That would be worth pursuing.

The most obvious example of British and American co-operation with the Soviet Union during the war were the Arctic convoys of British and United States merchant ships carrying desperately needed war materials to the Soviet Union between 1941 and 1943. Those convoys were concentrated in the winter months to take advantage of the bad weather and the darkness of the Arctic night in order to hamper Nazi attacks on the ships. The conditions must have been appalling, and many British and American lives were lost in the effort to supply the Soviet Union. By the end of 1942, 219 ships had reached Murmansk, but no fewer than 64 had been sunk. The convoy operation was a heavy burden on Britain. The responsibility of defending the ships against German aircraft and U-boats fell on Britain, and there was also the problem of providing the desperately needed equipment. By the end of 1942, Britain had provided no fewer than 1,793 tanks and 1,988 aircraft —far more than even the United States provided—and Britain's resources were clearly strained.

Sir Winston Churchill, in his history of the second world war, said:

"We gave our heart's blood resolutely to our valiant, suffering ally."

That episode in British-Soviet relations is worth recalling when we commemorate VE day. A reunion of survivors from all three nations would be a fitting part of any celebration, and perhaps one could organise a naval exchange, with ships from all three nations visiting each other's ports.

Another aspect of Anglo-Soviet co-operation that is worth recalling is the Aid to Russia Fund, launched in 1941 by the Red Cross and the Order of St. John. Mrs. Churchill, as she then was, the wife of the Prime Minister, accepted an invitation to head the organisation. Her first appeal was issued in October 1941. It was a very moving appeal. In that appeal Mrs. Churchill said:

"There is no one in this country whose heart has not been deeply stirred by the appalling drama now going on in Russia. We are amazed at the power of the Russian defence and at the skill with which it is conducted. We have been moved to profound admiration for the valour, the tenacity and the patriotic self-sacrifice of the Russian people. And above all, perhaps, we have been shaken with horrow and pity at the vast scale of human suffering."

That appeal, which was targeted to launch £1 million, was much more successful than that. Contributions came in from all sources. Lord Nuffield gave £50,000 to the appeal. The King and the Queen gave £1,000 specifically to assist the Russians. In fact, nearly £8 million was raised, the bulk of it in weekly subscriptions from ordinary people. To quote again from Sir Winston Churchill's official history:

"Thus through the powerful organisation of the Red Cross and St. John's and in spite of heavy losses in the Arctic convoys medical and surgical supplies and all kinds of comforts and special appliances found their way in unbroken flow through the icy and deadly seas to the valiant Russian armies and people."

That kind of achievement is worth recalling, perhaps by a reunion of those who helped to raise the money and organise the assistance with those in the Soviet Union who benefited from it.

Perhaps one might be more positive and suggest that we could commemorate the Aid to Russia fund by trying to found a new Anglo-Soviet fund to finance much needed medical projects in the Third world. Whatever we do, we should not lose this opportunity which the commemoration of VE day gives us to try to improve relations with the Soviet Union. That is very much of a motivating force now in British foreign policy. I suggest that there could be no better way to improve relationships than by trying to rekindle that spirit of co-operation that existed 40 years ago.

These suggestions are by no means intended to be exclusive. They represent some of the ideas that have been put to me by people in various parts of the country from all political persuasions. I perfectly understand that there may be many other ideas that are well worth pursuing, but if the 40th anniversary of VE day is to be commemorated it should certainly not be a half-hearted operation. It really should be in keeping with the momentous impact of the second world war and the personal sacrifice that that war demanded. It is in that sense that I commend these ideas to the Government and look forward with great interest to the Minister's reaction.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): I welcome the opportunity presented by the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) in initiating this debate to explain a little more fully the Government's thinking on this very important issue. I know of his early and genuine interest in VE day—it is perhaps fitting that the hon. Member's constituency has such an historic military connection. I visited Woolwich myself last September and I know that during the second world war the royal ordnance factory at Woolwich suffered 25 separate air raids. Despite this, the factory produced 11,000 artillery pieces, 14 million shells and no fewer than 1,350 million rounds of small arms ammunition—a truly remarkable achievement.

We have stated on a number of occasions that we have decided that the 40th anniversary of the end of the second world war should be marked by a national commemoration. We are particularly conscious of the high degree of public interest that there has been on this question and understand and sympathise with the feelings that have been expressed.

We are still considering the form that the commemoration should take and a number of options are being closely studied: I am sorry, therefore, that I cannot be specific tonight. A service of thanksgiving is one option that has been widely canvassed and we are sympathetic to the opportunity this would give for those who gave their lives to be honoured and for the spirit of peace and reconciliation to be stressed.

In planning the commemorations we are also carefully considering the nature and extent of representation from other countries. We shall, of course, take into account the views that have been expressed to us from various quarters, including those of the hon. Gentleman, before taking any decisions.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has already announced that there will be many representatives of foreign and Commonwealth Governments to whom we shall extend invitations to take part in the commemoration, either as high commissioners or as ambassadors, including those from the Federal Republic of Germany and the Soviet Union.

We shall, of course, wish to ensure that this does not become a divisive issue, or give grounds for offence to our allies, past or present. As the Prime Minister has said, we shall need to consult widely before determining the form of the occasion and before making final decisions.

We shall, as always, remember the contribution made by our allies in the second world war and our joint victory over tyranny—not least immense Soviet achievement and sacrifice. The USSR, we must remember, lost over 20 million dead in the second world war.

However, as the Prime Minister said in the House on 15 January, we shall aim in the commemoration to focus not only on the anniversaries but on the achievements of the last 40 years in preserving peace with freedom. We shall, of course, have very much in mind the reconstruction and reconciliation that has been achieved in this time. As we approach this 40th anniversary of the end of the second world war we are mindful that our adversaries at that time are now our allies, and are conscious of the considerable efforts that have been made to build constructively on the sacrifices of the war years and the achievement of reconciliation.

Concern has been expressed as to what the attitude of our close ally the Federal Republic of Germany will be to our holding VE day commemorations.

I should like to set out Chancellor Kohl's approach as spelt out at the press conference following the Prime Minister's recent meeting with him. I quote:

"I explained to the Prime Minister the specific psychological situation in the Federal Republic and I explained to her that two thirds of the population alive in the Federal Republic today do not, from their own experience, remember the terrible things that happened under the Hitler regime, because they were born after it, and it is important, therefore, for us to commemorate this day in being aware of the history of our people and remembering the terrible things that were done in the name of Germany, but is also —in this sense for us a day of liberation and at the same time we must remember all the suffering and all the dead, and so when we commemorate this we commemorate this date by turning inwards and thinking about our past and our future.

It is also important in remembering this zero hour in German history, we should remember the fact that the chance which was offered us at that time was used. We built up the Federal Republic and we have contributed to maintaining peace and freedom and progress for 40 years, and that is the very great achievement of the generation before us, and of course, in all this we must always think back to the by now almost legendary speech of Winston Churchill which he delivered in Zurich, which helped to lay the foundation for this future development."

Those were Chancellor Kohl's words.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear after her discussions with Chancellor Kohl, we see 1945 as a year which saw a new rebirth of freedom; a freedom which we must preserve for future generations.

I should also stress, and this will be reflected in the tone of the occasion, that VE day did not mark the end of the second world war and our commemorations will focus on the ending of the war both in Europe and in the far east and on the heroic sacrifice of the allied forces in all theatres.

Hon. Members have expressed the view in this House that those who fought in the far east should not be forgotten. I can reassure them that the gallantry those men displayed and the suffering and privations that they underwent are not forgotten; and that they will be equally honoured in our commemorations.

However, the hon. Gentleman has specifically referred in this short debate to Victory in Europe day, and I believe it would be appropriate to spend a few moments considering the events that have followed that victory.

In 1945 Europe had been torn apart by the devastating conflict that had embroiled its nations for six years. This year we are able to celebrate 40 years of continuous peace in Europe. It is not by chance that the longest period of peace in Europe this century has coincided with the existence of the Atlantic Alliance.

The overriding purpose of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation is the preservation of the principles of freedom and democracy. Its strength lies in the determination of its signatories to do all in their power to safeguard peace and international security, and in their willingness to work together in a wholly defensive alliance. It is a measure of the remarkable success that NATO has had in meeting its objectives that the 35 years of its existence have been marked by an unbroken period of peace in Europe. This has been at a time when we have been faced with the advent of weapons of unprecedented power. There has been conflict and unrest in one or more parts of the world more or less throughout the entire period, and there has been no weakening, indeed the opposite, in the challenge posed by the Soviet Union and her Warsaw Pact allies.

What, then, has been the key to the continued effectiveness of our transatlantic Alliance? There have, of course been difficulties and differences of opinion—this is natural in an alliance of independent nations. But it is the main strength of NATO that its members, with common aims and interests, can discuss and resolve their problems together. NATO is an association of free states, joined together to preserve their security by collective self-defence, and to strengthen peace by means of constructive dialogue. Our solidarity does not conflict with the ability of each country to pursue its own policies. We are a partnership of equals, with none dominant and none dominated, but we are committed to close consultation and co-operation in pursuit of our successful aims.

In addition to guaranteeing our security, we of course see the need to build the foundations of lasting peace, to develop balanced East-West relations and to contribute to peaceful progress worldwide. We shall continue to pursue these ends with our allies in NATO.

Probably three fifths of our population were born after the end of the Second World War, including many hon. Members of this House. I myself was born midway through the war in 1942. It is as easy for my own and following generations to forget the tyranny, the inhumanity, the bloodshed, the destruction and the suffering of the conflict as it is to be unaware of the fortitude, the courage and the bravery demonstrated by our forces and civilians and by those of our allies.

The peace and freedom which we in the West enjoy was not won easily and must never be taken for granted. We in this country have so much to be thankful for.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

Trident

1. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now announce his revised estimate of the cost of Trident.

2. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce the latest cost estimate of Trident.

6. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the most recent dollar-sterling exchange rate of which the review of Trident costs has taken account.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Michael Heseltine): Each year the long-term programme of my Department is re-costed as part of a planning process. Established convention indicates that I should assume a dollar exchange rate of £1 to $1·38. The updated Trident figure on this basis, and at average 1984-85 prices, is £9,285 million. Approximately 55 per cent. of the work by value is planned to be undertaken in the United Kingdom. I see no case for changing the conventions on which this Government and previous Governments have worked. However, in view of public interest, I am making available to the Select Committee on Defence and the Public Accounts Committee an indication of the effects of the changes in the exchange rates so that those wishing to predict exchange rate changes over the procurement period of the Trident programme will be able to do so at the exchange rate that they consider appropriate.

Mr. Strang: Will the Secretary of State admit that that cost is a gross underestimate, taking into account the current dollar-sterling rate? Will he further admit that the 55 per cent. figure in the United States is also an underestimate? Is it not outrageous that thousands of millions of pounds are to be spent in the United States on American technology and jobs? How can the right hon. Gentleman defend that situation to the millions of unemployed people in this country?

Mr. Heseltine: No doubt inadvertently, the hon. Gentleman has got the figures wrong. The figure that we believe to be right is about 55 per cent. of the cost in the United Kingdom, as opposed to 45 per cent. as the hon. Gentleman says. The issue is whether Britain needs its own independent nuclear deterrent, and whether the D5 Trident system is the appropriate one. That was the decision reached by the Government, and upon which they were elected. It would not be difficult to persuade the British people, employed or unemployed, that the security of these islands depends on Britain's independent deterrent and associated defence policies.

Mrs. Clwyd: The Secretary of State will no doubt recall telling the Select Committee on Defence on 22 May 1984 that the whole submarine will be built here. How can he say that when £17 million worth is being built in the United States and another so-called design contract costing $63 million has been given to General Dynamics Corporation? Does he not recognise that, to use a favourite phrase of the Government, he has a grossly uneconomic weapon, which should be scrapped forthwith?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Lady does not believe that Britain should have an independent nuclear deterrent, and nor does the Labour party, to which she belongs, but that party was soundly beaten in the election, one of the reasons being precisely that conviction. I do not have the record of my evidence to the Select Committee in front of me, but I shall check it. The submarine will be part of a contract that we intend to place with Vickers. We think that within that contract the American contribution could be about 10 per cent.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is there not a point at which the exchange rate will reach such an extreme that the missile system cannot be ordered without it causing immense damage to other conventional defence spending, unless the matter is fudged by extending the procurement life, presumably even beyond the life of the missile system?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman has asked two questions, the first of which concerns the changing assumptions in the period concerned. Ministers have given no authority to change the assumptions on which the costing has taken place. I have added a further instruction to my Department that there will be no change in the assumptions and that, subject only to security considerations, if there were in my view to be a need to change the assumption I would report that fact to the House. Otherwise, the position remains as it was when Sir John Nott first explained the circumstances relating to D5 to the House in March 1982. There will not be a spread, as has been suggested. I agree that trying to predict 18 or 20 years ahead for a programme of this type produces some elements of guesstimate at the tail end of the period.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the scale and impact of the programme on the defence budget. It is a very large programme, but the House will take account of the fact that, when the Tornado programme was in its early stages, it was a larger proportion of the defence budget, which, in turn, was smaller than it is now. I do not remember there being a great outcry from the Opposition that there was no way in which we could accommodate the Tornado programme in the smaller defence budget of the time.

Sir Anthony Buck: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important to emphasise that the programme will enable us to retain a capability which successive Governments have thought it appropriate for us to have and that more than half the money that is to be spent will be spent in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. and learned Friend is correct. He and the Government believe that an independent British nuclear deterrent is an essential part of the strategy that has kept the peace in Europe for a record period in contemporary history. As those policies patently have worked, and continue to work, we believe that they should be continued.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my right hon. Friend agree that cost can be assessed only in relation to effectiveness? Is he worried that the development of star wars defence systems might render Trident ineffective? Does that make a case for the development of alternative non-ballistic systems, which might also be cheaper?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend raises an important question, but the time scale in which those questions will be answered provides the answer to his question. The star wars project is a research project which will cover a period of time which will ensure that, even if the Americans determine to go ahead with the project—nobody knows whether they will have the capability or, in the end, will take such a decision—the fact remains that we should have Trident in service long before that. It would play a critical role in the defence of the West long before the star wars project could be implemented.

Mr. Steel: Will the Secretary of State confirm that three things have changed since the Government first took their decision: first, that the cash cost of the project has virtually doubled; secondly, that the time over which it is planned to repay it has been lengthened twice; and, thirdly, that the value of contracts to British industry has declined as a proportion of the total? Does he agree that those changes mean that we should re-examine the programme and decide whether, in the interests of British defence and industry, we should go for more spending on conventional defences?

Mr. Heseltine: The right hon. Gentleman will know that we have increased the defence budget by about £3,000 million in real terms and that that enhancement is broadly continuing into the future. It has given us vast extra resources, part of which will be spent on Trident. I have read the right hon. Gentleman's speeches in which he suggests that assumptions have been changed. How does he square that with the comments of my predecessor, Sir John Nott who said:

"I can confirm that we are talking about large numbers of jobs for British industry and a huge programme which will stretch over the period of 18 years."—[Official Report, 11 March 1982; Vol. 19, c. 979.]

If the right hon. Gentleman had the courtesy to reflect that statement in his speeches to the House, his facts would be more accurate than they are without such reference.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Trident programme is unique, in that the envisaged costing covers the whole programme and everything that is required for Trident? All other defence expenditure costing does not include everything. For example, the Tornado programme did not include hardened shelters and the other necessary facilities. The same is true of warships and everything else. Does my right hon. Friend agree that when people talk about the cost of Trident it is the whole cost, whereas for all other defence programmes it is not?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend has made a most important point. It is especially relevant to his example of the Tornado programme. It took up a bigger proportion of the defence budget. It was a more expensive programme on a lower defence budget. The costing for it gave us only an aircraft that could fly. The weapons systems with which it had to be equipped and the infrastructure from which it would fly had to be added to the cost. That shows dramatically that, although the cost of Trident is large, because it is of such significance to the defence of the United Kingdom it is containable in our much larger defence budget.

Mr. Duffy: Even if the Secretary of State can contain the financial cost of Trident, is he not incurring greater opportunity costs in terms of the Alliance's real needs, which, on the military side, are sustainability in Europe and, on the political side, conventional initiatives that will raise the nuclear threshold? Is he not in danger of appearing to behave as irrelevantly to the real needs of the Alliance with his Trident programme as President Reagan is with his star wars programme?

Mr. Heseltine: It was precisely because the Government wanted to increase conventional capability that we took decisions which have added £3,000 million to the defence budget in real terms. Precisely for the reasons that the hon. Gentleman has put forward so articulately, we could not understand the proposal to reduce the defence budget by one third, on which he campaigned at the general election.

Sir John Farr: I recognise the importance of Trident to us, but is my right hon. Friend aware that it would be much easier to support this policy if there were a bigger percentage of home-produced content in the weapon? Will he re-examine the weapon's control system to see whether it is possible for British contractors to quote for that part of the contract?

Mr. Heseltine: I agree with my hon. Friend that it would be attractive if, in the concept of the two-way street, there were a larger United Kingdom component in the Trident programme. It was one of the many contracts in existence when we joined, and it is extremely difficult for contractors to break into a pattern of industrial organisation of that sort. Attempts are being made and a significant number of companies are involved in the process, although not as many as I should like. That has to do with the companies themselves, not just with the attitudes of the British or American Governments. I would not want to pretend that, where we had to make a major decision about this uniquely important defence system, we were able to negotiate offset arrangements of the sort that characteristically we would want. Whereas on the concept of the two-way street the Government have a 2:1 adverse ratio, in the not-too-distant history it was a 4:1 adverse ratio.

Mr. Denzil Davies: In case the Secretary of State has not heard this news, let me tell him that the pound is not standing at $1·38 but is hovering around $1·10. That puts another £700 million, as he well knows, on the figure that he has given to the House. Therefore, the figure is £10 billion, not the £9·2 billion that he mentioned. Why does the right hon. Gentleman make himself look so ridiculous by pretending that all that money can be found without making substantial and savage cuts in Britain's real defences? Apart from a perverse vanity, what is the point of going ahead with this weapon, which no rational person could contemplate using, and which, if it were used, would turn our island into a pile of irradiated rubble?

Mr. Heseltine: Are we to gather from the right hon. Gentleman's statement that the nuclear weapons which the Labour Government thought so necessary were useful, whereas the Trident programme is not? The Labour Government consistently maintained Britain's indepedent deterrent and, in secret, modernised it through the Chevaline process. Yet this Government, who are merely continuing the same programme, have apparently lost that support.

Experimental Aircraft Project

3. Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the present standing of the experimental aircraft project.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Adam Butler): The experimental aircraft programme is a joint venture by the Ministry of Defence and industry to bring together and demonstrate in one aircraft specific advance technologies which will be applicable to a variety of advanced aircraft. The design and construction of the experimental aircraft are progressing satisfactorily and it is on schedule for first flight in 1986.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Is the Minister aware of the urgent need for a fighter aircraft? Will he make a decision on the European fighter in March? If not, in the interests of defence, the RAF and the work force, will he go it alone?

Mr. Butler: I am interested in the fact that the hon. Gentleman has managed to switch the question to one about the European fighter aircraft, about which a question will follow soon. The experimental aircraft is not a prototype for the European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will my right hon. Friend try to obtain data from this most important technology demonstrator and pool the data with that obtained from the French on the ACX aircraft, since both experimental aeroplanes will provide the technology needed for the Euro fighter, which we all hope will form the front line of the five air forces which have agreed joint staff targets?

Mr. Butler: I am glad that my hon. Friend has pointed to the advantages of and need for collaboration in such matters. I hope that what he suggests will be possible.

Mr. McNamara: Can we expect the French to share their research secrets with us, when the French Government have allocated nearly three times as much money to the ACX project as we have allocated to the European fighter aircraft project? Why will the Government not invest more money, in the interests of British industry and jobs?

Mr. Butler: Again, we are straying into the question about the European fighter aircraft. I can only refer to the understanding that exists with regard to collaboration in aircraft matters. If we are to go ahead with the project, it will be essential to exchange technological information.

Nuclear Missiles

4. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, in the light of the recent accident involving American service men handling Pershing II missiles in Germany, he will review safety precautions for handling missiles with nuclear warheads in transit in the United Kingdom.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Stanley): As I told the hon. and learned Member on 13 November, the arrangements for the safe transport of nuclear weapons remain constantly under review.

Mr. Janner: Recognising, as I hope the Government do, the anxieties about the dangers inherent in the handling and transport of nuclear missiles, will the Minister answer a simple question: are local fire and police authorities informed when missiles are to pass through their areas?

Mr. Stanley: As I told the hon. and learned Gentleman previously, guidance is issued to some chief constables and fire officers. I cannot go further than that, because it is not the Government's policy, any more that it was our predecessor's policy, to give any information about the routes or methods of transport of nuclear weapons.

Mrs. Currie: With regard to the movement of nuclear weapons and their resting places, did my hon. Friend notice the comments of Mr. Roger Spiller, the male vice chairman of the CND, that the campaign at Molesworth, unlike the unsuccessful campaign at Greenham common, will not be left to women this time because "Molesworth is more important than Greenham common"? Does my right hon. Friend agree that that shows that the philosophies and practices of the CND are not only wrong and foolish, but sexist to boot?

Mr. Stanley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I assure her that the addition of a male element will make this campaign no more successful than the previous one.

FH70 Ammunition

5. Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning FH70 ammunition procurement.

Mr. Butler: Deliveries of FH70 ammunition began in 1978 and procurement of certain kinds is continuing. The allocation of work on the FH70 programme is governed by a memorandum of understanding agreed by the participants to the programme.

Mr. McWilliam: Is it not a matter of some concern that the FH70 ammunition, which was due from Germany at the beginning of December, appears not yet to be available to us? It is three months late.

Mr. Butler: There have been some delays, due to problems in the Defence Procurement Executive of the German Government, but that does not alter the position with regard to the placing of the order. Much as I would have liked it to go to the royal ordnance factories, it was out of the question that it should do so under the terms of our understanding.

Mrs. McCurley: In the light of my right hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam), can he tell us whether the final cost of the contract for the FH70, which has gone to Germany, will be more than it would have been had the contract been carried out in this country?

Mr. Butler: I understand that the prices are competitive in this matter.

Mr. McNamara: As the ammunition is used in the main battlefield Howitzer, will the Minister of State give an undertaking that it is not the intention now or in the future to adapt the Howitzer to take either nuclear warheads or the enhanced radiation weapons?

Mr. Butler: I can give the hon. Gentleman a categorical no. If I am mistaken, I shall let him know.

Mr. Merchant: In regard to the FH70 order, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the excellent record and delivery times furnished by the royal ordance factory at Birtley for previous FH70 orders and compare these with the apparent unreliability of the German source?

Mr. Butler: I have explained that the delays which have occurred in regard to the project have been within the Defence Procurement Executive, not, so far as I am aware, within German industry. Nevertheless, I am prepared to pay tribute to the royal ordance factory in the way that my hon. Friend would like.

Nuclear Tests (Radiation)

7. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the evidence given by his Department to the Australian Royal Commission currently in London investigating the safety of the United Kingdom nuclear test programme in the 1950s.

Mr. Butler: Her Majesty's Government are co-operating as fully as practicable with the Australian Royal Commission. Twenty-five witnesses are being assisted to give evidence to the commission. They include high-ranking staff who were in responsible positions during the test programme, and the first to be called was Lord Penney. The Ministry of Defence has also made available a large number of trials and other reports and is providing the commission with access to and guidance on the massive volume of contemporary material relating to the test programmes.

Mr. Hamilton: Have not the Government been criticised by the commission for refusing access to certain documents which it thought were vital? If so, is this not another example of the Government being more concerned to avoid political embarrassment than to show concern for national security?

Mr. Butler: No. On the contrary, we have gone out of our way to be helpful. We have released documents ahead of the 30-year rule; we have given members of the commission access to Aldermaston; and we have assisted them in looking at the material. But—and I hope the hon. Gentleman will agree with me—quite rightly we are witholding information which is still classified, and for good reason.

Sir John Farr: When will the report on the tests being conducted by my right hon. Friend's Department into British service personnel who were in that area in the 1950s be available, and when will the findings of the tests and analyses be published?

Mr. Butler: The report will not be available until the autumn of 1986, due to its complexity. There would be no point in having the report if the findings were not made generally available.

Scottish Junior Soldiers

8. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received concerning Government proposals to transfer the training of Scottish junior soldiers to England.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): Representations have been received on this subject from Members of both Houses of Parliament, representatives of local authorities and from members of the public.

Mr. Bruce: Will the Minister acknowledge that he and his colleagues have totally failed to make a case for the proposed closure and that the only case they have made is that they will save £3·382 million? In the context of the defence budget, is that not a paltry sum to end 200 years of starting the training of junior infantry men within Scotland? Will he reverse the decision and continue to ensure that Scottish regiments' recruits for the infantry are trained within Scotland?

Mr. Lee: I know of the hon. Gentleman's interest in this matter, but the closure of Bridge of Don is part of an overall scheme which will reduce the number of establishments from 21 to 13 and save about 100 civilian jobs overall and £8 million worth of capital costs, and also substantial running costs. The decision has been taken and it is irrevocable.

Mr. Pollock: Does the Minister appreciate that these proposals continue to cause grave disquiet among many of my constituents, who remain deeply unhappy at the prospect of losing an important visible regimental link at Bridge of Don? Is it not a fact that the argument on unit costs could be transformed by a simple policy change whereby more junior training took place at Bridge of Don rather than elsewhere? Will he examine that option carefully before any final step is taken?

Mr. Lee: I understand my hon. Friend's concern, which he has expressed on a number of occasions in public and in private. We have looked at all the options. In 1983-84, 183 recruits went through Bridge of Don, whereas 785 went through the Shorncliff establishment in Kent, so there is really no comparison.

European Fighter Aircraft

9. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the proposed European fighter aircraft.

14. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current position of collaborative negotiations on the proposed European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Butler: The feasibility study on the European figher aircraft is continuing and we expect to receive reports on the outcome of the industrial aspects of that study shortly. Discussions are also proceeding at Government level on a range of activities affecting the programme. Defence Ministers will meet in the spring to review the latest position.

Mr. Thorne: May we be assured that, should we go ahead with the production of a European fighter aircraft, a major portion of the production work will take place in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Butler: If we follow precedent in this matter, the work sharing will be according to the number of aircraft that the respective air forces need.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Will my right hon. Friend accept that rumours of a deferment of the meeting of Defence Ministers of the countries likely to be involved in the project, originally scheduled for the spring, respresent yet more success for the French, one of whose objectives seems to be to delay this project at any costs either to the benefit of their industry or to the detriment of ours? Does he appreciate that, in those circumstances, British Aerospace and other potential partners on the United Kingdom side are expecting a firm stand to be taken when the meeting eventually takes place?

Mr. Butler: I said in my main answer that the Defence Ministers intend to meet in the spring to review progress and that the results of the study will be available shortly. That being the case, I hope that we can make progress on this matter. On the other hand, anybody with experience of the project will know that difficulties have arisen in the past, that compromises have been necessary and that there may be considerable argument before we can decide whether to go on to the next stage. It is the intention of the Government as a whole to make this collaborative project work if we can because it will be to the advantage of our Air Force and industry.

Dr. Marek: Will the Minister confirm that the basic weight of this aircraft should be between 10 tonnes and 11 tonnes, because it would then be likely to meet the operational requirements of the RAF?

Mr. Butler: No, Sir. The work is being done around a weight of 9½ tonnes, with some opportunity to investigate a variant on that.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Is my right hon. Friend aware that as up to 800 of these aircraft could eventually be produced for the countries interested in obtaining them, this is a matter of enormous importance for the development of future technology and employment prospect in Britain, especially for companies interested in tendering under the programme?

Mr. Butler: The sales prospects for this aircraft within NATO and to third countries will be greater if it proceeds as a collaborative venture than if, for instance, we are forced back on to a unilateral solution.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is considerable concern in the aircraft industry lest this project ends in fiasco? Is he further aware of the feeling in the industry that the Secretary of State for Defence is being led by the nose by the French? Is it not a fact that the requirements of the French air force and of the RAF are different, in that the RAF wants a combat fighter while the French want a ground attack fighter? Will he now say whether, if the project is cancelled and does not go ahead, we will build our own aircraft?

Mr. Butler: I shall certainly not answer the last part of that supplementary question directly because, first, it is our intention to try to make the project succeed, and, secondly, if we cannot go ahead with all the partners which are at present involved, it obviously makes sense to see whether it would be sensible to proceed with other partners. My judgment is that industry in Britain is much more realistic and pragmatic about this matter than is the right hon. Gentleman.

Joint Defence Consultative Process

10. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the developments within the Western European Union of the joint defence consultative process originally proposed last summer.

Mr. Heseltine: Yes. The Rome meeting of Western European Union Foreign and Defence Ministers last October was an excellent start. I am looking forward to the next meeting with my WEU colleagues later this year.

Mr. Dykes: I thank my right hon. Friend for his answer. Does he think that, apart from the framework of the discussions, this process is capable of producing beneficial side effects and results — as, for instance, British weapons sales to the French in greater measure? Is my right hon. Friend optimistic that we may be able to sell the ALARM missile system to the French?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend will be aware that one of the matters about which the Ministers gathered in the WEU felt strongly was that we should not indulge in overlapping with other or existing organisations. Arms collaboration with our allies—the French would feature prominently in that collaboration—is very much seen as the preserve of the independent European programme group, where we have recently taken decisions and hope to move forward on a very significant range of collaborative projects.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: Can my right hon. Friend say to what extent he wants the WEU to evolve into a uniquely European voice upon defence and arms limitation matters?

Mr. Heseltine: I believe that the Ministers from all the countries who attended that meeting realised that there were a range of reasons that brought us together. It was very much a formative experience for Foreign Ministers and Defence Ministers to meet one another. There is shortly to be another meeting. I have no doubt that in both that forum and a range of other appropriate fora, arms control will be a very live issue in 1985.

Mr. O'Neill: Does the Secretary of State agree that the French are very much cooling off with regard to the suggested new liaison and that it is very unlikely that the optimism he has displayed will prove to be of any import? The important element is the French, and the French are no longer willing and happy to participate in this exercise.

Mr. Heseltine: The Labour party has been so unsuccessful in speaking on behalf of the British people that I am not surprised that it should now speak on behalf of the French. I doubt whether its views will be any more attractive in France than they are in Britain.

Chemical Weapons

11. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the implications for United Kingdom defence policy of the stockpile of chemical weapons by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and its allies.

16. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's defensive capability against chemical weapons.

Mr. Heseltine: We view the massive Soviet chemical weapons capability with particular concern. We believe that total abolition is the best answer and are continuing to work in Geneva for a comprehensive, verifiable and worldwide ban on such weapons, including the destruction of existing stocks. In parallel, we keep our defensive measures under careful review in the light of the threat. A substantial investment has been made over many years to provide our armed forces with defensive protection against chemical attack.

Mr. Greenway: Can my right hon. Friend shed any light on why the Soviet Union is currently running heavy troop training programmes in protective clothing for chemical warfare, bearing in mind that this country abandoned chemical weapons nearly 30 years ago, that none are deployed currently in Western Europe and that the Soviet Union has at this moment 300,000 tonnes of chemicals for military use?

Mr. Heseltine: I am the first to share my hon. Friend's anxiety about the training exercises in which the Soviet Union involves itself, including those involving chemical weapons. I believe that it would be far better employed in pursuing as actively as we and our American allies wish to pursue the arms control proposals that are on the table.

Mr. Proctor: Bearing in mind that when, in the late 1950s, the United Kingdom renounced the offensive use of chemical weapons there was no similar response from the Soviet Union, what are the present prospects for the success of the talks?

Mr. Heseltine: I am sure that my hon. Friend will understand that it is extremely difficult to forecast accurately the prospects for success in arms control talks. All that one can say on behalf of this Government is that we shall make every endeavour to bring those talks to a fruitful conclusion.

Mr. James Lamond: Will the "every endeavour" that we are prepared to make include trying to convince the Americans that the challenge inspection facilities of chemical manufacturing plants should be extended to all plants, whether or not they are state-owned?

Mr. Heseltine: If the hon. Gentleman follows the details he will be aware that the Americans have explained their attitudes on this, which will have an effect upon a wide range of plants in the United States outside those owned by the Government.

Mr. Conway: Is my right hon. Friend happy with the priority that is given in our armed services to nuclear, biological and chemical training? Does he anticipate the early introduction of the next generation of NBC protective clothing?

Mr. Heseltine: I can assure my hon. Friend that we maintain our research into those matters and update the equipment as appropriate from time to time. I cannot tell the House that I am satisfied with the existing situation. I do not see how any Secretary of State for Defence could be when a country, in alliance, that poses the threat to our interest has such large stocks of chemical weapons and we have none.

Mr. McNamara: Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the United States has stocks of chemical weapons in Germany? Is he aware that the Opposition support wholeheartedly attempts by Her Majesty's Government to obtain a comprehensive ban on all chemical weapons and any efforts being made to improve the capability of NBC protective uniforms? What lessons have been learnt from Operation Lionheart in that respect?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the United States' stocks of chemical weapons are of a very aged character, that there has been no updating of those stocks for a significant period and that they are of a limited scale. We are still studying the lessons of Lionheart in our Department. As I have already said, we shall continue to research and update the protective equipment in that area.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Secretary of State confirm that it will be no part of the review that he announced earlier to allow the Americans to stockpile chemical weapons in British bases?

Mr. Heseltine: I have no proposals of that sort before me.

Ethiopia (RAF Aircraft)

12. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will extend the Ethiopian tour of duty of Royal Air Force transport planes for a further three months.

Mr. Stanley: Our offer to extend the airlift to the end of March and to review the position again nearer that time has been accepted by the Ethiopian Government. I am glad to tell the House that the British RAF and Army detachment in Ethiopia has now airlifted some 6,000 tonnes of relief supplies, and has taken part in recent trials in the air dropping of supplies to more inaccessible parts of the famine area.

Mr. Wallace: I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House will pay tribute to the work done by the RAF. The public, having responded so well to the appeals that have been made, think that it is important, both for distribution purposes and psychologically, that the Government continue their commitment. Will the Minister give the House more reassurance about the future extent to which food can be taken to the Tigré and Eritrea regions of Ethiopia by the RAF?

Mr. Stanley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he said about the contributions made by the armed services. Undoubtedly, they have been strikingly effective in the utilisation of the two Hercules that we have out there. We shall continue the dropping operation by conventional landing techniques, but, as I have said, we have just started exploring the possibility of air dropping. Whether we shall be able to do that will depend upon whether we can put together arrangements for the landing of ground parties, which is obviously crucial when dropping by free fall.

Sir Hector Monro: Will my right hon. Friend go further and warmly congratulate the Hercules squadron —both the aircrew on their exceptional airmanship and the ground crew on their exceptional servicing record— thus keeping the squadron going on short runways and in difficult conditions, and thereby playing an important part in the relief of this difficult part of east Africa?

Mr. Stanley: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. I can certainly bear witness, from my experience out there just before Christmas, of the difficult landing and take-off conditions which the RAF has successfully dealt with, not least in coping with the considerable problems represented by the bird strikes, which took out about 9ft of the leading edge of one of the wings of the Hercules just before Christmas. All concerned have done outstandingly well.

Mr. O'Neill: I congratulate the Government on their work, but will the Minister confirm that the cost of the work is being borne by the Ministry of Defence and will not come out of the Overseas Development Administration budget?

Mr. Stanley: No, that is not quite correct. For the first three months of our contribution the costs were borne exclusively by the Ministry of Defence, on the defence budget. With the extension of the operation from the beginning of February, we have agreed to share the costs equally between the Overseas Development Administration and the Ministry of Defence.

Royal Observer Corps

13. Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he last reviewed the role and resources of the Royal Observer Corps; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The role and resources of the Royal Observer Corps are kept under regular consideration in conjunction with the Home Office. The corps continues to provide an excellent service and there are no present plans for a review.

Mr. Taylor: While I thank my hon. Friend for his reply, may I ask him to say whether he is committed to sustaining the resources and morale of those who serve the Royal Observer Corps, and will he from time to time say how the great majority of the British people appreciate its vigilance?

Mr. Lee: I am delighted to have this opportunity of paying tribute to the Royal Observer Corps. Its morale is excellent. It does a first-class job for us. There are 11,000 serving members at present and the corps costs less than £5 million a year. It is a first-class unit.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Dykes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 January.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Dykes: As there still is great public anxiety on the subject, will my right hon. Friend undertake this afternoon to look at the subject again and reassure the House and the nation that the Government will look twice at the dangers of imposing any additional forms of taxation on pension funds or lump sum payments?

The Prime Minister: I recognise the concern about this subject. I refer my hon. Friend to the statement that was made in the House, in response to questions, by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As my hon. Friend will be the first to appreciate, I cannot say anything more at the present time, but I do urge him to look at that statement by my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Kinnock: Three weeks ago the Government were against the idea of increasing interest rates to defend sterling, but they did increase them and it did not work. Two weeks ago the Government scorned the idea of intervening to defend sterling, but they did intervene and it did not work. Can the Prime Minister tell us what she is going to do now?

The Prime Minister: I recall the right hon. Gentleman saying on 15 January that he was absolutely against speculation against the pound and that he thought it was "irresponsible and irrational". If that is what he thought then, I hope that that is what he thinks now, and that he thinks that the action that has been taken to stop this is right and well judged in the circumstances.

Mr. Kinnock: I do think it irresponsible and irrational, but it is the right hon. Lady who believes in the market system and not us. Her response again today will impress nobody, either at home or abroad. It is the right hon. Lady who has surrendered policy-making entirely to the whims of the market. The result is chaos, a crisis of confidence and a huge rise in interest rate burdens on both business borrowers and home buyers. Is the right hon. Lady going to change her policies in the light of that experience, or will she go on with the same mixture of panic and paralysis that has brought us to this mess?

The Prime Minister: I am not quite sure whether the right hon. Gentleman is objecting to what we have done or saying that we should have done nothing. In fact, the action that my right hon. Friend took was to maintain the financial strategy that has brought inflation lower for a longer period than any other Government have done previously and which, in spite of the effects of a coal strike —[Interruption.]—for 10 to 11 months last year has kept the current account in surplus.

Mr. Kinnock: The right hon. Lady's strategy is coming apart at the seams, and she knows very well that it is coming apart at the seams. What we want is a real strategy to give proper growth and recovery to our economy, and all we are getting from the Government, especially now, is dithering and, again this afternoon, dodging. That will only mean more on the dole and more in debt. We have not a crisis of confidence in the country but an absence of confidence in the Government. Are the Government willing to change their policies, and will the Prime Minister really help by chucking out the Chancellor?

The Prime Minister: The action taken has been such as to impose financial discipline on all sections of the economy, including the Government. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that gross domestic product is at its highest ever level. I hope that he is pleased about that. Fixed investment across the economy is at its highest ever real level. Retail sales are at their highest ever real level; they have increased by 4 per cent. in volume. Profits increased by 20 per cent.—[Interruption.]—in the first three quarters of 1984. The Government's record on inflation is second to none. If the right hon. Gentleman listens to what is being said about unemployment, he will understand that the most important thing in tackling unemployment is to keep down inflation.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I repeat what I said last week during Prime Minister's Questions. The Leader of the Opposition gets a fair hearing and it is only right that the Prime Minister should get an equally fair hearing.

Mr. Hordern: As interest rates have been increased to a level that must put at rest any fears that there may have been about inflation, and as the markets are now offering the best opportunity ever seen for our exporters and business men to do business abroad, what reason have we to complain?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend will be aware, markets are opening up because of the strength of the dollar and the weakness of sterling compared with the dollar. He will be aware also that it is vital to stay competitive on wage costs. The people who can benefit most from that are those who are best able to take advantage of the present exchange rate. My hon. Friend will know that our wage costs are rising and that the Opposition support every wage claim. At the same time, the wage costs of our competitors are either remaining stable or decreasing. If the Opposition want to improve the prospect of employment, they must help to keep down unit wage costs.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson: As, in part, sterling's problems stem from uncertainty over oil prices, and as over-production at a time of depressed demand leads to a disorderly market, will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government have reserve powers to limit production and depletion in the North sea? Will she consider using these to underpin the light crude oil price and so help to bring back stability to the oil market?

The Prime Minister: The policy that we pursue is really the same as that of the United States. We do not have powers to restrict production in the North sea, but we have powers to purchase 51 per cent. of that production at whatever is the market price. I think that we must stick to that.

Mr. Steel: When will the Prime Minister recognise that the rest of the world does not share her rosy view about her handling of the economy and that it is possible that the rest of the world is right and she is wrong? Since she spoke on "Woman's Hour" and said that the pound was undervalued she has had to increase interest rates to their highest level for 150 years. Will she explain to the House why it is that the pound does not do what she tells it to do?

The Prime Minister: I note what the right hon. Gentleman says about interest rates. He will note that interest rates in real terms are not as high as they have been in the United States, and I am often urged to follow the course of the United States.

Q2. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 29 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hamilton: In view of the shambles in which the Prime Minister finds herself, does she not think that it is now appropriate for her to dispose of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the national interest? As she cannot find a satisfactory alternative, will she say whether the promised tax concessions will be implemented in the Budget? If they are, will that result in more new real jobs, in her terms?

The Prime Minister: I think that the hon. Gentleman must await the Budget. I remind him that the Government have raised the thresholds of personal taxation by 16 per cent. That means that income that is tax-free has been increased by 16 per cent. The previous Labour Government lowered thresholds.

Mr. Grylls: Does my right hon. Friend accept that, although the high interest rates that have had to be introduced are a worry and a difficulty for industry, business in Britain will, nevertheless, support the Government while they continue to keep inflation down? Indeed, business would probably send the Government a message saying that they must try harder in dealing with inflation, because inflation destroys both large and small businesses.

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is always a disappointment to have to raise interest rates, but the effect would be far worse if inflation were allowed to increase again. On 7 February 1978 the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said that "in terms of promoting employment opportunities throughout the country . . . nothing is more important than containing inflation."—[Official Report, 7 February 1978; Vol. 943, c. 1271.]

Q3. Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Foulkes: Is the Prime Minister aware that, at the weekend, all over Scotland there was snow, and temperatures at well below freezing, old people suffering from hypothermia and pneumonia, and yet still there was no exceptional weather payment? How much longer must the north of England and Scotland suffer these arctic conditions? How many more old people must die before the right hon. Lady changes her mind?

The Prime Minister: This question is asked on every occasion, and on every occasion I give the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends the same reply: this matter is under review. The main heating benefit is the regular heating amount paid. The heating amount paid to pensioners under this Government far exceeds the amount paid under any previous Labour Government. This Government have everything to be proud of in the way in which they have looked after the heating allowance for pensioners.

Sir Bernard Braine: I comment on the proposed celebrations of VE day. Does my hon. Friend recall that the war started with the cruel dismemberment of Poland and that, in what followed, Polish pilots helped to defend this island and Polish troops fought with distinction alongside our own troops? Yet, when the war was over, those Polish troops found that they had lost their homeland. I ask my right hon. Friend, most respectfully, whether she will ensure that Polish veterans living in this country, and Czechoslovaks who shared the same fate, will have an honoured place in any parades or church services?

The Prime Minister: I gladly join my right hon. Friend in paying tribute to what Polish troops did in wartime and to the gallant way in which they fought throughout the war. We shall ensure that his point is taken fully into account.

Q4. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hughes: Has the Prime Minister seen the estimates that, if the coal strike ends, consumption of oil will decrease by between 500,000 and 1 million barrels a day? If the right hon. Lady is so good at predicting what will happen to the economy, will she predict what will happen to the price of oil in that event? And what will be the effect on the pound?

The Prime Minister: Anyone who could predict that would not be on this earth, and I doubt whether they can even predict that up aloft.

Q5. Mr. John Browne asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Browne: Does my right hon. Friend accept that, of the factors affecting sterling, many — such as the value of the dollar, the price of oil, the world recession and the size of the United States' deficit — are completely outside the Government's control? Does my right hon. Friend accept also — [Interruption.] — that the majority of my constituents, many of whom do not vote Conservative, think that she has done and continues to do an outstanding job?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend, and all reasonable people would agree with him on the facts. The price of oil is outside the control of the Government. Total production is far too small to have an effect on the price of oil. The rise in the dollar is also outside the control of the Government. We have done all that we can about that by taking part with the G5 nations in co-ordinated intervention. We are left with two problems, which are the decisions that have been taken about the price of oil and the coal strike.

Q6. Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Robinson: Will the Prime Minister explain to the House why real interest rates in this country are now double those in Germany? Is it not a reflection of a complete lack of international confidence in her and her Government?

The Prime Minister: No, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. Gentleman will study the international comparisons he will find that West Germany has run a strict financial policy for many years. Therefore, it has brought its inflation down further than ours. In West Germany it is 2·1 per cent. He will also find that it has kept its public expenditure under control and that it made considerable sacrifices for two years. West Germany has — [Interruption.] I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is interested in the reply or whether his hon. Friends are just interested in shouting. He asked me about West Germany, and I pointed out that its inflation is lower than ours through a strict financial policy. In answer to a previous question, I pointed out that it keeps its wage costs down. Its unit wage costs are lower than ours. It has kept a strict control of public expenditure. In the past two years West Germany has cut unemployment and maternity benefits and delayed pension increases. With that strictness over the past two years, and some of the sacrifices made by her people, it is not surprising that the deutschmark should have risen against sterling.

Mr. Kinnock: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise out of Question Time?

Mr. Kinnock: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As you may know, Mr. Speaker, early today we asked for a statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the Government's economic policy, and such a statement was refused. In view of that, the Prime Minister's utterly inadequate responses on that matter, which is of central importance today, and because of the Government's bungling economic policy as evidenced by manufactured trade and output figures, unemployment figures — [Interruption.] interest rates figures and the current turmoil, I wish to give you notice that we shall be tabling a motion censuring the Government for their utter mismanagement.

Interest Rates

3.33 pm

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer the question of which I have given him prior notice. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Labour party has —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I called the hon. Member to ask a private notice question. It is only fair that he should be heard. I cannot hear.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Mr. Speaker, the Labour party has illusions of adequacy. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member should ask the private notice question that he gave to me.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: If I may be allowed to do that, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer the question of which I have given him prior notice—if he will make a statement of the current level of interest rates.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): At noon yesterday, following a rise in market interest rates, one of the clearing banks raised its base rate from 12 per cent. to 14 per cent. The Bank of England raised its dealing rates by a corresponding amount when it dealt in the bill market at 12.15 pm. The other clearing banks followed within the next hour or so.

Yesterday afternoon I gave evidence on these and related matters at considerable length to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, under the Chairmanship of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), which I understand will be reporting to the House shortly.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Is the Chancellor aware that the Government's "outstanding" record, to which his hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) referred earlier, is the highest level of unemployment since the 1930s and now the highest level of real interest rates since Britain came off the gold standard in 1931? Is he aware that the Government bear a very heavy responsibility for that record because they have been responsible for the uncertainty and confusion about exchange rate policy, because they have taken no action on oil prices or the rate of depletion of our North sea oil, as his hon. Friend the Member for Winchester also pointed out, and because the international markets are reflecting their lack of confidence in the non-oil sector of our economy?

Will the Chancellor now make clear exactly what the Government's exchange rate policy is, at what level he expects to keep the pound and whether he is prepared to take action on oil prices or on the rate of North sea oil depletion? Is he aware that if he does not do that he and his colleagues will be causing the people of this country to pay the price of the Government's own incompetence and blind devotion to economic dogma?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman should know perfectly well that no Chancellor is ever prepared to comment on market tactics and matters of that kind which would benefit only speculators and others and would be of no benefit to our country.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that those who dominate the exchange markets of the world are seldom, anyhow in my experience, much preoccupied with the British public sector borrowing requirement; and that until we apply our minds to their practical concerns rather than to our own theoretical shibboleths we are unlikely to be able to restore sterling to its proper level in world exchange markets?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is a much travelled man with great experience of financial operators throughout the world. Nevertheless, in my experience, there is and always has been considerable concern in the markets, among finance ministries and indeed within the IMF, as some Opposition Members will recall, about the public sector borrowing requirement of this and other countries and about the budget deficit of the United States, a matter about which my hon. Friend himself has expressed concern in the past.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): As the Bank of England is now intervening to protect the pound, and as the Chancellor has restored minimum lending rate and is prepared to co-operate with other economies to protect the pound against the dollar, does he still hold to the dogma that free market forces should be allowed to operate?

Mr. Lawson: Of course free market forces will operate. It is one of the illusions of right hon. and hon. Members on the Labour Benches that by a wave of a wand they can abolish free market forces. As I have said on a previous occasion, the decision taken by the Finance Ministers of the five major industrialised countries of the Western world a fortnight ago in Washington was that the time had come when it would be appropriate from time to time to intervene in a concerted way in the foreign exchange markets. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] That was of course fully in line with the Williamsburg declaration which was signed some time ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order. These are hardly laughing matters.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): On the influence of the crude oil price on sterling, would not my right hon. Friend agree that the status of sterling as a petro-currency can be and probably is being very much exaggerated? Might we not do better to free ourselves completely from involvement in trying to fix the international oil price and to withdraw the price-fixing function of the British National Oil Corporation?

Mr. Lawson: My right hon. Friend is correct in saying that markets attach excessive importance to the value of North sea oil in our economy as a whole, sizeable though it is. Indeed, there is an idea that we are almost a one-commodity economy, whereas in fact oil and gas account for about 5 per cent. of gross domestic product and only 8½ per cent. of our total tax revenues. The price of oil is set by the market, not by BNOC.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): In view of the Chancellor's statement that public expenditure levels may have played some part in the fall of the value of the pound, could it be that world markets do not share his view that the £5 billion spent on fighting the miners was a worthwhile investment? Taking into account the fact that, since the fall in the value of the pound, not a single pit in Britain is uneconomic, would it not be wise for the Government to settle with the miners, who are responsible for building so much of our industrial future?

Mr. Lawson: The right hon. Gentleman's paranoia is well known. The Government are in no sense fighting the miners. They are supporting the working miners and the coal industry.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Is it not true that one of the unfortunate but inevitable consequences of the rise of interest rates by more than four percentage points in recent weeks has been to add more than £1,000 million to the costs of British industry? Will my right hon. Friend therefore pay attention to the strong arguments for taking action in the Budget directly to reduce the costs of industry and so to help to offset that adverse effect?

Mr. Lawson: I shall take note of what my hon. Friend has said when I make my Budget judgments and frame the Budget. It was with this in mind that I abolished the national insurance surcharge in last year's Budget. However, I think that my hon. Friend is basing his calculation of the effect of interest rates on industry on an assumption that may well not be correct — the assumption that the present level of interest rates will remain in force for a full year.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): Now that sterling has fallen to a relatively realistic exchange rate with the deutschmark, will the Chancellor embark on negotiations with a view to joining the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system?

Mr. Lawson: As the hon. Gentleman knows, that is a matter that we keep continually under review. I do not think, however, that recent events have changed the balance of the argument one way or the other with regard to joining the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Does my right hon. Friend recognise that one of the major features of the speculation against the pound in recent weeks has been the fear that the Chancellor may be getting soft on inflation and in particular that his control of the wider monetary aggregates may be rather too loose? Is not the prescription required to steady the market's nerves, therefore, the reverse of that suggested by many hon. Members? Should we not keep firm control of public expenditure and concentrate on increasing demand for industry's products through tax cuts rather than cutting costs in other ways?

Mr. Lawson: I agree very much with the thrust of my hon. Friend's remarks.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Does the Chancellor realise that, whether he likes it or not, the international financial world regards the pound sterling as a petro-currency? Is he aware that the policy that he as Secretary of State for Energy and his predecessors followed, of aggressive over-production, is now undermining the value of oil in the world market and is leading to the problems that he is encountering, especially higher interest rates? Will he contact OPEC to see what he can do with it to keep the value of oil stable? He will find that that is beneficial to the United Kingdom economy.

Mr. Lawson: North sea oil has been one of the great successes of the British economy in the past few years. The policies that we have pursued have considerably assisted that success, which has led to the creation of many jobs in Scotland in the oil industry and in the offshore supplies industry.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the public find it difficult to understand why the Opposition, whose stewardship of the pound sterling has been nothing short of an unmitigated disaster, take such pleasure at the pound having a rough ride? Does he agree that reactions of this type do not help stiffen the currency in international markets?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. He will be aware that, against the EMS index, the pound sterling is higher today than it was when we took office in 1979.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): Will the Chancellor take this belated opportunity to remove some of the uncertainty which still prejudices the pound and therefore interest rates? Will he make it unequivocally clear that he has now abandoned the policy of allowing the pound to float freely?

Mr. Lawson: The policy of the Government under my predecessor and me has been that the sterling exchange rate is always taken into account in assessing the correct financial policy at the time.

Financial Services

3.46 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Tebbit): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the Government's proposals to establish a new regulatory framework for the financial services industry. These proposals are published in a White Paper which I have today laid before the House. Subject to the parliamentary timetable, I plan to introduce a Bill in the next Session for their implementation.

Modern technology and intense international competition are bringing about rapid changes in the financial services industry. The responsibility for responding effectively to these changes lies principally with the industry. The Government's task—in this sector as in others—is to create an environment in which it can do so. This is best done by allowing market forces to operate responsibly but without unnecessary constraints, in a way which promotes efficient and competitive business.

A prerequisite for an internationally competitive industry is a clear regulatory framework within which practitioners and customers can deal with confidence, and which safeguards the interests of investors. This regulatory framework must be capable of adjusting to changes in the shape of the markets, and of accommodating rather than stifling innovation.

This the proposals set out in the White Paper are designed to achieve. They will assist enforcement, deter fraud and malpractice, improve disclosure and lay down the principles on which business should be conducted. The proposals cover both a new regulatory framework and a new institutional structure through which it will work.

First, the regulatory framework will be based on new and comprehensive definitions of investment and of investment business. It will be an offence to carry on an investment business in the United Kingdom without authorisation. To obtain such authorisation, an investment business will have to show that it is fit and proper, and will be required to observe detailed rules for the conduct of business based on principles to be set out in the legislation. Breach of those rules will be subject to sanctions up to and including the withdrawal of the authorisation to trade.

There will be a number of important further changes. I intend to rationalise and update the legal provisions dealing with offer documents and the advertising of investments, first to make it clear what must be disclosed, and second to establish standard provisions on civil and criminal liability for omissions and mistakes. I also propose to liberalise some restrictions on the unit trust industry and to enable it, subject to appropriate safeguards, to offer a greater variety of schemes to the public. Commissions and other payments to intermediaries will be disclosed. As far as possible, the marketing of life assurance contracts will be treated in a manner similar to the marketing of other investments.

The institutional structure is designed to implement the new regulatory framework. It is based on my belief that the crucial tasks of authorising investment businesses and keeping high standards of business conduct among those so authorised can be discharged much more effectively by those closest to the market — practitioners and their customers—than by Government. Malpractices can be identified and dealt with more quickly by those people than by Government regulators.

I therefore intend to build upon what is best in self-regulation. I shall propose legislation to confer on the Secretary of State the necessary powers to grant authorisation to investment businesses and to enable him to delegate regulatory responsibility, including the power of authorisation, to one or more bodies composed both of those who provide and those who use financial services. Before doing so, I shall require to be satisfied about the composition, constitution and proposed rules of these bodies, and I shall have power to withdraw delegated powers if such a body fails to continue to meet the criteria. Steps are already in train to set up the bodies. I hope that those concerned in the financial services industry will press ahead so that the structure is in place by the time the legislation is on the statute book.

The Government see great advantages in the system of self-regulation within a statutory framework. At the same time, we recognise that self-regulation should receive statutory backing only if there is proper accountability. The White Paper sets out the detailed means by which accountability of these bodies to Government and Parliament will be achieved. I shall highlight three particular statutory safeguards. First, there will be a right of appeal on authorisation and on penalties for breach of the rules to an independent tribunal to be appointed by the Secretary of State. Secondly, the Secretary of State will have the power, to be exercised on the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading, to revoke or amend rules which have anti-competitive effects. Thirdly, the Secretary of State will have various powers of appointment. I believe that our proposals combine the advantages of self-regulation within a statutory framework and proper accountability to Parliament.

I have today set out the Government's aims; our proposals for a new regulatory framework; and our proposals for a new institutional structure. The White Paper contains many details which the House will no doubt wish to study and then debate. I look forward to the contribution to be made by people both within and without the House, especially those with knowledge and experience in these matters. We have much benefited already from the advice of Professor Gower, of the Governor of the Bank of England, and of the groups chaired by Mr. Jacomb and Mr. Field.

The Government's proposals offer advantages to investors, industry and commerce, and the financial services industry itself. To the investor, our proposals offer more comprehensive protection against fraud or negligence, and better and fuller information on which to make investment decisions. To industry and commerce, they offer the prospect of keener and more innovative financial services and, therefore, of finance at cheaper rates. To the financial services industry, they offer a system administered by those familiar with the markets without unnecessary Government involvement. The high standards which we seek to promote will be in the interests of all.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): First, may I tell the Secretary of State about the areas in which there will be less controversy than others? Following the scandals of recent years in the City which led to the Gower investigation, it was clear that some action had to be taken to improve the inadequate protection offered by existing legislation, and we welcome the intention to strengthen legislation in respect of fraud and malpractice and to require greater disclosure and, I hope, higher standards. We also accept the desirability of a scheme of authorisation whereby there is control over those allowed to offer advice and services in investment. We shall study the White Paper and subsequent legislation with care to ensure that they reflect properly those widely shared aspirations.

Is the Secretary of State aware that the real concern in recent years has been about not only inadequate legislative provision but about the capacity for its enforcement? Too many scandals have occurred not just because the law has been weak but because there was neither the will nor the mechanism to ensure that it was properly enforced. Is the Secretary of State aware that, in succumbing so easily to the pressure for self-regulation from interested parties, he has missed a great opportunity to set up an independent and expert standing commission to supervise and enforce the new laws?

Is the Secretary of State aware that when such major new developments are afoot in the City, which may lead to enormous changes in practices, habits and business techniques and may affect standards unpredictably, it is an ideal time to make the running on behalf of the public interest, and the City's future, by appointing an independent and effective commission to supervise and enforce the new rules? Is he aware that such a commission would be able to enforce the law more expertly, effectively and independently than would the confused jumble of provisions that he has just announced, and that, as Professor Gower said, it could easily be designed to avoid the complexities of the United States model?

After one year's deliberation, can the Secretary of State explain more clearly the nature of the bodies to which he is delegating so much public responsibility? Why has he not yet decided whether there will be one body or two? Is it not true that he appears to be delegating not only enforcement but the initiative to set up and organise the new bodies? Is it not surprising that he says that he hopes the new structure will be in place in time for the legislation? Why does he not ensure that it is in place in time for the new legislation?

Despite the padding, circumlocution and waffling of the right hon. Gentleman's statement, is it not clear that, instead of seizing the opportunity to act boldly and decisively by supporting the new legislation with an independent commission at a crucial time in the City's development, he has ducked the issue by making no substantially effective change in enforcement? Is he aware that the impact of his retreat from public responsibility will be not only less effective protection for the public, but the possible weakening of the potential business effectiveness of the City in the climate of fierce international competition that lies ahead?

Mr. Tebbit: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for emphasising those parts of the White Paper and the aims on which we generally agree. I agree that there have been major difficulties with law enforcement against fraud in the City. That is why we formed the permanent fraud investigation group, which reports to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, on 1 January. That is also why we have asked Lord Roskill's committee to consider the way in which fraud trials should be conducted, and especially to consider the role of juries or assessors in such trials.

The major step forward that we have taken is to ensure that no one can trade in an investment business without authorisation. That is a step towards the prevention of fraud rather than the prosecution of fraud, and I am sure that we are as one in saying that we must prevent rather than prosecute.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman has a contempt for the City and its practitioners——

Mr. Smith: I did not say that.

Mr. Tebbit: That may be so, but the solution which he proposed is strongly opposed in the City, whereas my solution has wide support in the City among practitioners and users.

As to why the Government propose two bodies instead of one——

Mr. Smith: They do not.

Mr. Tebbit: The White Paper proposes two bodies. I have said that if it is decided that it would be better to operate with one body I should be happy seriously to consider that proposal.

However, the right hon. and learned Gentleman may well be aware that there is a historical difference between the way in which activities in the City have been regulated and the role of the Department of Trade and Industry on the one hand in relation to the insurance industry and unit trusts and on the other hand of the banks and other organisations in relation to other securities. If he thinks about it for a little longer, he may well conclude that it may be right to start off along the lines which the City itself has proposed.

Mr. Peter Hordern (Horsham): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government's major priority in all this is the protection of the public? Can he confirm that the self-regulating agency which he proposes to put forward will give adequate protection to the public either by the direct representation on that self-regulating agency of outside members, say, non-executives, or a supervisory body which may investigate faults or other matters brought to it by members of the public about practices in the City?

Mr. Tebbit: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend that the key in all this is the protection of the public. If the City is not seen to be a clean place in which to operate it will lose business. Thereby, gradually those who are practitioners will be losers as well. We look for efficiency, competitiveness, confidence by the investor and flexibility and vigorous enforcement against wrongdoers in the proposals which I put before the House.

In regard to the membership of the bodies, it is the intention that the members of the SIB and the MIB, the two bodies proposed, should include lay people and users of the services, as well as practitioners

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Is the Minister aware that the development of a statutory framework for self-regulation in the City is to be welcomed? Can he explain why it has taken him so long to come to the conclusion that it should be one or two bodies? Why has he not accepted the representations of quite a broad spectrum of people, including the Financial Times, that there should be one statutory independent body regulating the City? At a time of the creation of more and more financial conglomerates, would not this make greater sense? Will he not, therefore, reconsider his decision and move in that direction, otherwise his proposals look very much like a limp hand in a velvet glove?

Mr. Tebbit: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman was not listening when I explained to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) the reasons which led to the interests in the City, practitioners and their customers and users proposing that there should be two bodies rather than one. It may well be that as time goes on there will be a change of view about this and that the two bodies might be merged. If that was the view which emerged, I would not oppose it. Equally, I do not think it would be appropriate at this stage for me to try to force down the necks of those who provide and use the services a solution which they do not want.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Is my right hon. Friend aware that we hope that the Bill will be given proper and mature consideration and will not be enforced before the changes come about? Is he aware that the Stock Exchange arrangement, which has led to rather a shambolic position, should not be repeated on the City as a whole? Will he agree that, wonderful and proper though the Bank of England is in the influence it should have on the City, not every institution should be subject only to its wishes? I hope that Parliament will reserve the right to the nomination of people and will not always have to accept what the Bank of England wishes because it has often been proved wrong on many things.

Mr. Tebbit: There will be proper and mature consideration of the Bill when it comes before the House. That is the way of the House on all occasions, as we all know so well from our experience in Committee—well, most of the time. When my hon. Friend reads the White Paper he will find that the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board will be appointed by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry with the approval of the Governor of the Bank of England and the members will be appointed conversely by the Governor with the approval of the Secretary of State. It will be a joint operation. The Secretary of State will appoint the chairman and all the members of the Marketing of Investments Board.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): I accept, of course, that the prime consideration is the protection of the investor, and I welcome the appointment of Lord Roskill and his committee to investigate fraud case trials, but is it not a scandal that for years crooks in the City of London have been getting away with it, although evidence has been forthcoming, because there has been a refusal to prosecute in cases which cry out for prosecution? Has this not given rise to great strength of feeling that the Government should act much more urgently? Is not the difficulty that the Minister finds himself in that the machinery he proposes must necessarily take a long time to set up and in the meantime many further serious criminal offences will be committed in the City of London without fear of prosecution, if the examples of recent years are followed?

Mr. Tebbit: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern about offences which are committed but where prosecution is not carried through to conviction. As the hon. Gentleman knows, many such frauds involve persons overseas who, as foreign nationals, are not unduly anxious to come to the Old Bailey to offer evidence. As he also knows, in many cases there have been difficulties about setting out extremely complicated facts in a way which juries can fully understand and the case goes on for a long time. I am sure that under the new system, where the rules for the conduct of business will be much cleaner, clearer and consistent across the whole market, it will not only be easier to see those who have offended, but also at a much earlier stage to prohibit from trading those whose practices, even if not regarded as criminal at the moment, are in contradiction to the code under which business should be carried out in the City.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must have regard to the fact that there is to be another statement, a Standing Order No. 10 application, a ten-minute Bill and further business. I shall allow questions on this statement to go on for another 10 minutes. I hope in that time to be able to call everyone who wishes to ask a question.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): In welcoming the White Paper proposals as a good balance between the protection of the consumer and the encouragement of innovative forces in the City, may I express to my right hon. Friend one disappointment? If it is felt appropriate that the purchaser of a life assurance or investment contract should be protected, why should the protection not be extended to those who purchase motor car insurance, household insurance or insurance covering valuables, because the mis-arranging of such insurances can bring just as much hardship as the mis-arranging of life assurance or investment contracts?

Mr. Tebbit: I share entirely my hon. Friend's concern about the damage which can be done if such matters are badly or incompetently arranged. However, the Gower report and the White Paper relate to the investment and securities industry. The non-life aspects of insurance are not normally regarded as investments. Therefore, they are not covered in the White Paper.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): May we be told how the Bank of England could act as an independent adviser in the case, say, of Johnson Matthey when the bank has already offered £75 million in the rescue programme? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, in the light of the fraud that is occurring, the bank will be placed in an invidious position?

Why have the Government decided to allow a self-regulatory system to the casino economy—the City—but are insisting on trade unions being subjected to a legal straitjacket? Is it not a fact that, although the Conservatives came to power claiming that they would reduce the number of quangos, the Government are now setting up another one, to be headed by the right hon. Gentleman and to be overlorded by the iron lady with the plastic pound?

Mr. Tebbit: I should, first, inform the hon. Gentleman that I have not asked, and do not intend to ask, the bank for advice on the matter to which he has referred. Secondly, I am extremely grateful to him for raising the question of what one might call parallel treatment between the City and the trade union movement. Has he considered what would happen if the Secretary of State for Employment took him seriously? The Secretary of State would lay down the rules under which the trade union movement operated and would appoint the members of the TUC and the executives of the trade unions, and when trade unionists transgressed against the rules they would be prohibited from carrying on work as trade unionists, and if they did so despite that prohibition they would be sent to prison.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that most people who wish the City well and wish to see it continuing to be a successful part of the British economy will welcome the fact that in the regulation there is a minimum of Government involvement? As the power of the new City bodies will come from Parliament, through my right hon. Friend, how will Parliament be able to judge their success or failure? Will there be an annual report to Parliament from those bodies, for example?

Mr. Tebbit: The answer to the latter part of my hon. Friend's supplementary question is yes, the boards will report annually to the Secretary of State and those reports will be laid before Parliament. There will be accountability in other ways, as the Secretary of State will have power to require the amendment or withdrawal of the rules of the boards under certain circumstances, principally if they conflict with international obligations or if they are judged to be detrimental to competition and not justified in the interests of investor protection. Thus, there will be considerable parliamentary accountability.

I share my hon. Friend's view, as expressed earlier in his supplementary question, that it is better to have rather less Government involvement in the day-to-day regulation of these matters. The experience of most of us is that those in the City, the practitioners, are far quicker to detect the black sheep among their colleagues than perhaps are the Government.

Mr. Skinner: Black sheep indeed!

Mr. Tebbit: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) tempts me again. Trade unionists detect black sheep among their members, and that is why the NUM and many of its senior members are being sued in the courts by members of the NUM.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that every cloud has a silver lining and that the investment by the NUM of its funds in a bank in Liechtenstein has resulted in the union getting almost £1 million in profit, because the money was invested in dollar bonds rather than in sterling?

While that may have occurred by way of an historical accident, may we be told what effect the right hon. Gentleman's statement today will have on the activities of those companies in "the square mile" for which that is a daily occurrence and for which speculation against the pound is a way of life? I refer to ICI and the other multinationals, whose profits are paid for by ordinary working people. What effect will the right hon. Gentleman's statement have on that state of affairs?

Mr. Tebbit: It will not have much effect; and it is difficult to answer questions which are inspired by paranoia rather than by experience. I hope the hon. Gentleman can assure us that the NUM, which is so against speculation and windfall profits, will be donating the profit which it may have made, and to which the hon. Gentleman referred, to some worthy cause.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, inasmuch as the day-to-day regulation will not affect the ability of the City to respond to innovation, competition and development, he will still retain powers in exceptional circumstances to appoint inspectors to investigate certain scandals which may take place in the City?

Mr. Tebbit: Yes, indeed; those powers will be unaffected.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): In view of the acknowledged technical nature of the prospective legislation, the need for confidence in the machinery and the fact that the Secretary of State said that it will require mature consideration, will the right hon. Gentleman consider the new public Bill procedure for the legislation?

Mr. Tebbit: I am not sure that I should do that on my feet. I hope that we shall have adequate debating time for the matter, and although, as I said, I am wedded to the basic structure—and, indeed, to much of the detail of the White Paper—equally, during the progress of the legislation through the House, and with the advice of many people outside it, we may discover better ways of doing some of what we propose to do than we see at present. I hope that the House will look at the legislation in that spirit. Certainly I shall.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): I join in giving a general welcome to the White Paper and to the thought which my right hon. Friend and his colleagues have clearly given to it. Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is a rich opportunity, before legislation is introduced, to gain some consensus on an all-party basis? If my right hon. Friend re-reads the report of the debate on the Gower report, he will find that a clear consensus emerged from that debate, a consensus which, on the basis of his statement, does not seem to be reflected in the decision to have two supervisory bodies rather than one. I welcome the fact that my right hon. Friend is open to suggestions on that. Will he bear in mind that the City institutions and interests which suggested that there should be two bodies rather than one do not necessarily have the protection of the investor but, rather, the protection of their own interests at heart?

Mr. Tebbit: I note carefully what my hon Friend says. It will be better if we can establish as much consensus as possible in this area, but it is not just consensus in the House that is needed. It is also consensus among the users and suppliers of the services. The principal area where the official Opposition and the Government may pull apart on these matters is on the question whether there should be a Government-operated statutory Stock Exchange Council-type of operation or whether it should be based principally on self-regulation within a statutory regulatory framework.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I assure my right hon. Friend that the proposals will be widely welcomed, subject to further study of the White Paper. Is he confident, however, that the Stock Exchange, preoccupied with its own internal deregulation at the same time as the new regulatory structure is being established, will be able to do it in time and meet its target date, which has been agreed with the Government? Is he confident that the cost of the new structure will not be oppressive, either on practitioners or customers? Does he expect the Bill in the autumn of 1985 to include elements of the EEC's proposals on securities control?

Mr. Tebbit: I have not fully considered the matter to which my hon. Friend refers in the last part of his supplementary question, but I shall do so. As for the cost, it is certain that, whatever structure we have, the practitioners and users in the City will bear that cost, so they will have a strong interest in making sure that it is done as economically as possible.

The answer to my hon. Friend's point about the Stock Exchange is that I am still confident that it will meet the deadline. Indeed, it undertook to do so in the compact with my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson).

London Regional Transport

4.20 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement about the recent court judgment concerning the payment of grants to London Regional Transport by the Greater London council.

The Government took over responsibility for London Regional Transport on 29 June 1984, part way through the present financial year. Before we took over, the GLC had budgeted and precepted to pay grants to London Transport for the whole of 1984-85. Parliament therefore granted powers in section 49 of the London Regional Transport Act for the GLC to be directed to continue paying grants to LRT until the end of March 1985.

Accordingly, I made a direction on 29 June 1984, on the facts known to me at that time, requiring the GLC to pay a total of £281·3 million in grants to LRT in instalments up to the end of this financial year. The main factors which I had in mind in determining this figure included the GLC's decisions about revenue and capital grants to London Transport for 1984-85; LRT's financial needs for the remainder of the year, as assessed at that time; and the GLC's decision that LT should lease £27 million of assets, which imposed future liabilities on LRT. This was in accordance with the Government's intentions, as I made clear during the passage of the legislation.

The House will be aware that the direction was subsequently challenged by the GLC, and has recently been quashed by the High Court. It is clear from the judgment that the court took a different view of the way in which the powers under section 49 of the London Regional Transport Act should be exercised from that which I told Parliament the Government intended in taking the powers in the first place.

The effect of the judgment would be to reduce the money available to LRT by over £50 million at a very late stage in the financial year. A corresponding amount would accrue to the GLC. The Government regard this as contrary to the interests of ratepayers and LRT's passengers.

After studying the terms of the judgment, I have concluded that any new direction which could be made under the existing legislation either would not accomplish what was originally intended or would be vulnerable to further legal challenge, thus failing to resolve the damaging uncertainty which now exists over LRT's financial position for 1984-85 and beyond. Nor am I confident that an appeal would satisfactorily resolve the problems over the interpretation of section 49 which the judgment has brought to light.

In the circumstances, the Government consider that the matter can be settled only by the authority of Parliament. I shall shortly introduce new legislation to enable Parliament to determine once and for all the amount of grant to be paid to LRT by the GLC in 1984-85, and thereby ensure that the original purpose of section 49 of the London Regional Transport Act is carried out.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his proposal to use Parliament to avoid compliance with a High Court judgment is a constitutional outrage, that any such attempt to legislate will be strenuously and rigorously opposed by all those

[Mr. Peter Snape]

Members of the Opposition who happen to believe in the rule of law, that any Labour Minister who behaved in the same cavalier manner as the right hon. Gentleman would be pilloried, if not torn to pieces, by the whole of Fleet street and that any principal holder of ministerial office, after being condemned of illegality by a High Court judge, after telling blatant untruths in this House and after swindling the ratepayers of Greater London of about £50 million, ought formally to apologise to the House and tender his resignation?

The fact that the right hon. Gentleman, with typical bluff and bluster, proposes to act in the way that he has outlined in his statement means that he intends to use the Government's majority to force through retrospective legislation in order to flout the verdict of a court, to condone his own improper and illegal behaviour, to defy the traditions of this House and to earn the contempt and derision of all true democrats, who deplore his shameless arrogance and political chicanery. If the right hon. Gentleman had a shred of decency he would not be bothering the House with this appalling statement; he would have the courtesy to tender his resignation.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) has rather overreacted. It is clear that the court took a different view of the way in which the powers under section 49 of the Act should be exercised from that which the Government intended when taking the powers in the first place. When I told Parliament what section 49 meant, I really believed it to be true. If that was not the case, I should be misleading the House if I did not seek to put section 49 right so that it does mean what I said it meant.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it was made abundantly clear during the discussion of this clause in Committee that the unspent balance of moneys raised from the Government and from ratepayers for subsidising London's bus and tube services was to be paid over to LRT? That general principle was in no way dissented from at the time by any member of the Opposition. It would be an outrage to the ratepayers of London if the money raised from them for that purpose were to be applied by the GLC for any other purpose.

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is quite right. I made the intentions of the Government quite clear. The fact that what I told Parliament does not appear to have been reflected in the court's interpretation of the legislation means——

Mr. Snape: It means that the Government were wrong.

Mr. Ridley: No, it does not mean that they were wrong. I said that the legislation does not mean what I told Parliament it did mean. Therefore, it is perfectly proper for me to put that error right in the way that I have suggested. May I underline my hon. Friend's perfectly reasonable statement that money taken from the ratepayers and passengers of London for the purpose of transport in London should be used for that purpose and not for any other. That is all that the Government seek to do.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The Secretary of State has clearly revealed his total incompetence. He does not even understand his own legislation. Will he tell the House what is the true figure? Is it £50 million, £60 million or £73 million?

Mr. Ridley: The exact figure will be in the Bill. The time to discuss the precise way in which it is computed will be when we reach the legislation. When announcing the intention to legislate it is not the normal practice to discuss the details of a Bill, let alone complicated figures which will involve fairly complex argument, in order to explain to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) what they mean.

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North): Ratepayers in Enfield and elsewhere in Greater London paid rates on the understanding that they would be used for subsidising London Transport. Would it not be quite outrageous if the result of the interpretation of an Act, which was quite clearly expressed by my right hon. Friend, was that money could be spent by the Greater London council subsidising the women's committee, the police committee and other outrageous purposes for which the GLC tends to spend ratepayers' money?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is quite right. I find it extraordinay that the Opposition should seriously resist his proposition that money taken from his and other hon. Members' constituents who are London ratepayers should be used for a totally separate pupose from that for which it was raised.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Despite the huffing and puffing of Opposition Members, my right hon. Friend should be aware that the ratepayers of London welcome the action that he is to take. It is perfectly in line with the Government's intentions, as expressed on the Floor of the House and in Committee. Does my hon. Friend agree that this is just a last gasp attempt by this moribund GLC, before abolition, to frustrate the intention of the House and, indeed, that it is typical of the behaviour of the appointed members from the GLC on the LT board just before vesting day?

Mr. Ridley: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. It was because of the extraordinary behaviour of the members of the board just before vesting day that we had to make this direction in rather a hurry. The principle must not be overturned by what has happened. What I said to the House about the meaning of the section is what we have to do. We are talking about large sums of money. It would be quite improper for this money, which has been taken from the ratepayers for one purpose, to be used for another.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Does the Secretary of State recall that during the Committee stage of the London Regional Transport Bill he resisted an amendment which would have prevented this problem? Does he also recall that normally the attitude on the Conservative Benches is that decisions of the court produce not uncertainty but certainty, and that that is the place where such matters ought to be resolved? Does the right hon. Gentleman accept, if he did not do so before, that this is the best illustration of the fact that when Governments and Secretaries of State seek to interfere more and more in the affairs of local authorities and local services they do not know what they are doing, and that the best remedy is to do what we are trying to do in Committee upstairs in order to prevent any Secretary of State from interfering in London affairs any more than happens at the moment? Will the Secretary of State please accept that we do not want any more of this kind of interference? He cannot get it right. He never has, and he never will.

Mr. Ridley: I am not sure to which amendment in Committee the hon. Gentleman is referring, but many of those amendments would have failed to take the money that should have been taken from the GLC and apply it for the purpose for which it was precepted by that authority. We had every right to appeal against the judgment if we had wished to. In order to shorten the period of uncertainty, and, indeed, to remove uncertainty about the figures, it is obviously preferable that the appeal should take the form of legislation, so that certainty can be made clear. We cannot have this important matter subject to further legal challenge. I do not believe for one moment that the hon. Gentleman can sustain his argument that this is interfering with the GLC. The intentions of Parliament in an Act have proved not to be met by the way in which the legislation was drafted, and the only remedy is to put the legislation right.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Is not the GLC effectively trying to prevent the ratepayers from benefiting from the investment that they made in LRT through the 1984-85 precept? Is that the situation that my right hon. Friend is describing?

Mr. Ridley: The sum of money is large—well over £50 million. If that sum is not paid over to LRT, fares will have to rise extremely high, further taxpayers' money will have to be provided or there will have to be an increase in the precept for next year in order to put right the gap which will appear in LRT's finances if we do nothing.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Are not the perils of over-centralisation and the legislation related to it the real lesson of this sorry affair? Will the right hon. Gentleman use his excellent imagination to foresee the perils which await him if he persists with the legislation currently in Committee? Will he also agree that next year £69 million of ratepayers' money is to be paid for the GLC in respect of non-written-off debt? Will he take the opportunity in the forthcoming legislation to rectify that monstrous imposition on London's ratepayers?

Mr. Ridley: I can see no conceivable way in which the issue of centralisation or devolution arises on the statement that I have just made. The statement arises out of a piece of legislation to which the House gave its assent last year. Nor do I see how it is possible for me to take into account any other matter concerning the GLC, because all that I am dealing with is the judgment, which is the subject of this statement.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that the GLC doubled fares and rates for Londoners in its first year of office and has since spent several million pounds on a completely spurious campaign, lying to pensioners and saying that they will lose their travel passes when the GLC is abolished, when the passes in question have since been guaranteed in law by the Government? Will my right hon. Friend guarantee that the GLC will not be allowed to get near London Transport, which it made such a mess of when it did?

Mr. Ridley: I give my hon. Friend the guarantee for which he asks. It is a somewhat sad prospect to have to go over the arguments of 1984 about the London Regional Transport Bill. That is what I regret about the need for this. All the fears, scares and rubbish that was talked at that time have been proved to be untrue. The only thing that has gone wrong is that the legislation needs amendment in the way that I have suggested.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Does the Secretary of State expect the House to take his statement seriously? There is no damaging uncertainty at present; there is crystal clear certainty. The court has said clearly that the Government got it wrong, and the legislation is there to prove it. Will the right hon. Gentleman reflect on the fact that his statement has created extra uncertainty about the GLC's budget-making process for the forthcoming financial year? Does not his statement and the intended legislation make nonsense of the rate-capping legislation of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Environment and his attempts to set a rate limit for the GLC?

Mr. Ridley: No, Sir. There is at present in place no direction to the GLC, because the one that I made was quashed by the High Court. A new determination has to be made one way or another. Instead of making a new direction, I shall bring in a Bill which will have the amount of money named on the face of it.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North) rose——

Mr. Ridley: I am sorry, I did not answer the hon. Gentleman's second point. I am in close touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, and he is content with this legislation, which will be completely in accordance with what he is doing.

Mr. Marlow: Why is it that where there is a difference of opinion between the Government and a British court it is proper for the Government to bring before Parliament legislation favouring the Government's view rather than the court's view—I support that—yet when a European court disagrees with the Government it is impossible to bring forward legislation which the Government want, as we saw yesterday? Is it that Parliament can overrule British courts, but has no power when it comes to foreign courts?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend tempts me on to ground on which it is beyond my competence to give him a full answer. I can tell him only that I believe that he is right to say that when a British court interprets an Act of Parliament in a way different from what Parliament was told, it is correct for Parliament to seek to use its sovereignty to change the law. There is a great difference between using sovereignty to change the law, and criticising the judiciary, which my hon. Friend will know is one thing that I have not done.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Is not the Secretary of State proposing to indulge in a shabby little manoeuvre to condone his robbery of money from the GLC and the people of London? Is not his proposal, in the Bill that he will put through, yet another example of the dangers of centralising local government around people such as himself who do not even represent London constituencies and who have no understanding of the needs or operations of London Transport? Will not the proposals that he intends to bring forward create further chaos and confusion, which he will then use to blame the GLC, through his friends in the press?

Mr. Ridley: I cannot accept the implication of the hon. Gentleman's words, that the money belongs to the GLC. The GLC precepted the ratepayers of London for the express and explicit purpose of passing the money on to LRT. How it can then be said that because it rated the money it should not give it to LRT baffles me. The hon. Gentleman has not told us what he thinks the £50 million plus, the windfall to the GLC if the Government did not take this action, would and should be spent on. He seems to think that further burdens should be put upon the ratepayers to make good the shortfall and that the GLC should be left with a surplus which it could spend on anything that it liked.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Has not the court's decision shown that the Secretary of State is a law-breaker in this matter, and has not his statement today shown that he thinks he is above the law, even his own law? Is not the taking of the vendetta against the GLC into new retrospective legislation a constitutional disgrace? Has he not shown his incompetence and should he not now give the GLC back the money that he has robbed from it so that it can be used for the benefit of London ratepayers?

Mr. Ridley: I do not claim to be a lawyer, but I can at least identify that the hon. Gentleman knows even less about these matters than I do. The idea that it is wrong for Parliament, which is sovereign, to change the law is something that he ought to know about.

Coal Industry Dispute

4.38 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): I hope that the Secretary of State for Transport, the real architect of the miners' strike, will stay and listen to this application.

In the light of the announcement made by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition regarding next Monday's debate, I seek leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Government's prolongation of the miners' strike."

That the matter is specific and important can be in no doubt. The provocation and prolongation of the dispute by the Government make it the longest and bitterest national dispute this century. It has arisen as a direct consequence of the Government's generalised attack on working people and their organisations and was predicted in the House in maiden speeches in the summer of 1983.

Throughout the dispute the Government have refused to justify their actions here in the House of Commons. Despite the fact that the matter has been debated daily in the media, in clubs, in pubs and on the estates, the one place held up as the epitome of democracy, the national debating chamber, in which no debate has taken place is here in the House of Commons.

The matter is urgent because today and every day that the Government refuse to withdraw their attack on over 100,000 jobs in and around the mining communities at least £20 million is wasted and 140,000 miners and their families suffer another day of the privation and starvation policies of the Government. By the end of this week, that daily total will have reached £100 million—sufficient to build in Coventry a large new general hospital and half a dozen new comprehensive schools, with enough small change left over for 1,000 new council houses. Eleven months of this dispute have destroyed those much needed facilities for 50 cities the size of Coventry.

The dispute should have urgent consideration so that the House can examine the role of certain individuals, such as Mr. David Hart, the adviser to the Prime Minister, who, in The Times on Saturday, said that the time for a negotiated settlement is past and that the Government should score a victory over Mr. Scargill. Some hon. Members may wish to raise also the role of Lord Chapple whose personal advice to the then Secretary of State for Energy, now the Chancellor of the Exchequer, clinched the appointment of Mr. Ian MacGregor to the National Coal Board.

If the Government do not concede and withdraw the hit-list of pit closures, then on Monday 11 February the Yorkshire and south-east regions of the Trades Union Congress will call for a one-day stoppage. If the House does not debate this issue, if the Government do not withdraw that pit closure list, the stoppage on Monday 11 February will receive wider support from the trade union movement, leading to more generalised strike action.

If the House is the national debating chamber, that you, Mr. Speaker, have so often said it is, in the light of the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition about the subject for debate next Monday, a Supply day, I ask that today's or tomorrow's business be suspended and that a debate on the miners' dispute be granted.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Government's prolongation of the miners' strike".

I have listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House, at least at a time when these talks are in progress.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Relating to your ruling that you will not accept an application under Standing Order No. 10 while the talks are proceeding, I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is a political, not a constitutional, point. As a matter of fact, I understand that the discussions that have taken place this morning are now over.

The point that I put to you, Mr. Speaker, is that Parliament is here to consider whether something is urgent, not whether a discussion in Parliament would assist one side or the other. I put it to you that if the view put forward is that if it is too early, it is hypothetical, if it is immediate, it is delicate, and if it is over, it is not urgent because it is too late, the judgment that you have given is that Parliament can never play a part in discussions.

There is nothing whatever in Erskine May, nor is there any precedent of any of your forebears, to say that Mr. Speaker takes into account what is happening outside Parliament in respect of its outturn, but only whether it is specific, urgent and should be a matter covered by Standing Orders.

Because the Government will not have a debate—and my right hon. Friends have now tried, with an unprecedented refusal in my knowledge of an application under Standing Order No. 10 from the Front Bench—everything points to your interpreting the rules of the House free from any interests, which of course you do not have, Mr. Speaker, in the outturn of the talks.

In those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I beg you to consider very carefully whether it is right that you should be driven, by the dilemma in which you find yourself, into giving a political judgment about whether a debate would be "helpful" or "unhelpful" to negotiations in which the whole country is interested.

Therefore, on that point alone, Mr. Speaker I ask you to consider the ruling that you have given and the precedents for it, and to tell the House more clearly the basis on which you reach a judgment and whether it is now to be something unconnected with the House but more directly related to discussions or negotiations going on outside Parliament.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would you advise the House, and in particular myself? Am I right in thinking that if the Opposition Front Bench wants to discuss this matter it can use an Opposition Supply day—the earliest is Monday next—to do just that?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that when we had a discussion on this subject several days ago and I suggested that we should strip away the cold language and get down to the basics, you gave the clear impression that, if the matter were pressed by the Opposition Front Bench, there would be half a chance. Yesterday, an application was made by the Front Bench. It had, somewhat belatedly, joined the Campaign group and others who felt that it was necessary to have a debate. That application was turned down. Now you have turned down an application under Standing Order No. 10 because of talks. You have also held out the prospect that there are opportunities, as suggested by the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), for the Opposition to use one of their Supply days in order to have a debate, and you have to take that into consideration because it is a possibility.

You will also have heard today, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition state in clear and unmistakable terms that, because of the Government's failure to deal with the economy properly and with the 14 per cent. interest rates and the fact that we have an iron lady with a plastic pound running the country, he would table a censure motion against the Government. It has crossed my mind, and it has probably crossed yours, Mr. Speaker, that that might well take place on Monday when the Opposition have a Supply day. Personally I should like the debate to take place sooner.

The important thing to remember, which I hope you will bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, is that there are conflicting issues for Supply days, and the issue of the economy is very important. Therefore, it is necessary for Mr. Speaker to use the opportunity that he has under Standing Order No. 10 to grant a debate which is absolutely necessary because of those other conflicting issues which have arisen.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have been reading and listening carefully to all the rulings that you have given on the applications made under Standing Order No. 10. So far 24 applications have been made in respect of the miners' dispute, and you have been minded to grant only one of them during that period.

In view of your remarks last week and yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that you considered this an urgent and important matter and that you would consider it further as time went on and more applications were made, I wonder what plans you may now have in respect of any further applications that may be made under Standing Order No. 10.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) has pointed out, the debate next Monday is likely to be not on the coal dispute but on a different aspect of the country's economic problems. I believe—and I trust you will agree, Mr. Speaker—that the expenditure of £5·2 billion of public money by the Government on the mining dispute, without a vote in the House, and the use of Department of Health and Social Security regulations and the police and, perhaps more importantly, seriously and recently, the categorical refusal by the Secretary of State for Energy yesterday to answer questions about voltage reductions and the security of future power supplies in the country, mean that the House, of all places, must discuss the miners' dispute. This is not because we wish to demonstrate to the House once again our support for the miners, but so that Ministers can answer the serious points about which everybody outside the House is asking questions and talking. I do not believe that the House can go on blindfolding itself to the seriousness of the situation outside Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: I intended to go no further than what I said last week and yesterday—namely, that I think that we should debate this important matter when it is helpful to the situation. That is what I have said previously.

The House and the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who have made applications under Standing Order No. 10 in the past have drawn attention to the importance of seeking a settlement to this extended and damaging strike. I hope that that is still the situation in the House. If that is interpreted as a political judgment, I am sorry; it was not so intended. It is simply that I thought that the House took the view that there is an appropriate moment to discuss this matter when it would be helpful to the resolution of the dispute. That is the position.

Mr. Skinner: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that a further point of order can arise from what I have just said.

Mr. Skinner: I wish to raise a separate matter, Mr. Speaker.

In taking the line that you have adopted over the past two or three days, you have mentioned, quite properly, that you would want a debate when it would be most helpful to the resolution of the dispute. I do not suggest for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that this line can create difficulties for you in future, but when the nation has been faced with conflicts in the past, industrial or otherwise, we have debated them, irrespective of whether our debates would resolve the issues. There is no better example than the fact that, during the Falklands war, we had several debates on that subject, and it cannot be denied that the debates took place before the conflict had ended.

Mr. Speaker: I have nothing to add to what I have said already.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has become clear, in the course of exchanges about Standing Order No. 10 applications, that you have decided to depart from the formula which you have used on many occasions previously when you have decided to refuse a Standing Order No. 10 application, which is to refuse to give your reasons, as you have said you are instructed to do by the rules of the House.

I believe that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) was correct when he said that by giving your ruling today you were taking a political decision by seeking to judge the helpfulness or otherwise of the debate. That matter has not normally fallen within your rulings or those of your predecessors. If such judgments have been made by you, Mr. Speaker, you have normally kept them to yourself. As there have been many other opportunities when the Labour Opposition could have raised the issue of the miners' dispute from the Opposition Front Bench, would it not be better, Mr. Speaker, to revert to your established rule not to give your reasons for refusal?

Mr. Speaker: That is very wise.

Severe Weather Payments

4.53 pm

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the refusal to grant fuel allowances to those in Scotland."

In the course of my brief remarks I shall seek to persuade you, Mr. Speaker, that it would be extremely helpful to 5 million people if the House could discuss the matter.

You will be aware, Mr. Speaker, that over the past two weeks or so there has been considerable comment, especially from Scottish Members, but from others as well, about the discriminatory nature of the existing system of severe weather allowances. The Department of Health and Social Security has given special allowances to those in the south of England who are affected by exceptionally cold weather. The trigger point for the allowances is 105 in Plymouth, whereas it is 129 in Aberdeen. In other words, there can be the same levels of temperature in different parts of the United Kingdom where the level in one area will attract supplementary benefit and heating allowances, whereas it will not in another. This discriminates effectively against those who live in colder climates.

The matter is specific because yesterday afternoon a statement was made by the DHSS—I gather that it was made informally—that no allowances were to be made to those in Scotland, notwithstanding the severe weather which it has encountered over the past 14 days. I gather also that a parliamentary answer will become available this afternoon that will confirm my information.

Those who have studied these matters will be well aware of the very snowy conditions in Scotland, especially in the Highlands, which have cut electricity supplies in many areas. In certain areas the temperature has been minus 22 degrees Celsius, which is extremely cold by any standards. Curling bonspeils, which are very rare events, are taking place because the ice on the lochs is sufficiently thick, due to the low temperatures, to support that sporting activity.

The matter is important because hundreds of thousands of people are affected adversely by the discriminatory actions of the DHSS. Up to 5,000 old people will die every year in Scotland because of insufficient money to buy adequate fuel to provide sufficient heat to maintain themselves at a living temperature.

No other subject has caused so much public concern in Scotland in recent weeks as the one that I am putting before you, Mr. Speaker. Scotland is being treated effectively as a second-class area. I ask you to consider adjourning the House, under Standing Order No. 10, to allow us to discuss this important matter. It is extremely urgent, because a good part of the winter is still before us.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the severe weather payments which were made available to southern England last week which have been denied to those in Scotland this week, Scotland having suffered atrocious weather conditions in the past seven days".

I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said. I regret that I do not consider the matter which he has raised as appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. Therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Protection of the Rights of the Elderly in Home Ownership

4.56 pm

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable those who go into Part III Accommodation under the National Assistance Act 1948 to assign up to a half share in their freehold or long leasehold property to a companion who has been residing with them for not less than five years and to assign the remaining share of their freehold or long leasehold property to the local authority, the capital value of which share shall become an interest in the local authority old people's home in which the assignor is to reside.

In recent years we have been making major strides in introducing the pride and joy of home ownership to those in all walks of life. As a result, the percentage of owner-occupiers has increased from 52 per cent. in 1973 to 60 per cent. in 1983, and it continues to rise. Having spent a lifetime of care and thrift, it comes as something of a shock for the elderly to be deprived of their assets in the evening of their lives. This is a matter of concern to many who deal with the elderly, including Age Concern.

When the aged enter an old people's home, they are expected to make a contribution towards their keep in addition to the £30 or thereabouts that is deducted from their old-age pensions if they have assets exceeding £1,200. Those in that position will find that a sliding scale is applied which will consume their assets at a rate of 26 per cent. per annum. This is a much higher percentage than the one which was felt to be too high when it was taken up in a private notice question earlier this afternoon. The sliding scale moves to the full cost of staying in an old persons' home, which can be as much as £150 a week. Unless a spouse or child under 16 years of age is left at the previous principal residence of the person entering the home, this property can be included in the individual's assets. This leads in many instances to considerable anxiety and hardship, especially when the person left behind has been living in the premises and sharing the cost of upkeep for many years, and finds himself or herself thrown out by a local authority which is anxious to reduce the residual bill that is left for the ratepayers.

In my constituency, there were two sisters who lived together in a family house from 1934. They lived first with their parents and then they shared the costs of upkeep between themselves. Unfortunately, their parents left the property to the elder sister, who was 18 years the elder, on the understanding that she in turn would leave it to her younger sister. When the elder sister had to go into an old persons' home at the age of 84, the local authority applied pressure for the sale of the house and offered a bed-sitting room flat to the younger sister.

After considerable negotiations, the authority agreed to the purchase of a one-bedroomed flat over which it has a charge. It allows the younger sister to occupy the flat, but sends her bills quarterly to cover the balance of her elder sister's charges after receiving her old-age pension and occupational pension. Currently the bills exceed £3,000 after the balance between the sale of the home and the purchase of the flat has been taken into account. This is a very worrying factor for a retired lady of nearly 70 years of age without other means.

It is open to the local authority to waive these charges but, as a prudent authority over the past 20 years, it has little money to spare, especially in the light of the current rate support grant proposals. Apparently, if there is a shortfall in payment to a local authority old people's home, this is made good by the ratepayers. Those who cannot meet the full repayment in a private or charitable home have their payments made up by the taxpayer. That hardly encourages conscientious, caring local authorities to look after their elderly residents in these days of rate capping and manpower targets.

In 1984 the Government issued a consultative document on new regulations and guidance for assessing ability to pay charges for part III accommodation. That document was followed last Thursday week, on 17 January, with a local authority circular which, in paragraph 6, stated:

"Paragraphs 17 to 23 of the Memo of Guidance give advice to authorities as to some circumstances in which they should exercise discretion. But these are not the only circumstances in which it might be appropriate to do so. It would also be reasonable for example for an authority to exercise its discretion where a person who has been caring for the resident continues to live in the dwelling. Authorities should look at each case on its merits and decide, having regard to all the relevant circumstances, to what extent (if any) the value of a former dwelling should be reduced in the assessment."

My Bill will seek to allow by right all those entering old people's homes to assign up to a half share in their principal residence to a companion who resides with them for not less than five years. My Bill also seeks to permit those entering council old people's homes to purchase a share of up to a full proportion of the total value—for example, a one fortieth interest in a 40-place home. That will enable weekly charges to be reduced to a share of the running costs and will enable the occupier to benefit from any appreciation in the value of the property. Any shortfall in meeting the running costs out of pensions or other funds would be accumulated with interest and set off against the capital value on vacation of the premises, with the local authority repurchasing under a right of pre-emption at the district valuer's figure.

At the moment, many advisers recommend that their elderly clients should dispose of their assets before entering a home so that they can leave the bill to be met by the ratepayer. I believe that many would welcome the opportunity to purchase an interest to give themselves the dignity of home ownership throughout the remainder of their lives and avoid the present encouragement to dispose of their assets prematurely. Clearly, this would be of advantage not only to the elderly but to ratepayers and taxpayers.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Neil Thorne, Sir Gerard Vaughan, Dr. Michael Clark, Mr. Gerald Bowden, Mr. Bowen Wells and Mr. Michael Marshall.

PROTECTION OF THE RIGHTS OF THE ELDERLY IN HOME OWNERSHIP

Mr. Neil Thorne accordingly presented a Bill to enable those who go into Part III Accommodation under the National Assistance Act 1948 to assign up to a half share in their freehold or long leasehold property to a companion who has been residing with them for not less than five years and to assign the remaining share of their freehold or long leasehold property to the local authority, the capital value of which share shall become an interest in the local authority old peoples' home in which the assignor is to reside: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 1 March and to be printed. [Bill 65.]

Orders of the Day

Representation of the People Bill

Considered in Committee

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Sir John Farr (Harborough): On a point of order, Mr. Walker. How far do we intend to proceed in Committee today? Is the draft list of selections by the Chair the final list? Does that list allow for the new clauses that were tabled for consideration?

The Chairman of Ways and Means: New clauses are normally considered at the end of the Committee proceedings. The selection list is provisional and extends as far as we might reasonably expect to go today. We hope that the hon. Member's wish to reach the new clauses is fulfilled by the end of our proceedings. I assure the hon. Member that we have not ruled out the selection of new clauses.

Ordered,

That the Bill be considered in the following order: Clauses 1 to 10; Schedule 1; Clauses 11 to 22; Schedule 2; Clause 23; Schedule 3; Clauses 24 to 27; New Clauses; New Schedules; and Schedule 4.—[Mr. Mellor.]

Clause 1

EXTENSION OF PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE

5.5 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 2, line 12, leave out

'or treated for the purposes of registration as resident'

With this, I shall speak also to amendment No. 16, in page 2, leave out line 19.

There is a certain amount of indecision in the Bill as it stands, and I hope later to give examples. As the first Member to move an amendment, I point out that the Bill is a long one, comprising 27 clauses and a number of schedules. As I am sure that we shall examine the Bill carefully, and word by word, I shall try to make progress and keep my remarks succinct at this stage. I hope that the Government will listen carefully to what I say. I hope that, if they are persuaded by some of my arguments and reasoning, they will be generous enough to admit that there is merit in some of the amendments and accept them. If they do not accept the amendments because they are incomplete, I hope that they will take the amendments and bring them forward again on Report as Government amendments.

The amendments are not complete. I do not believe that it would be sufficient to leave amendments Nos 11 and 16 without adding extra words to them. The amendments seek to define a little more closely the conditions under which a person qualifies as an overseas elector. I believe that if a person moves from this country he should be registered as an overseas elector according to permanent residence when he was last resident in this country. A student can be registered at a university in London while his permanent residence is in another area; for example, in Northumberland. Students can properly establish residences in both places and appear on both registers at the same time. After graduating, the student could go abroad for, say, 10 years. I believe that it would be wrong if he continued to be registered as an overseas voter in that area of London where his name is on the electoral register.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can help on this point. If his amendment is accepted, will it have the effect of precluding a person who was a service voter, but who has left the armed services, from having a vote?

Dr. Marek: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. He anticipates what I was going to say. I said that the amendments were incomplete.

This case need not be confined to students, but could include landlords and business men. A person may conduct a business in a particular town in a particular constituency, but live in another constituency not too far away. Although his permanent residence is somewhere else, that person could be registered in both places. It would be wrong, if that business man sold the business and said that he was going to work abroad for a number of years, for him to be registered for the place where he had his business. If that person returned, he would return to his home and not to where he had his business.

As I understand the Bill, it allows people, such as students, those with jobs in different parts of the country, and others properly to register in more than one place. They would then be able to decide whether to register as an overseas voter for constituency A or B. That would be wrong. If they are to be treated as overseas voters, they should be registered for the place in this country of their last permanent residence.

I agree that if the amendments were accepted without any addition voters such as service men would not be able to vote. That applies also to patients in mental and other hospitals. It would be wrong for me to insist that because the hospital was their last place of residence they should be registered for that hospital. For that reason, the amendments are not sufficient in themselves.

I should like to refer the Committee to two documents. The first is Cmnd. 9140, "Representation of the People Acts". On page 26, paragraph 7 states:

"The right to vote should be extended to British citizens resident abroad who have previously been registered as electors. The right should be exercised in respect of the constituency in which the elector was last resident before he or she left. Separate arrangements would have to be considered for young people who left the United Kingdom before they reached voting age."

Perhaps it is a loose form of words, but the document states:

"The right to vote should be exercised in respect of the constituency in which the elector was last resident."

To me, that means where the elector lived, where his home was, and where he spent his evenings and slept. It does not mean the artificial words,

"or treated for the purposes of registration as resident."

The Government's reply to the first report from the Select Committee on Home Affairs sets out the Government's views. I hope that those views have not changed since they published that reply and that they will agree with me on that point.

I should also like to refer the Committee to Home Office circular RPA 200. On page 8, under "Residence", it states that

"on the one hand, a person is not to be registered for an address where he is staying temporarily on the qualifying date and, on the other hand, a person is to be registered for his normal place of residence even though he may be temporarily absent from it on the qualifying date."

Clearly, my amendments must be supplemented, perhaps on Report. The intention is that the person should be registered at his normal place of residence even though he may be temporarily absent. To continue the analogy, overseas electors should not be given the choice whether they are to be treated as electors for the place where they are ordinarily resident, or—there may be a safe Labour or Tory seat or some other consideration—to say, "I wish to be registered as an overseas voter for the seat where I had my business or where I was at university." He may not necessarily be resident at the university for three years; he may have been there for one year doing a diploma.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Is not the hon. Gentleman's argument directed at the practice of multiple registration? Is not the evil against which he is now inveighing merely an extension of the choice available to those who are multiple registered to those who happen to be overseas at the time?

Dr. Marek: I shall not comment on the hon. Gentleman's remarks at this stage, because I am sure that multiple registration will be discussed later. I am not seeking to argue that we should change the current practice of allowing students to register at two places. A student who spends 30 weeks a year at university can establish residence in that university. If he then spends the remaining 22 weeks of the year at his home, he can establish residence at his home.

There is a distinction between that and what the hon. Gentleman invited me to consider. The distinction is that the overseas voter leaves both addresses at which he has been resident and moves abroad for five, six, seven or 10 years. His links with his registered address must necessarily become weaker as time passes. If the Committee decides that that person should be allowed an overseas vote, it should be allowed only for his normal place of residence — his home. That is partially recognised in Cmnd. 9140 and RPA 200 also talks about that.

RPA 200 states:

"The question of whether or not in borderline cases a man is to be regarded as resident is . . . one to be resolved 'on a commonsense jury basis . . . by the ordinary understanding of man in the use of ordinary words in the English language'."

If decisions are to be made in that way, they will be much more difficult if we have the words,

"or treated for the purposes of registration as resident".

If those words are deleted, we would be saying that the person is "resident at that address". It would then be necessary to table further amendments to ensure that service voters, hospital patients and the other categories mentioned in RPA 200 could nevertheless be registered as overseas voters at their normal addresses.

Precision is the necessary prerequisite for such a provision. We must know where we are. We do not want electoral registration officers to have to make value judgments, or to have these matters going through the courts, with arguments going backwards and forwards. We should legislate precisely. We can start by removing the words that I have mentioned, and we could table further amendments to satisfy the conditions contained in RPA 200.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are two reasons why the Committee should not accept the amendment. The first is the one that I raised in an intervention. In its present form, the amendment would undoubtedly prevent service voters who subsequently go abroad from having a vote. It would have the same effect on mental hospital patients. I do not doubt that it would be possible to build in a host of exemptions to take account of those difficulties, but I am against complicated legislation. I do not want to see the Bill further complicated, unless there is a pressing need.

The second reason why the Committee should not support the amendment relates to the point made by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) said that he does not like the consequences of multiple registration. However, once we accept the principle that, for example, students may have two residences for the purpose of an election address if they are resident in this country it is nonsense not to carry forward that principle to when they go abroad for the relevant period. It is inconsistent. The hon. Gentleman should strike at the basic problem or accept the consequences.

Dr. Marek: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that a student undertaking a course at a university well away from his normal residence should be treated, during a period abroad, as an overseas voter entitled to a vote at the place of study, even if he has been there for only one year?

Mr. Hogg: I am saying that if it is right for him to vote as a resident at the university, which is a fairly tenuous connection in any case, I do not think it a particular mischief for him to carry that address forward if he goes abroad. The problem lies more in multiple registration than in being abroad.

Mr. Beith: I am glad that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) tabled the amendment, as it highlights one of the several difficulties arising from multiple registration and the way in which the concept of residence for registration purposes has been diluted in recent years. It has become apparent from a number of cases in both England and Scotland that what used to be understood by residence no longer holds in relation to electoral registration. It does not mean that the person lived or slept at the residence on the night, as in the case of the census, or was merely temporarily absent. It is possible to claim a number of residences at one and the same time on very general grounds. A person registered in several places can then choose where to exercise his vote.

The issue raised by the amendment is whether the person concerned should be able to exercise that choice from Tenerife, just as he can already exercise it from London, Liverpool or anywhere else in the United Kingdom. In other words, can he, as an overseas voter, exercise the same choice as he could within the United Kingdom? The amendment treats the symptom rather than the ailment. It is sometimes necessary to do that if the ailment cannot immediately be cured, but serious administrative difficulties arise. If we do not establish a procedure to check whether a person is resident where he claims to be resident in the United Kingdom, how can we do so in respect of the limited number of overseas claims? That is the basic problem.

As the problems of multiple registration will arise at several points in our consideration of the Bill, it is not without value that the Government have been required to consider them at this early stage. The idea that residence can be claimed and granted in respect of a large number of places strikes at the ordinary meaning of the word "residence", as the hon. Member for Wrexham pointed out. The use in the Bill of the phrase

"treated for the purposes of registration as resident"

underlines that problem.

I doubt whether the amendment can be made workable, although it seems to me even more illogical, undesirable and unfair to allow a person resident abroad to choose between several constituencies than for that to be possible from a base within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I find the amendments somewhat strange and confusing. I should have thought that both categories of electors should be treated in exactly the same way. It seems unfair, and indeed contrary to the Labour party's views, to seek to increase democracy by trying to ensure that everyone in this country can exercise the vote while seeking to deny people that right if they have to go abroad to work or study, although they may have played an active part in the electoral process in the past.

I believe that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) is more concerned about the practicalities of multiple registration. Certainly, one must always check very carefully against the electoral register to ensure that nobody votes more than once.

Dr. Marek: The hon. Gentleman is indeed confused. I am certainly not seeking to deny any student, or indeed anyone else, the right to vote as an overseas elector. I am merely seeking to ensure that he is registered and casts his vote according to his normal residence, not some artificial residence with which he has no strong links.

Mr. Bruinvels: A student registered both at his home address and at his university address may take one year of his course at the Sorbonne. The hon. Gentleman is surely not saying that such a person cannot choose the constituency in which he wishes to cast his vote. That would seem thoroughly unfair. I do not see why students should be treated differently from other people.

As the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has said, we shall be discussing multiple registration at several points in our consideration of the Bill. The electoral registration officers will perform their duties. I am sure that the hon. Member for Wrexham is not seeking to cast aspersions on them. It seems thoroughly unfair that a person who goes overseas should not be able to cast his vote in the constituency of his choice. So long as he keeps in touch with the United Kingdom—he may still be paying rates and taxes here—he should have the right to vote. I strongly oppose the amendment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I am glad to have the opportunity to reply to the first substantive debate in the Committee. It has been a well informed debate and I hope that it sets the scene for those to come in the several days of our consideration of this matter.

I will deal first with the effect of the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and then with the substantive point that he has raised, as that is clearly of more concern to him than drafting points. The effect of the amendment would be precisely that described by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) in his formidable address. My hon. Friend's contribution was all the better for being short and he made the two points that needed to be made. I shall reply in the same vein but at rather greater length.

The amendment would merely omit the provision whereby service voters are deemed to be resident at a particular address. Three years ago, voluntary patients were linked to that provision. If a person in either of those categories moved overseas the amendment would prevent his voting. I know that that is not the hon. Gentleman's intention, but that would be the effect of his amendment.

The hon. Gentleman is really concerned to narrow the choice of people registered in more than one constituency. Our provisions would use the definition of residence contained in the 1983 Act. That definition does not make any distinction in quality between the two qualifications which may be acceptable to the electoral officers of the constituencies concerned. The electoral officer has regard to the guidance of the courts, which have established that a person is entitled to registration in respect of a particular address if there is a substantial degree of permanence.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) pursues a lonely but dignified crusade against multiple registration.

Mr. Beith: It is not lonely.

Mr. Mellor: I meant by reference to some of his other crusades. Nevertheless, it has been held that a substantial degree of permanence can attach to more than one residence at the same time. That is why, as my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham has explained, it is difficult to address that matter in the Bill. I should say in defence of the draftsman that a good deal of effort has been made to try to ensure that the provisions do not become an excuse for people to do more picking and choosing other than on the one matter that has already been exposed. The Bill has been carefully drafted to ensure that where someone, within the qualifying period, has been registered in subsequent registers in different constituencies, he may qualify as an overseas elector only in respect of the last constituency in which he was registered.

It is recognised that some people may, within the seven-year period or whatever period the House may decide to be appropriate, have been registered in different constituencies in different years. That is taken care of. It is also carefully provided in clause 2 that a person may make an overseas elector's declaration only in respect of one constituency. If a person makes more than one declaration in a certain year, one for a first constituency and another for a second, the second declaration cancels the first. That is provided for by clause 2(5). Clause 2(4) provides that, if a person makes more than one declaration on the same day, both declarations are void.

5.30 pm

There is a difficulty if someone who wishes to qualify as an overseas elector is able to show that, when he was last registered in the United Kingdom, he was registered in two places. It is hard, within the definition of resident used throughout the 1983 consolidated statute which the Bill follows, to determine which residence has the greater permanence. That is not a judgment which the statute gives us a basis for making. I hope that the hon. Member for Wrexham will agree that, even if we were to conclude that it was desirable to try to establish which of the two residences was the more permanent, it would not be a very worthwhile exercise.

[Mr. Mellor]

I take the hon. Gentleman's point. He has uncovered the only occasion on which someone qualified as an overseas elector has a choice as to which constituency he should vote in. In drafting the legislation, we were at pains to avoid giving someone the opportunity to elect in which constituency he wanted to vote. Manifestly, some constituencies are more attractive than others to the individual elector. As the hon. Gentleman has percipiently noticed, the only exception occurs when, on the last occasion that a person was registered in the United Kingdom, he was registered in more than one place. As several hon. Members have acknowledged, it is an inevitable corollary of the existence of multiple registration—with which one may or may not agree—that someone in that position who then moves overseas should have a choice.

I hope that my explanation shows that we have thought about the problem and have sought to deal with the hon. Gentleman's point. However, I fear that I cannot offer him any hope that we could remove the option that exists in that narrow case.

Dr. Marek: I am grateful to the Minister for having had the matter considered by his Department. I only wish that some way could be found to limit people's choice. The situation is clearly undesirable, and finding a solution would be better for everyone. This is not a political point.

I hope that we shall be able to return to the substance of the amendments on Report if any new idea comes to mind. Meanwhile, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 2, line 14, leave out paragraph (c).

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 14, in page 2, line 14, leave out 'seven' and insert 'five'.

No. 66, in page 2, line 14, leave out 'seven' and insert 'ten'.

No. 69, in page 2, line 14, after 'seven', insert

'or such other period, being not less than seven years as the Secretary of State may by order determine; and no order shall be made under this section unless a draft therefore has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament'.

No. 30, in clause 3, page 5, line 8, leave out 'seven' and insert 'five'.

Mr. Powell: This group of amendments deals with the first major area of principle with which the Bill is concerned. Essentially, the amendments offer the Committee a choice. The Bill stipulates a period of seven years as the cut-off point for residents overseas beyond which they would not qualify to vote in this country. The official Opposition's amendment, No. 30 suggests five years. Amendment No. 66 suggests 10 years. The amendment in my name leaves the period at large.

It might not be inappropriate for me to observe that it is only once in a generation that Parliament considers major extensions to the franchise. There have been a number of measures over the years, but the last major debates on the representation of the people occurred in the 1940s. The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) is the only veteran of those days. It may be another generation before we reconsider the laws relating to our franchise.

Clause 1 deals with an important issue of principle: who should qualify to vote in our elections? In making that choice, we must reflect on the fact that social conditions change over the decades. The social background to the debates of three decades or more ago was very different from that of today. First, it is plain that the population is much more mobile within our country. People move much more often than they used to. Secondly, it is much more likely that people will go abroad than used to be the case—allowing for the circumstances of the couple of years or so following the end of the second world war, when there were still substantial numbers of servicemen abroad. The number of British subjects working abroad at present may well run to a million or more, and they are to be found in every corner of the globe. Many of them—perhaps the great majority—

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): How can the hon. Gentleman give a minimum figure of a million when on Second Reading the Secretary of State estimated half a million and when, in answer to a question that I put down, the Home Office admitted that that figure was only an estimate?

Mr. Powell: As the right hon. Gentleman says, my figure is an estimate. I do not accept the estimate made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. My information, which has been drawn from a number of sources, suggests that the figure might be very much higher. At bottom one can only guess.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): I have no doubt that my hon. Friend has seen "The Government Reply to the First Report from the Home Affairs Committee", in paragraph 2.8 of which the Government estimate that "of the roughly three million British citizens resident abroad perhaps 600,000 ar so are of voting age".

Mr. Powell: As there are no accurate statistics, we have to guess. It is clear that conditions exist today which make it much more likely that British subjects will serve abroad for a period. We already make provision to enable Crown servants and British service men, abroad for a temporary period, to vote. Such provision should be extended to a much larger number of people.

The cut-off point is a matter of judgment and my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has opted for seven years. The House is now being asked to consider a series of different judgments. We are debating not the principle of whether the franchise should be extended to British subjects who are resident overseas, but for what period during their absence they should qualify to be registered. We should remember that registration is the crucial element in determining who is able to vote. The franchise rests only with British subjects resident abroad who have registered to vote. Figures that have been made available through the Library show that for France, which has a generous law towards its nationals who are resident abroad, although many qualify, few vote. There might be many reasons for that. Although some British subjects have left permanently and are therefore unlikely to want to register, many others have every intention of returning. The date of their return might be determined by a fixed contract. Although some might return after a fixed period of service, others have an open-ended contract and might return at any time.

Information that I have been given through the European Assembly suggests that there might be 250,000 British subjects living in the European Community who would qualify for registration if they were so minded. However, a large proportion of them would be excluded by the seven-year rule. I know people for whom seven years would be too short but who have every intention of returning to and retain substantial links with Britain. I have in mind a man who works in Greece. He is the highest sterling earner in Greece and is able to contribute substantially to our balance of payments through shipping and insurance. His children are at school here and he has a house here on which he pays rates. However, the house is let, so he does not qualify because he is not resident here on the qualifying date. We should also consider those who go to the orient. People who serve companies that are based substantially in the far east have to undergo an extensive period of training to learn Japanese or Chinese, for example. We often hear that the business man who seeks a contract must be in China for 10 years before getting the slightest idea that there might be a contract going. Nevertheless, such people intend to return to Britain at a convenient time.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): My hon. Friend seems to be arguing that, once a person who is registered in Britain goes abroad, he should have the privilege of having a share in choosing a Government in Britain although he has no property here, pays no rates, pays no taxes and makes no contribution to Britain. Is there not an argument for saying that people who are abroad in those circumstances and who do not retain their connection with Britain should be told that there is no representation without taxation?

5.45 pm

Mr. Powell: There is such an argument but it is not necessarily convincing. The principle of no taxation without representation has not been imported into our law and it would be a bad principle to import. If my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) were appointed a Commissioner to the European Community and he served two terms there lasting eight years, he might be able to retain a residence in Britain which he did not let. He would be able to return to that residence and qualify for registration. He would be able to continue to register because he could afford a second home. The people who will be discriminated against are those who are unable to afford a second home, which is a prerequisite to registration.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Is my hon. Friend entirely right? I accept that someone who has a second home and who is resident here on the qualifying date has the franchise, but does he agree that it is not sufficient for that person to be here only during the night of the qualifying day? Must he not be resident in order to justify registration?

Mr. Powell: My hon. Friend might have stated the law, but I should be extremely surprised if the practice of registration was not that a person qualified as a result of being resident purely on the qualifying date. My hon. Friend's argument is fascinating and arcane, but I believe that residence on the one day is all that is required. That is why it is not unknown for people who are staying with friends on the relevant night sometimes to find that they are on the electoral roll. The form refers to only one day, although occupiers are told that it can be filled in in advance.

The amendments will set the pattern for the future. It may be a further generation before these matters are substantially reviewed. Although we may discuss whether the clause will stand part of the Bill, we are at present discussing the choice of four different periods — five years, seven years, 10 years and at large. The pace of social change is developing in such a way that we would be wise to opt for the longest period, that is, at large. Many people retain permanent connections in and intend to return to the United Kingdom. They would be excluded even under the seven-year rule. As we have allowed for the principle, it would be appropriate to take it to its full extent by eliminating paragraph (c), which my amendment seeks to do.

Mr. Kaufman: I wish to speak to amendments Nos. 14 and 30. As the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) said, we are not debating the principle of the expatriate vote. The Opposition remain totally opposed to the clause, and on clause stand part my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) will explain why we oppose it. As the hon. Gentleman said, these amendments deal with the content of the clause rather than with the principle behind it.

The hon. Gentleman advanced his case in a peculiar way. He admitted that he was providing what might be a massive franchise at a guess by offering the expatriate franchise at large. His reason for providing it was extremely dubious — that more British people travel abroad for longer periods now than was the case in previous generations and centuries. That is strange. The number of people who travelled from this country to colonise large parts of the world, which resulted in the British Empire and then the British Commonwealth, was larger in absolute numbers and far larger in proportionate numbers than those who travel abroad on short contracts now. There has been no change in the social circumstances. The change that could justify his amendment, were it to be justified, is the change in the methods of communication, which make it theoretically possible for a ballot paper to be sent to distant parts and returned. The reliability of a ballot paper reaching its destination and being returned on time must take account of the extremely dubious record on reliability of certain overseas post offices, but I do not wish to go into that now.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise a further difference, which is that the improvement in communications and in the media enables people resident abroad to follow and retain an interest in affairs in the United Kingdom to a greater extent than was previously possible?

Mr. Kaufman: If the hon. Gentleman means that people resident abroad can gain through newspapers knowledge of what is taking place in the United Kingdom, it depends on which newspaper they read. If he means that they obtain information via the electronic media, the coverage, for example, in Nepal of affairs in the United Kingdom is minimal, not necessarily representative and, therefore, proportionately satisfactory.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The right hon. Gentleman probably underestimates the effectiveness of electronic communications in conveying news, and the high standard of communications of the BBC world service abroad, which may even be higher than its service within the United Kingdom. When I travelled in the Punjab recently, I heard the results of a match between Brora Rangers and Keith Athletic. That is a remarkable piece of information which few Scottish newspapers carried.

Mr. Kaufman: Presumably the hon. Gentleman would base the casting of his vote on such a consideration.

The principle will be debated on clause stand part. I speak to amendments Nos. 14 and 30, which reduce the period from seven to five years. The Opposition believe that, if the Committee unwisely decides to endorse this principle, it is right to limit its scope.

As the Bill stands with the seven-year period, the expatriate franchise could include two general elections and any intervening by-elections. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) pointed out, the link with this country of a person who is abroad grows weaker as the period of absence extends. A person who remains out of the United Kingdom for two general elections cannot claim the right to participate in displacing or endorsing a Government under which that person has not lived. Such a person has not paid that Government's taxes, and has not experienced that Government's policies at first hand. His connection with the United Kingdom will have grown tenuous, and will at best be second hand and gained from listening to whatever uncertain communications there may be on the BBC world service and from buying the overseas edition of The Times, the Daily Mail, or whatever.

We have a constituency system of parliamentary elections. Under it a person votes not for a Government but for a Member of Parliament to represent him or her. An overseas voter who has not lived in the constituency in which he or she has a right to vote will not be in direct contact with the issues and problems of the constituency. As a parent, he will not have experienced the education system or been able to campaign about school closures. As a sick person he will not have used the National Health Service, been in hospital or been able to form an opinion about health provision. As a driver, he will not have used the roads or public transport and, therefore, cannot know about those issues. He will not have been a householder who has paid rates and, therefore cannot have an opinion about local government finance policy, the rate support grant policy and other matters which form the nexus of issues on which people base their vote.

Mr. Beith: The same gentleman might have experienced the nationality of his children being threatened by legislation introduced by the Government, might have had his taxation substantially altered, favourably or unfavourably, and might have had the services of the British consulate removed from the place in which he lived.

Mr. Kaufman: He might even have been blown up by a British nuclear weapon, in which case the matter would not arise. Such a person will not have been able to play a direct part in the affairs of the constituency, even so limited a part as signing a petition, or the major part of being active in a political party, residents association, ratepayers association, the women's voluntary service, the scouts, ex-service men's associations, or any of the organisations that make up the web of community that exists in Britain and in which those who live outside the country cannot participate.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that if a person who ordinarily resides abroad were permitted to vote in more than one general election, subsequent to the passing of the Bill, those accumulated votes could influence the outcome of a general election?

Mr. Kaufman: That is true. The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) has a colleague who was elected with a majority of only seven votes at the general election. It would be perfectly possible in a general election, with the Government's estimate of an average of 800 such votes in each constituency, for a result to be swayed by those votes. In a narrowly contested general election, of which we have had three during the past 20 years, it may be possible for the Government to be changed as a result of the casting of such expatriate votes.

What is more, it is extremely unlikely that someone who benefits from the expatriate franchise will have had personal contact with the candidates opposing the sitting Member of Parliament, although at some stage before he left the country, he may have met or corresponded with the Member. If this fancy franchise is to be invented, it should be limited to one statutory length Parliament, during part of which it is likely that the voter would have had a chance to live under the Government on whom he would be delivering a verdict, and during which he would have observed and experienced the services of the Member of Parliament for whom he would vote. An elector who has lived in Britain for part of the Parliament which will end with the general election in which he has an expatriate vote should have been able to shoulder the burden, if there was any, and to reap the benefit, should there be any, of the Government upon whom he will deliver a verdict. He should also have had the chance to meet the sitting Member of Parliament and to become involved, to some extent, in local issues. He will at least have paid some taxes.

I do not know whether the gentleman who has done the country so much long-distance benefit from Greece has also been sending cheques regularly to the Treasury as part of his contribution to the nation's well-being; he will not have paid rates; he will not have paid domestic telephone bills; he will not have paid fuel charges; he will not have experienced all of the burdens upon which citizens have the right to express an opinion when they cast their votes in a general election.

We believe that five years is a reasonably long time for anyone to be away from the country and yet have a definite intention of returning. We are dealing with the absence from the country of the entire family. If the rest of the family stays in Britain and is resident here, while the person applying for the vote is absent, the latter will almost certainly retain the potential for a residential qualification. If he has residence, he retains vicariously, and possibly personally, all the obligations except the payment of income tax.

Our amendment stretches the benefit in favour of the applicant, because it could allow him to vote in a by-election in which he would not know the would-be successor to the Member of Parliament who had vacated the seat, although he might know his opponents, if they had previously been candidates in an election when he was still resident in Britain. As by-elections have developed in recent years, they have concentrated much more on special rather than general issues, and on local as well as national issues. If we make it possible for him to vote in a by-election, we shall have extended the benefits of this dubious franchise as wide as they should go.

To go beyond five years—the statutory length of a Parliament — would stretch the theoretical residential qualification to the point of mockery. The fact bears repeating that the British franchise is based not only upon the constituency but on residence, as the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said, albeit in a different context. What makes this franchise fancier than any other fancy franchise that we have had for a long time —certainly since the abolition of the university vote—is that it is based not on residence but on option. That being so, it should not be a franchise at large, as proposed by the hon. Member for Corby, but it should be strictly limited to the length of one normal Parliament. The hon. Gentleman's amendment would allow someone a voice in the Government of the country without having experienced the effects of that Government.

Our contention is that five years is the maximum for which any logical and democratic justification can be found for the expatriate franchise. That is why we shall ask the Committee to accept our amendment.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): I am pleased to support the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), which stands also in my name.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) seemed to position himself in an awkward corner as a small islander among the Socialist internationals. To try to attach importance to the size of the group whose enfranchising we are discussing is completely immaterial to the debate. As other hon. Members have said, that becomes more irrational as communications become easier. The communications aspect applies not only to the delivery of the vote, or the ability to vote—the ballot paper—through increasingly speedy mails, but to the ability of those who live abroad, sometimes very far away, to visit Britain regularly.

I speak from personal experience. I lived in the United States of America for almost eight years, which, under the Bill as it stands, would disfranchise me in British elections. However, I had every intention of returning to Britain, as I did, and I visited Britain regularly — sometimes as many as three times a year. That is not a picture of someone losing his roots in or connections with Britain, or of someone experiencing vicariously what the country was going through during that period.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Does my hon. Friend not attach importance to the issue already raised by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)—that in this country we vote for candidates in a single constituency, and that the longer the period that has elapsed, the less is the likelihood that the individual will have a close connection with the constituency, particularly as the information which he obtains about affairs in the constituency while he is abroad is likely to be small? I have much sympathy for the proposition that five years, rather than seven, would be appropriate, bearing in mind that that is approximately the length of one Parliament.

Mr. Rathbone: I anticipated that point and will return to it in a moment.

There is nothing peculiar in this country in voting for a candidate in a constituency. It may be called something different in other parts of the world, and almost always is, but in almost all electoral systems people vote for a candidate or, in some cases, a series of candidates from one geographical area.

To take up another point raised by the right hon. Member for Gorton — representation being tied to taxation—we have all been brought up with, and I think abide by, the thesis of no taxation without representation. When that is turned on its head it becomes an incredibly peculiar statement, particularly from the Opposition. By taking that line the right hon. Gentleman is saying that only those who pay taxes should have the right to vote. Many people right now vote legally, straightforwardly and regularly, yet may not pay income tax, capital taxation, local taxes or even indirect taxes because of the narrowness of the way that VAT is drawn. [Interruption.] It is conceivable. The right hon. Gentleman may not have them in his constituency, but I have them in mine. If he ties the right to vote to having established that right through paying taxes, he is starting down a most uncomfortable route.

Dr. Marek: Although the people to whom the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) is referring may not pay taxes directly, every time they go to a shop they pay tax. More important, they place themselves under a liability to pay tax.

Mr. Rathbone: The hon. Gentleman has raised a good point. His right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton did not make that point. It would be very difficult to measure when a person had made himself available to pay taxes to an extent sufficient to earn the vote. For instance, on that line of argument, every visitor to this country pays taxes when he makes purchases. Does he automatically have the right to vote? I do not think the right hon. Gentleman would argue that.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): The hon. Gentleman said that when he was living in America for eight years he visited this country regularly. Presumably on entering Heathrow he became eligible to pay tax indirectly. Can he tell me who does not pay tax in Britain? I am fascinated by the concept that somebody does not pay tax in some way.

Mr. Rathbone: I have just deployed the argument. If we are referring to direct taxation, I can produce instances. If it is indirect taxation, many people are disfranchised, because they pay taxes from time to time on a visiting basis. On that line of argument they should be given the right to vote. What is marvellous about this discussion is that it illustrates so beautifully how complicated is the whole attempt to tie representation in any way to the payment of taxes. That was the line that the right hon. Member for Gorton was pursuing. It should not bear any consideration by us.

Mr. Stanbrook: My hon. Friend is asking that people who will live perhaps thousands of miles away from this country for the rest of their lives may take part in deciding what sort of Government we should have, even though they make no contribution to the welfare of the country. Surely that is the basic argument, apart from the argument about taxation. The basic question is: what are the people to whom my hon. Friend is referring contributing for the privilege of helping to determine the Government of the country?

Mr. Rathbone: It is difficult to measure. Opposition Members should not laugh, because it is a serious point. The fact that a person is living on the other side of the world does not mean that he is not contributing to the welfare of the country. Many of the people we are talking about are making a direct contribution — perhaps by payments to their families, by payments for educating their children, by a contribution to a pension plan or a retirement fund, or in innumerable other ways. They may also be making a contribution by way of improving exports to the countries in which they are living by developing contacts for future services and exports to those countries. Why should we apply such measurements only to people who are living abroad? Why not apply them to people living in this country? We would tread a very dangerous path if we were to start to try to qualify by behaviour someone's right to vote.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman is reaching a point that I wanted to make. Once one starts weighing the contribution to the country, one is indeed in difficulty. Some of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues might say that those who have been unemployed and supported by the state for a certain time should be deprived of the vote.

Mr. Rathbone: I very much doubt whether that was in the mind of any of my hon. Friends. It is a dishonourable suggestion. All sorts of qualifications — honourable, dishonourable or somewhere between the two — might be applied to individuals. Thank goodness, years ago we moved away from a property or any other qualitative qualification for the right to vote.

On Second Reading I pointed out that other countries operate a reasonable system of establishment of a right to vote in perpetuity for citizens living abroad. There are six bases on which a French citizen can establish a right to vote—in the commune of birth, in the commune of last domicile, in the commune of last residence, in the commune where one of his antecedents is or has been registered, in the commune on the electoral register of which one of his children is registered, or in any commune of choice of more than 30,000 inhabitants. That is a broad spectrum under which a French citizen living abroad, for whatever period of time, can register his right to vote. That encourages the French citizen who is living abroad to participate in what is going on in his country and to vote accordingly.

Mr. Ron Hayward (Kingswood): Does my hon. Friend not find it amazing, as the French people do, that senior employees of Airbus Industrie, who are contributing to the general wealth of Europe — of Britain, France and Germany—and who are resident in Toulouse, are not able to vote because they have been resident as senior salesmen there for many years? It is a cause of some amazement to the French that British citizens in that position, helping the European export effort, are not able to vote in their own country.

Mr. Rathbone: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that pertinent illustration of the point that I was making, showing the contrast with the situation applying to French nationals. Parallels are often drawn between the constitutions of this country and those of France and the United States. Sometimes they are parallel, but in some respects they have diverged, and two of the three have more liberal ways of allowing their citizens to vote.

The United States guarantees the constitutional right to vote to those who live outside the United States of America, subject to two conditions: first, proper registration within the person's state of residence; and, secondly, that the person has a valid United States of America passport, a national identity card or other national registration card. That is a timeless and basic right of United States of America citizens.

One should look warily at the conclusion that a period of time is any illustration of the links that one has with one's country. There are those who have lived abroad for many years, perhaps even decades, who are extremely close to this country, who follow matters here and who visit and have relatives and interests in this country. Though they are incredibly tied to Britain, it is ludicrous that they should not have the right to vote here.

There are those who have gone away for two years and who feel completely divorced from this country, who have no interest in what goes on here, who have re-established their families perhaps on the far side of the world and who never think about Britain, or, if they do, it is of no importance in their lives.

I plead with the Home Secretary to reconsider the matter. It is, of course, his intent to try to strike an agreement with the Opposition on an important constitutional development which, as has been pointed out, comes once in a blue moon. In this part of this constitutional reform, a part which will affect so many people—though "many" is not the important quotient—it is for those who might have the right to vote if they did not have the time barrier to that voting that I ask his reconsideration.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): The hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) was right to stress the fundamental importance of this debate, because it goes to the underlying principle of our representation. We are, after all, considering the constitution of the House, the manner in which hon. Members are elected to compose the House and, thereby, to decide the nature of the Government and, to some degree, to keep control over the policies and administration of the Government.

Our representation in this House never has been a representation of all who are British citizens, wherever they may be in the world. As the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) pointed out, that is an alternative approach which other democracies, such as France and the United States, have taken. That is not the principle on which this House is, or has been, constituted. It has been constituted on the principle of geographic identity and representation, and the election of a person responsible for the representation of that constituency. It is, in a sense, a congress of constituencies.

The Government find themselves in the difficulty of falling between the two alternative principles. They have moved away from the principle of geographical representation and have appeared to embrace the principle of citizenship. Yet they have settled down in a middle position, where the principle of citizenship is qualified by the length of last registration in a constituency in the United Kingdom. The anomaly of their position is amusingly illustrated in clause 2 (3) (b), which requires that the declarant must be a British citizen.

Under our existing law, a citizen of the Irish Republic, if he is resident in a constituency in the United Kingdom, is a parliamentary elector in that constituency. The Government do not propose to say in the Bill that he has been registered in a constituency, that he has been away for only seven years and that therefore he can still vote in that constituency. They place citizenship as the deciding criterion of his qualification when he is not resident in the United Kingdom. That illustrates the anomaly and contradiction of attempting to combine a geographical representation, as we essentially have it in this House, with a citizenship representation of those living outside.

Any effort to find a criterion which will satisfactorily identify persons not living in a constituency and who should help in deciding the outcome of an election in that constituency proves to be a failure. One criterion which has been quoted is that of intention, and we have been told, "Here are British citizens who lie abroad for the good of their country," as it used to be said of British ambassadors, "and, dear folk, they have the intention of returning home one day."

Maybe they do, and maybe they do not. There is no means of ascertaining that or of foreseeing its fulfilment. And in any case, where should they then be registered? Should they be registered and able to vote in the constituency in which they were born and perhaps brought up—say a mining constituency in west Yorkshire—even though, owing to the course of their career and success in a commercial life, Torquay, Bournemouth, Eastbourne or some lush area in the home counties may be their intended place of eventual sojourn?

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman is wrong to focus on the constituency in which the vote is to be cast. He should begin by asking whether it is just to deprive such a person of a vote. If the answer is that it is not just, it then becomes a matter of mechanics as to where the vote is cast.

Mr. Powell: If the vote is given the mechanics must follow, but I do not accept any recognisable criterion of justice. We are concerned with the application of a system, and it is incompatible with the system on which this House is constituted that we should extend the franchise to British citizens wherever they may be in the world and whatever may be their relationship with this country. Still less satisfactory has been the criterion of the benefits which they confer on the home country. It would go ill with many of us if we had to explain to the registration officer the benefit that we confer on the United Kingdom before he would agree to register us at the address where we are resident. That illustrates the difficulty of arguing a case on some preconceived principle of justice or fairness for those who have no local identification in this country to enjoy the franchise.

6.30 pm

The difficulty in which the Government find themselves is shared by the Opposition in endeavouring to modify the principle in the clause as it stands. It was ingenious, I admit, of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) to argue that five years is the length of a Parliament and that after five years, if a Parliament has run its full length, there will be another show on the road. However, on any logical consideration, five years is no more satisfactory than seven years as an arbitrary dividing line between those who are identifiable with a constituency by the simple fact that they live there, that their home is in that constituency and that they are part of the local community, and the alternative principle, towards which the Government have partially lurched, of conferring the franchise upon all citizens, wherever they may be. It seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman is on firmer ground in rejecting that principle when we come to consider the clause.

My right hon. and hon. Friends and I believe that the new principle that we are trying partially to shoehorn into our constitution is not acceptable. Therefore, we shall oppose the Question, That the clause stand part of the Bill. However, as five years is, so to speak, a lesser evil than the seven years of the unsatisfactory arrangement in the clause as it stands, then five years be it, rather then seven, though there is little of a logical character to be urged in favour of that choice.

Mr. Beith: A fascinating picture has been painted for us tonight, in particular by the Opposition Front Bench. It is the picture of the properly qualified voter, the person who reads a good newspaper and is familiar with the political events of this country, who follows closely in the electronic media, as they were described, the to-ings and fro-ings of British politics, who pays his taxes and rates, who knows, and has had personal contact with, the candidates standing in the constituency in which he intends to vote and who genuinely resides at the place in which he has an electoral qualification. Those are all the characteristics which, it is said, persons living abroad lack. Therefore, they are the reasons why they should not have the franchise extended to them for five years, seven years or for an indefinite period, as proposed at the start of this debate.

All hon. Members know that if those were to be the relevant criteria we could challenge almost every voter who comes into a polling station. Indeed, there is a provision for party agents to be present in the polling stations and to challenge voters. If they could apply those criteria as well as the criteria which they can now apply, such as being the person one claims to be, they would have a field day. Very few voters in any of our parties would get over the threshold. Therefore, we begin with an unrealistic picture. It is unrealistic in this sense. I refer to the last of the qualifications that I mentioned. It assumes that a person is always genuinely resident in the place for which he has an electoral qualification.

The point is that we are now debating not whether we should give the vote for five or seven years to persons who are working abroad, but whether we should extend the franchise to those who have been unable to maintain a residential qualification in this country by means of ownership or occupation of property. We are talking about extending the franchise to many who are probably the less well off among those who are working abroad: those who have been unable to preserve their electoral rights in Britain by owning property and filling in forms relating to that property in the United Kingdom.

As was pointed out earlier, those who are reasonably well off will probably have opted, for other reasons, to maintain a residence in this country and perhaps not to let it out, so as to be in a position to fill in annually the form that keeps them on the electoral register. As many hon. Members know, it is by no means necessary to complete the householder's form year after year in order to remain on the electoral register. The tendency is for names to remain on the register unless evidence is produced that they ought to be taken off it. Therefore, very many people who now live overseas, some of whom may suffer from the serious disadvantages mentioned by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)—that they have not read the overseas edition of The Times and have not paid their taxes—are qualified to vote because of their occupation of property in this country, while others do not qualify.

It is to the generally less well endowed category, those who have been unable to preserve a residential qualification in this country, that the amendments to this clause are addressed. They include people who work for international institutions like the United Nations, the European Community, people in trading activities, missionaries and those who are engaged in low-paid service overseas, including an increasing number of manual workers. If there has been a social change in recent years, it is probably reflected by the increase in the number of manual workers who go, for example, to work for a number of years in the Gulf states, where work is available in the construction industry.

Therefore, we are referring to a range of people, some of whom have votes and some of whom do not, entirely according to whether they have been able to maintain property in this country. There is no reason to assume, as some hon. Members who have criticised this proposal have assumed, that links with this country tend to diminish as time passes. I know of no basis for that assumption. Indeed, there is considerable evidence to suggest that those who are forced to be absent from this country for a longer period develop an increasing affection for, and sometimes a concern to return to, this country. There is no evidence to suggest that a period of absence from this country reduces involvement and commitment.

I am very glad that tonight the right hon. Member for Gorton did not use the arguments relating to bank robbers who are resident in Spain—arguments which seemed to carry with them the underlying assumption that all of those who live abroad are tarred with the same brush and display some kind of basic disloyalty to this country. It may be that the right hon. Gentleman is saving those arguments for the debate on clause stand apart, but he has concentrated until now upon the more limited argument relating to qualification.

The Government sought initially to exercise a judgment about the period for which it was reasonable to give an electoral qualification to those who had been unable to preserve one by having maintained a residence in this country. The Government decided upon seven years. If newspaper reports are to be believed, there is reason to believe that the Government may be persuaded by the Labour party's argument that if we are to extend the franchise we should do so only for five years, not for seven, thus reducing the effect to the period of one Parliament and one general election. I am opposed to that reduction. I have put down an amendment stating that we should consider a period of 10 years. That period might be more widely accepted.

I sympathise with the argument of the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) that there is no obvious reason for setting a time limit upon this qualification. I accept the view that the qualification can continue indefinitely. Indeed, there are a very large number of people who have looked for redress of what they consider to be an injustice in this legislation but who will not get it because they have already been working abroad for more than five or seven years and, in doing so, have been serving the interests of this country.

There is something fundamentally ill-advised about bringing forward a legislative proposal that is designed to remedy an injustice, only to find that the proposal does not serve to remedy the grievance. The sense of injustice is perhaps greatest among those who have been working abroad for five, six, seven, eight, or 10 years, very many of whom are working in the interests of this country. If those people, by the limitations imposed by these amendments, do not get relief from injustice, what purpose have we served? That is why I am so critical of a limitation even to seven years. I am even more critical of a limitation to five years. I believe that we have aroused expectations. Indeed, the speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the Conservative party conference helped to arouse the expectation that something would be done about what is felt to be a real grievance.

It is certainly felt to be a grievance when set alongside the practice of so many other countries which rate their citizenship more highly than do we. British citizens working abroad feel that almost every other country in the world sets a greater store by the standing of its citizens working abroad and makes a more genuine assumption about their loyalty than do the British Government. That feeling will be even stronger and will not be assuaged if we give the impression that we are legislating to remove this grievance, and yet so limit the offer—in this case five years—that many will not benefit at all, while those who do benefit will be lucky if they get a vote at one general election.

Charles Hargrove, better known as a former correspondent of The Times, but now the chairman of the British Conservative Association in France, makes the point in a letter which he has written to my right hon. Friend the leader of the Liberal party. He said:

> "The Government has at last acknowledged that voting rights should be attached to British citizenship but has nevertheless included a restriction that is justifiable neither in principle nor in practical politics, i.e., to limit the voting right to those who have been abroad for less than seven years—on the grounds that, beyond this time limit, a Briton's links with his mother country would have become too tenuous. We argue from direct personal experience that the facts belie this assumption. Loyalty to Britain, and the willingness to defend and promote British interests, cannot be determined by a fixed time limit."

I share his view and I think that it is a mistake for the House to arouse the expectation that the Bill will remedy a real sense of injustice and then so to limit that remedy that it does not prove to be a remedy at all.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The approach of the right hon. Members for South Down (Mr. Powell) and for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) to this matter is uncharacteristically narrow. The approach of the right hon. Member for South Down has essentially been to ask whether it is right that a person resident abroad should have a vote in a constituency from which he has long departed. Answering that question in the negative, he goes on to be critical of the general approach adopted by the Government. That is the wrong approach for the reason that I shall shortly mention. The first question to ask is whether it is right to deprive of a vote a British citizen who intends to return. If the answer is that it is not right to deprive such a person of a vote, we have a lesser question as to the place of voting.

The Labour party, in this matter as in others, is extremely reluctant to see the franchise enlarged. Indeed, it is putting itself in the rather bizarre position, as has been described by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), of arguing in favour of something approaching a property, rate-paying, tax-paying, education—[Interruption.]—or residential qualification. The right hon. Members for South Down and for Gorton ignore the much broader consideration which is raised in the debate — the concept of loyalty, of allegiance, of affinity. That is a matter which the right hon. Member for South Down often comes to in other contexts — allegiance, affinity, loyalty or blood. All those justify the proposition that British citizens resident abroad have, prima facie, a right to vote.

Mr. Kaufman: Does the hon. Gentleman regard it as a sign of loyalty to nip off to the Channel Islands or somewhere else to dodge tax?

Mr. Hogg: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman asked that question. I shall come to it later when the House deals with amendment No. 29 which he has tabled. I support amendment No. 29 because it is undesirable that people who have renounced their domicile of origin should have a vote. But that is a narrow point. I take his point in so far as it goes, but it does not go to the root of the matter. The root of the matter is allegiance and affinity. If a person has undiluted allegiance and affinity to Britain, prima facie he has a right to vote.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Will the hon. Gentleman explain how he evaluates allegiance, loyalty and affinity? If he can define and judge whether somebody truly has loyalty and allegiance, he may carry more hon. Members with him, but I suspect that with such abstract concepts he will be hard put to say that he can identify loyalty in one man but not in another.

Mr. Hogg: There are two answers to the question that the hon. Gentleman has fairly posed. The first is that if a person does not have the allegiance and affinity of which I have spoken he is not likely to want to cast a vote. In a sense, the casting of a vote is the manifestation of the affinity and allegiance. I accept that that is a subjective judgment and the hon. Gentleman may take a different view, but I think that it is a view that will be shared by many hon. Members.

In the end it comes to a question of balance. Where do we strike the balance in such matters? I would rather ensure that everybody who deserves a vote has a vote, even if it includes a few unworthy folk, rather than, in the desire to exclude all unworthy folk, exclude people who should, in all conscience, have a vote. I would rather err on the side of enlarging the franchise than on the side of restricting it. Those are the two answers that I would give to the hon. Gentleman.

I have tabled amendments Nos. 66 and 69. Amendment No. 66 provides for the same term of 10 years as that proposed by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. There is no great magic in seven or 10 years, but because I am in favour of enlarging the period I go for 10 rather than seven or five years.

Amendment No. 69 is a little more important because it gives my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department the power to alter the period. I envisage a power to extend what I hope will be a 10-year period to a longer period, subject to an affirmative resolution of the House. The justification for that is that in the course of time many of the fears that have been put forward in the debate will seem to be misplaced. People will come to realise the injustice of excluding people from the franchise. If that is the view, it is right that we should enlarge the period. As has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), it is rare that the House has a chance to discuss election matters of this kind. To find time for primary legislation to enlarge the period would be difficult. Therefore, I prefer to do it by way of delegated legislation subject to an affirmative resolution of the House.

Mr. Fisher: By using the word "subjective" the hon. Gentleman gives away his case. He is making a value judgment about those abstract virtues which he suggests should be the qualification. The charm of the right to vote by a residential qualification is that no value judgment is made. If the hon. Gentleman has to make a value judgment, he puts himself in an impossible position. He can surely see the distinction between an objective test and a subjective value judgment.

Mr. Hogg: All questions that deal with justice are in the end subjective in their character. What is just or unjust is essentially a subjective test. Absolute standards cannot be applied. I am asking the House to form a collective view, albeit subjective, as to what is just, and I have put forward my arguments.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that were amendment No. 69 to become law it would give the Secretary of State an awesome power to alter the voting pattern in Britain? He could shorten or lengthen the period depending on whether it was in his interests. That would make it a recipe for gerrymandering.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman does not understand the real purport of amendment No. 69. It deals only with the period relevant to the overseas voter. That is the only period that can be altered — in this case from seven years to whatever period might be desired. But it is subject to an affirmative resolution of the House, not a negative resolution. It must have the affirmative approval of the House. That is a device to avoid the difficulty of bringing the matter back by way of primary legislation. If we rely on that, we shall never have the matter back in our lifetime.

[Mr. Hogg]

Mr. Bermingham: With great respect, the hon. Gentleman misses the point. If the amendment were to become part of the Bill the Secretary of State would be in a position, if he thought it in his interests to do so, to pass a resolution in order to enhance the period for the overseas voter. The Secretary of State tends to belong to the governing party which tends to command a majority in the House. Therefore, for purely political ends the Secretary of State could alter the period to his party's advantage, and that is something that we have never permitted.

Mr. Hogg: As I would expect of the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham), that is an ingenious argument, but, as I would also expect of him, it is wholly wrong, for this cogent reason. We cannot tell, for example, how many overseas voters there are.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Have a guess.

Mr. Hogg: Far less can we tell what are the political affiliations of overseas voters. I am sure that, being well advised, they are all Conservatives, but that may change in the course of time.

The point I seek to make is that no Secretary of State can form a very clear view of the political affiliations of overseas voters. If we are indeed vexed with this question, we should be much more vexed with the position which enables the Prime Minister to call an election as and when the Prime Minister chooses. That is a much greater power in this context than any power that the Bill may give to the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I am glad to have the opportunity to follow the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). I seek to reply first to the point that the hon. Gentleman made at the beginning of his remarks, when he said that the question—and he seemed to imply the sole question—that we should ask is whether it is unjust for individuals who are expatriates from the country to be denied the vote. He seemed to suggest that that was the sole matter that we had to decide and that that injustice should be remedied.

I can understand that many thousands, maybe hundreds of thousands, of people serving this country perfectly well —and, of course retaining allegiance to this country— all over the world are in that position and feel that sense of grievance. It may be that sense of grievance partly which has given rise to the amendment, although I shall come to some more esoteric points in a moment. But it cannot be that that is the sole question to be decided. However much our sympathy may be for persons placed in that situation, it is the responsibility—not the right, but the duty—of the House of Commons to decide what would be the effect of applying that principle to the constitution of the country as it currently operates.

The argument that has been put forward on this aspect —and the hon. Gentleman made no attempt to reply to it — is overwhelming. If the vote is afforded to expatriates, some advantage may be given in removing an injustice for some individuals, but serious injury will be inflicted on the constitution. That has to be taken into account. Those matters must be accepted, or at least understood and argued in the House of Commons by hon. Members.

I do not expect the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) to apply his mind to these matters, because the Liberal party has long since abandoned any idea of sustaining the principle that we should uphold the doctrine that a Member of Parliament represents his constituency. Most hon. Members have considered that to be a very important principle. Indeed, I believe it is one of the principles that have enabled our democracy to be a better and more adult democracy in some respects than democracies of many other countries. I say that in no boasting or, I hope, chauvinistic spirit. However, we know that the Liberal party and, in latter days, catching up a little breathlessly, the Social Democratic alliance, have long since abandoned that principle on the high ground that it would suit their members to move a system of proportional representation. They have not concealed their view. Nobody can accuse them of that. But they have elevated it into the highest principle of all.

On some occasions the leader of the Social Democrats, or the leader of the Liberals—I forget which, but I dare say that they are interchangeable in this respect, if not in others—has insisted that, after any election in which there was a balance, the most essential principle that would need to be settled beyond anything to deal with unemployment, the cost of living, foreign policy or nuclear weapons would be satisfying the demand of the Social Democrats and Liberals for proportional representation. Thus, the Social Democrats and the Liberals elevate this to a very high place. It cannot be placed higher. If that is the situation, we do not expect any sympathy from them.

I was slightly surprised by the second reason advanced by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed for wanting to tear up this part of the constitution. It was that high expectations on this subject were aroused at the Conservative party conference, and he thought that those expectations should be satisfied. It is the first time that I have ever heard a spokesman for the Liberal party say that we must satisfy that monstrous regiment of men and women who assemble at the Conservative party conference. I shall come to them in a moment because they are relevant to the debate. I do not expect for a moment that we shall have any support from the Liberal party or the latter-come-lately Social Democrats on the subject. A few years ago they were not so passionate about proportional representation and tearing up the relationship between the Member of Parliament and his constituency, but they are now. However, I shall leave them aside.

I agree entirely with what was said by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). The amendment that he has tabled is not, of course, even a second best; nor does he claim it to be so. He said that it is a modification of one of the worst parts of the Bill. It is, I suppose, one of the simplest axioms of our modern politics that any amendment tabled by my right hon. Friend is better than one tabled by the Home Secretary. In this case, I am sure that that is true. On that basis alone, I would be happy to go into the Lobby with my right hon. Friend, just as I am happy to accept his views on almost every subject. I do that in this case with slight reluctance, as he will understand, for the very arguments that he advanced. It is difficult to make anything resembling a silk purse out of this sow's ear of a Bill. It cannot be done. My right hon. Friend can have no great expectation of success in that enterprise. If any Member could do it, my right hon. Friend could, but it cannot be done. I suppose that that is the worst part of a bad Bill.

The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone), who supports the amendment, got into some very deep water. He said that the numbers do not count. The implication of the hon. Member for Grantham is that the numbers do not count. Under the present arrangements, if the numbers of people voting in a general election to decide the Government of a country were to be the equivalent of, say, half the total electorate, would anybody be fool enough to suggest that it would not matter if half of them paid taxes and half did not?

The principle of the numbers is, therefore, very important. The numbers of those who are to be included in the Bill is important. We have not been given the answers yet, and we do not know whether we shall be advised of them. I know that an amendment has been tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton which deals specifically with this matter. That amendment, as I understand it, will not allow the Government to go ahead with the Bill until they have given detailed evidence of the numbers involved. Of course we are entitled to know what the numbers are, because they could significantly alter the situation.

The argument of the hon. Member for Grantham, that many people in the country do not pay taxes, is nonsense. The Bill proposes — and this is novel in our constitutional procedure, as far as I know—that people who do not pay taxes are deliberately to be given votes. If that principle is to be incorporated in our constitutional or electoral practice, it ought to have been properly discussed. According to the Liberal party, it was discussed at the Conservative party conference, and that is enough for the Liberal party. As long as it was discussed there and got a thumping vote, the Liberals support it.

Mr. Beith: Will the right hon. Gentleman accept, as I did, that the Home Secretary appeared to be addressing himself at the time not to the Conservative party conference but to a far wider audience, and that the expectations that he aroused were not in that body but among those overseas who might obtain the vote? Should a person in this country who, by the very extent of his poverty, has had no income and therefore has paid no taxes for a period of time be deprived of the vote?

Mr. Foot: I am not in favour of depriving anyone of the vote if he has residential qualifications in this country. If the hon. Gentleman is seeking to build the whole of his great fabric of change in the constitution on that slender basis, the edifice will collapse even quicker than the structure that he proposed in his previous argument, and that was pretty weak. The hon. Gentleman should think rather more carefully. We are talking about a considerable number of people in different parts of the world who will have the power to settle elections in this country and results in individual constituencies without having participated in any of the normal processes of electoral appeal.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed has poured scorn on all the methods by which we, as humdrum candidates, try to put over our views—for example, the reading of newspapers. I suppose that people are still entitled to read The Times if they want to do so and not to be jeered at by representatives of the Liberal party for engaging in such an extraordinary activity. I do not claim that I am always successful in elections, but the methods by which we decide them are pretty good. If the methods are to be changed, there must be good reasons for doing so.

By considering these issues in Committee, I believe that we are illustrating our case even more clearly than if we were having a full discussion on the principle. That is often the result of detailed discussion on what the Government propose. It is a form of discussion which exposes their case all the more clearly. In this instance it has exposed the fact that there should have been proper discussion between the parties. I know that the Home Secretary mocks that view. I know also that he has the Select Committee up his sleeve, or something of that sort. However, we do not have government by Select Committees. Select Committees are not fitting substitutes for proper consultation between the parties. The hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), who moved the amendment, said that there had been hardly any discussions or debates on Representation of the People Bills since the 1945 Parliament, of which I was a member. I think that there have been more debates than the hon. Gentleman recalls, but I take his point.

It is true that this is a major Bill which involves an unspecified extension of the franchise in a way that we considered previously not to be right and which many of us still believe to be wrong in principle. If the Government wanted to go ahead with such a proposition, it was their duty to find the means whereby there could be proper and open discussion. I am not suggesting that there should have been secret talks, talks between the usual channels, or any hugger-muggery. The Government should have arranged for open discussions to take place. They are proposing to bring 500,000 or 1 million people into the franchise, whichever party they may vote for. Of course, we all have our guesses about that. There must be discussion with the other parties, even if the Liberal party does not want to attend. The Government should have made their proposal and we should have discussed it. If that had been done, we would have been able to consider these matters properly.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who always raises these matters to the very highest plateau of moral integrity, suggested that the Government have merely misunderstood the situation. I wonder whether they do not understand it all too well. A simpler explanation of their behaviour is that they preferred not to have discussions with the Opposition. In taking that view, the opportunity for discussion is removed and discussion becomes superfluous. As I said on Second Reading, they could have arranged a Speaker's Conference. That would have allowed the issue to be brought out in the open, and people would then have been aware of what the Government were proposing. Perhaps a compromise could have been reached, but I would not have been in favour of it. I believe that the principle of expatriate votes is fundamentally wrong in our constitution. That is why we shall do our best to resist clause 1.

I repeat that it is my view that the Bill was not introduced in a proper way. Presumably the Bill was discussed by the Cabinet. We are talking about the sort of Bill that is introduced only once in half a century, and I suppose that the Bill might have been discussed even by the present Cabinet. When it was discussed, I am sure that the interests of the Conservative party were well taken into account. After all, it would have had its representative sitting with them. The spokesman, chairman or manager of Conservative Central Office, whatever he is called, is a Minister and he could have been present. I am sure that that precaution was taken. In this instance he might have plucked up courage and said a few words.

I am sure that the Government received guidance. Even if that did not happen in open Cabinet in case it might sneak out 30 years later, I am sure that consultations took place with Conservative Central Office before the Government went ahead with the Bill. One can imagine Conservative Central Office saying, "It is all right with us, boys"—or girls, or whatever one chooses to say. "We think that you should go ahead. Do not worry. If you read the report of the Select Committee, you might find a few examples that can be used to bolster your case. Try to dress it up as if it is a real constitutional proposal." I do not believe that it is anything of the sort. If this part of the Bill is enacted, greater benefit will be brought to the Conservative party than to any other party. That is one of the reasons why the Government have decided to pursue it.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The right hon. Gentleman has been condemning the Government in robust terms and pouring scorn on the Select Committee's report. Has he forgotten that clause 1 is more restrictive than the enlargement of the franchise that is proposed in paragraph 52 of the Select Committee's report, and that two of the Labour Opposition's Front Bench home affairs spokesmen were parties to the Select Committee's recommendation?

Mr. Foot: All the matters that the hon. Gentleman has raised were discussed on Second Reading. I shall be happy to debate them again now and to answer his questions. Events have illustrated the wisdom of what I and others have said.

It is improper for a Government to say that a Select Committee should be designated as a substitute for proper consultation between the parties or as a substitute for a Speaker's Conference. One of the reasons why Speaker's Conferences have had authority is that they have not been used too often. When major changes have been proposed, there have been attempts by almost all Governments to try to reach sensible agreements. The Government are guilty of a gross dereliction of duty in not taking that course. That is why we should sling out the whole Bill if we have the chance to do so. However, I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton that we should try to improve parts of it if we can.

When we come to decide whether the clause should stand part of the Bill, we shall have the opportunity for a fuller debate. Let us take the opportunity to sling out the entire clause and to trim down the Bill to the clauses which can decently be presented to the House of Commons. If that is done, it will be a slim Bill.

Sir Edward Gardner: I am glad to be able to take up some of the remarks of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). He always makes a compelling and engaging speech even though the arguments that he adduces are entirely unconvincing, as they have been today. He joins the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) in suggesting that there is no need in justice, logic or necessity to introduce the new right that will be created by clause 1, which will give those living abroad the right to vote in our elections.

This measure is no novelty. It does no injury to the constitution. As the Committee will appreciate, we have this provision already. Already people living abroad are entitled by statute to vote in our general elections by proxy or by post. They are known as people with the right to service votes—members of the armed forces and their wives or husbands, members of the Diplomatic Service and the Crown service generally. A number of other people have the privilege of being able to decide by their vote at an election this country's future course and conduct.

The clause seeks to extend that right in the name of justice to those people who are at present isolated from this country and frustrated in their desires to give guidance about the future conduct of the Government. Therefore, it seems to me, as I hope it seems to most hon. Members, that that principle, against which the right hon. Members for Blaenau Gwent and for South Down have been arguing —they say that that principle should not exist and that, if accepted, it will damage the constitution—should be upheld and welcomed by the Committee.

Clause 1 and the amendments we are considering will extend the franchise to people who will thereby benefit. I should like to ask my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary a question. Perhaps I am entering the realms of speculation and the imponderable, but it is a responsible question to which I hope I shall receive a reliable answer. The Government, in their reply to the recommendations of the Home Affairs Select Committee, suggested that about 3 million British citizens are living abroad and that about 600,000 of them would receive the vote because they had lived abroad for seven years. Can my right hon. and learned Friend assist the Committee by estimating how many British citizens will be enfranchised if the Bill's provisions come into force, first, for people living abroad for seven years and, secondly, for people living abroad for five years?

We are really trying to decide whether we should shorten or lengthen the time a person may live abroad without disqualifying him or her from the privilege of having a vote. Opposition amendment No. 14 suggests a period of five years. I am not entirely convinced by the arguments of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) who suggested that the five-year period should be accepted because that is the statutory life of a Parliament. I do not believe that that is necessarily the yardstick that should be applied in deciding how long or how short the period should be.

I hope that the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent accepts, in spite of the fact that he does not appear to put much value on the findings and recommendations of the Home Affairs Committee, that the Committee's recommendations, as with all good Select Committees, were based upon the consideration of a considerable quantity of evidence in testimony and documentary form. The Government, having considered the Committee's evidence and having concluded that that evidence could be acted upon, decided that the period during which a person could remain abroad and retain the vote should be seven years. The Government may be right or they may be wrong—that is a judgment.

As the Bill is drafted, the period is seven years. I shall not argue that that period is precisely right or wholly wrong or something that we should reconsider. One can play around with the figure and state, as in amendment No. 66, that it should be 10 years or state, as in another amendment, that there should be no limit, as my hon. Friends the Members for Corby (Mr. Powell) and for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) have argued. One takes into account those good and respectable arguments. But it is all guesswork. No one can pretend—I certainly will not pretend on anyone's behalf—that that guesswork is reliable. We must come to some conclusion.

I am opposed to those of my hon. Friends who believe that there should be no limit. I believe that there should be a restriction. At least for an experimental period, we could have a five-year or seven-year limit. I have two reasons for suggesting that the period should be five years. First, if the Government are prepared to compromise and to come down from a seven-year period to a five-year period, they will not breach any principle. Secondly, this is a constitutional Bill. When we discuss a constitutional instrument, it is essential that we should try, if possible, to have not just a majority in favour but a consensus. By accepting the Opposition's suggestion of five years, we have a better chance of obtaining a consensus than if we voted for seven years. If I may say so, because I know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary cannot say this for himself, my right hon. and learned Friend will have been wise in the extreme in deciding, as I hope he will, to accept the five-year period. We badly need the Bill, and we need to remove all obstacles to its passage.

Mr. Bermingham: This measure will extend the franchise, and I have never been in favour of extending the franchise. I shall give my reasons when the Committee considers whether the clause should stand part of the Bill. This is not the time to advance those arguments because we could range widely in discussing these matters.

If we are to extend the franchise, we must fix a time limit, because there comes a time when a person who has gone abroad ceases to have any realistic contact with the United Kingdom.

The argument has been advanced that there should be no limit. The hon. Gentleman who advanced it should consider for a moment the reality of what he was saying. The country receives many immigrants and it is one from which many people emigrate. In effect, he was saying that as years pass and more and more people go abroad we could reach the point when the number of people abroad entitled to vote for an unlimited period could well exceed 8 million.

I am a strong supporter of Select Committees. When Select Committees make recommendations, they are what they are—advice arrived at from the evidence they have heard. They rely upon the Government replying to the recommendations and the House debating them. A Select Committee in no way believes that it can impose its rule upon the House. It merely gathers evidence and expresses opinions. It is against that background that we look at the work of Select Committees.

The hon. and learned Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) seemed to think that the number involved in extending the franchise was about 600,000. I have studied the number of people who voted in the last general election. It was approximately 31·6 million, and 600,000 is 1·5 per cent. of that. If one then discounts that 1·5 per cent. by the average turn-out figure of approximately two thirds, one arrives at the figure that the overseas voting content will be approximately a 1 per cent. addition to the electorate. It has been known for 1 per cent. to decide general elections.

I put that matter before the Committee because when I was exchanging views with the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) it seemed that he entirely missed the point. I ask the Committee to reject amendment No. 69 decisively because although I have great respect for the hon. Gentleman's powers of logic, occasionally, with great respect to him, he seems to miss the point. We shall soon begin to know the number of persons involved in the exercise because they will be recorded constituency by constituency as the votes are registered.

In this day of modern science, it does not take too much ingenuity to work out how to poll those who are resident abroad and who seek to vote in our general elections. It would not be beyond the wit of the then Secretary of State to ascertain whether the total number of external electors —if I may put it that way—were of benefit to his or her party. It is against that background that I felt that this measure would put an intolerable strain upon the democratic political system. That is why I urge the Committee to reject amendment No. 69. It contains basic law. It puts a future Secretary of State in an almost intolerable position. When the matter is thought out logically, we can see that it is not one that we would wish on any Secretary of State.

I similarly ask that amendment No. 66 be rejected because 10 years is too long, for all the reasons that have been advanced. If we have to accept the idea of external voting, five years seems a sensible compromise.

Mr. Hayward: I was interested in the contributions of the right hon. Members for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) and for South Down (Mr. Powell) who, in essence, said that we should not make the change because this is the constitution as it stands. They were implying that the constitution is unchangeable. We should recognise, after reviewing these matters over the years, that change is necessary. Over many centuries we have made many valuable changes to the constitution, such as the enfranchisement of females. If we pursue the argument that we should not change the constitution, we would never have given women the vote. I am aware that there are those who hold the view that it was not a good idea.

Circumstances change. As against 20 years ago, there are many people who do valuable work abroad on behalf of this country. The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent asked whether the figures were large or small. The figures are reasonable, and they are likely to grow. For that reason, we should make the change. As we enter into more and more agreements, whether they be industrial or commercial, or in terms of the United Nations or the EEC, more people will work abroad. For that reason, I support the clause which introduces the overseas franchise.

I share the view expressed by my hon. Friends the Members for Corby (Mr. Powell) and for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) that, as the periods of such international agreements become longer, it is important that people should be allowed to remain enfranchised in this country for longer. Many people already work in industry in Europe and have been abroad for more than seven years. It is likely that they will be there for seven, 10 or 15 years. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) is not present, but what would happen if Ferranti in his constituency took money from the ESPRIT programme in the EEC, in association with Padua or Rome universities, and many of Ferranti's employees worked there for several years? They would be disfranchised. That is unacceptable. Having accepted the principle that we should enfranchise people who are resident overseas, we should accept it in full and not put a time limit on it.

Mr. Maclennan: I support the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell). Before I give my reasons for doing so, I wish to defend the Home Secretary against the accusation that he proceeded improperly in arriving at his conclusion as to how the Bill should be constructed on this point.

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) was, as usual, locked with the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) in historical conservatism. He put forward the argument that because the Home Secretary had not followed the recommendations of the Speaker's Conference there was something improper about proceeding with this method of extending the franchise.

I must remind the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent of how the Labour party, when in government, treated electoral conferences. He will recall that, because he was there. I was not a Minister at the time, but I was a member of the electoral conference. He will recall that an electoral conference in the 1960s proposed that the voting age should be reduced from 21 to 20. The Labour Government at that time properly took the view that that was inappropriate, and they rejected the recommendation of the Speaker's Conference. There was nothing sacrosanct about it.

Lest the right hon. Gentleman should peddle the illusion that Speakers' Conferences are in some way more pure and less sullied by political consideration than Cabinet discussions or the proceedings of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, let me tell him of my experience at the hands of one of his colleagues when, at a second Speaker's Conference on electoral law, the issue of votes for holidaymakers was considered. I voted in favour of extending the franchise to holidaymakers. I was summoned by a right hon. colleague of the right hon. Gentleman to explain why I voted against——

Mr. Foot: Bill Rodgers.

Mr. Maclennan: If I am forced to divulge the identity, I shall tell the House that it was the then deputy leader of the Labour party who, on the instructions of a Cabinet Committee, summoned me to explain why I had voted against Labour party policy handed down by Transport house.

It is nonsense for the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent now to don a white sheet and speak as though this were some great matter of principle. He is an honourable man who has been in the House long enough to beguile us with historical recollections, but his stance today is clearly humbug. What is the great principle whereby he opposes the extension of the franchise? He says that we need to know how many people will be involved. If he had been more frank, he might have said that it depended upon how many more Conservative voters the Government would reap. The number can scarcely be regarded as a matter of principle, and is in any event incalculable.

7.30 pm

The hon. Member for South Down stood firm on conservative historical grounds—the constitution as it is and always should be. That cannot satisfy those of us who see British constitutional history as a process of development and change to reflect social and political changes. One of the most important political changes in the lifetime of most of the participants in this debate has been the extent to which British citizens now travel, live and work abroad, not just to serve their own narrow interests, but to serve their country's interests. They stay abroad for long periods, but they return from time to time and they are very familiar with what is going on here. As the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) pointed out, communications have also greatly improved in our lifetime. Residents abroad almost certainly have as sharp an awareness of the issues involved in a general election as many people resident in this country.

In my judgment, residence is not as sound a principle on which to stand as the principle of justice. It has long been recognised in the United States and in France that a citizen's most important right is to seek to influence the complexion of the democratic Government of the country to which he belongs. I freely confess that my original thinking and that of my party on this was not dissimilar to that of the Home Secretary on Second Reading. We felt that there might be some diminution over time in the citizen's links with his home country and a consequent decline in interest in the outcome of elections. I thought that on balance that argument suggested the need for some time limit on the exercise of the right to vote, but that has been overborne in my mind by the wider view so eloquently expressed by the hon. Members for Corby and for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) that citizenship should carry the right to vote.

I hope that if the Committee divides on this issue, all Members will be permitted to vote freely, without the imposition of the usual party sanctions, and to exercise their individual judgment. I intend to vote for the amendment of the hon. Member for Corby. If that fails, I shall vote for the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) as second best. Indeed, my hon. Friend himself made it plain that he preferred the wider proposition of the hon. Member for Corby.

We are unlikely to have the opportunity to change this law for a long time. The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Grantham, which would allow alterations through secondary legislation subject to affirmative resolution, is thus deserving of favour if the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Corby is not carried. Nevertheless, it is preferable to arrive at a conclusion today by means of the primary legislation before us. If the Home Secretary's mind has also been changed since he last spoke on this matter, I hope that it has moved in the same direction as my own.

Mr. Bruinvels: On Second Reading I said that the Bill would give many more people the right to vote. In the past, British subjects resident overseas have been unfairly denied the franchise. The number involved is about 600,000, of whom 100,000 work in the European Community. I see no reason why those people should not have the right to vote.

I was not surprised that the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) opposed the change as I recall the boundary commission report which failed to appear until after the 1970 election. On the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman supported the abolition of the House of Lords, which I should have thought would be a fairly major constitutional change. His attitude seems to depend very much on the story and flavour of the day.

The majority of people living overseas still pay taxes and they pay rates on homes in this country. As house owners, they are responsible people. I cannot see how the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) can imply that they act irresponsibly. In my view, they are not tax exiles, and it is time that they had the right to vote. This is democracy at work and the whole Committee should support it. After all, the right to vote is one of the most important rights and privileges of a citizen. Ambassadors and senior diplomats based abroad have the right to vote, as do service men stationed abroad, and the system seems to work well. So what is everyone worried about now?

The people involved, of course, must keep their names on the register. That has always concerned me, because, if they do not do that, they lose their connection with a particular constituency. If, however, they maintain their names on the register—and as house owners they should do so—they ought to be entitled to vote. Are they likely to return to Great Britain or Northern Ireland? That is the test. If the answer is yes, I cannot see why they should not be given the vote. There is no uncertainty in such a case; they have made their position clear.

On 10 December, I said that people living abroad should be allowed to vote, but that seven years was a rather long period and I hoped that the period would be shorter. I refer hon. Members to column 815 of the Official Report. Clearly, I must be in favour of a five-year term. However, I also said that the list should be continually checked. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), who is not in the Chamber at the moment, maintained that a number of gentlemen living overseas have failed to have their names removed from the register. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary would agree with me that it is against the law for a person to keep his name on the register after he has left his house permanently. I believe that the law would be brought heavily to bear upon those who offend against electoral practices.

As I have made plain, I favour amendment No. 14. I believe that five years is the right length of time. I have some sympathy with the right hon. Member for Gorton, because five years is about the length of time between one general election and another. Paragraph 2.7 of "The Government reply to the First Report from the Home Affairs Committee" suggests that, as time drags on, the link with the United Kingdom becomes more tenuous. Therefore, any absence of more than five years might well justify one in supporting the right hon. Gentleman's amendment. In any case, is anyone likely to keep a house for longer than five years? I doubt it.

Throughout the five-year period, the resident abroad is likely to be represented by the same Member of Parliament. He is likely to come to this country for holidays, and it is likely that his salary will be paid here. He will have a real connection with the United Kingdom. Those who work overseas but keep up their connections with the United Kingdom would strongly resent some of the allegations that have been made about them today. They are not rogues. They are promoting this country, improving business and increasing our exports. Of course, they must nominate their most recent address, and that will be made clear.

What is wrong with a voice from abroad being heard in Britain? If someone has a contribution to make, let him make it.

Mr. Barron: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruinvels: I will give way for one moment only.

Mr. Barron: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman, because he seems to be very knowledgeable about the situation. Can he tell us how many more people are likely to appear on the electoral register as a result of this measure?

Mr. Bruinvels: I said at the beginning of my speech that 600,000 people would be likely to benefit — 100,000 of them in the EEC. The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) seems to have been blinded by my scientific knowledge. I believe that up to 600,000 people will be involved. However, I shall enter one caveat, as the hon. Gentleman will hear later.

I cannot support the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell). That amendment would lead to an infinity. There must be an acid test. The Committee would be shirking its duties and responsibilities if it were to vote for the amendment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) is now really my honourable friend, as he is no longer a Whip. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] He is keen that the voting right should last for no more than seven years. However, he has also put his name to amendment No. 66, which stipulates 10 years. I believe that both are wrong. The figure should be five. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham that the measures should be passed by both Houses of Parliament, but I believe that it should be done now rather than later.

The Bill is good news. I hope that British citizens resident overseas will now exercise their right. I am sure that they will.

7.45 pm

Mr. Stanbrook: If there were any logic or any consistency of approach in the Government's proposals, or even any simplicity — so that they were at least consistent with the range of our law on the subject— they would have some merit. However, they lack logic and consistency. So, with respect, do all the amendments.

Our electoral roll consists of British subjects, Commonwealth citizens and citizens of the Irish Republic living in this country. The essential qualification is residence in this country. It does not matter that not all the voters are British citizens. It does not matter that many of them have their origins abroad.

What happens when the Government propose to enlarge the franchise? They do not extend to those living overseas the franchise that I have described. They extend a right to vote to people who have British citizenship. That is a special category of nationality not shared by everyone registered here or everyone on the existing electoral roll. If we are to be consistent, these proposals should apply to those who are entitled by reason of residence here to a vote, even though their origins may lie in the Republic of India or in Argentina.

Equally, we could have said that the franchise should be restricted to British citizens, so excluding those who do not owe allegiance to Her Majesty. That solution would be consistent and logical. I believe that it would be right.

My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) believes that votes are such a good thing that they should be given to as many people as possible, and that no one should be deprived of a vote—although clause 1 extends the right to vote. He believes that we should extend the right on principle.

My second objection to the proposals is that the basis of the House is representation. We represent the people of our constituencies. We represent their interests, their desires, their thoughts and wishes, the way in which they want the country to be governed and even the day-to-day affairs that concern them. Such representation will not be possible when anyone on the electoral register of a constituency may be living in the south seas, and may have been living there for 10, 20, 30 40 or 50 years and may never have returned to the United Kingdom.

I accept that one should not demand a price for the right to vote. However, the logic of the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) is that people who have not contributed to the welfare of our country for years could be entitled to vote for representatives in Parliament. That is made possible by the way in which the amendment has been drawn.

I believe that the proposals are wholly wrong in principle. The Home Secretary should reconsider the whole matter and introduce a proper Bill based on British citizenship as the qualification for the right to vote. I would support such a Bill.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): Before I deal directly with this group of amendments, perhaps the Committee will allow me to say something about our general approach to these matters. It was said at the beginning of the White Paper, to which the Bill broadly gives effect, that our stance has always been that "major legislation of this kind must be put forward only on the basis of the fullest possible consultation between the political parties represented in the House of Commons".

Before presenting the White Paper we sought the views of all parties in the House informally on the Select Committee's major recommendations. The detail of the Bill has been worked out after the most scrupulous consultations with party officials and local authority associations. That does not mean that any one party can, or should, have a veto. There are central issues on which, as we said in the White Paper, our firm view is that legislation is essential. They are the extension of the franchise to people who live overseas, the extension of absent voting, especially for holiday makers, and the increase in the deposit. Those are the fundamental principles that are embodied in the Bill. Once they are accepted, there are many other important issues relating to how far and how fast to go in the implementation of those principles. Those issues are a matter of judgment rather than of principle. It is essential that we proceed with the greatest possible common agreement, or at least acquiescence, between the parties.

The matter was made clear on Second Reading when I said that we regarded our proposals on the franchise, for example, as a "sensible compromise" between those who oppose any extension in principle and those with whom the Government sympathise, who believe that the vote should be given to all British citizens throughout the world, no matter how long they have been away. On the question of the deposit, I said that we accepted that there is no figure that is clearly and absolutely right and can be defended against all other figures. I also said that we should listen with care to what was said.

I hope the Committee acknowledges that I made it clear that it gave the Government no pleasure to introduce absent voting provisions in Great Britain which would not apply to Northern Ireland. It is in that spirit that, since Second Reading, I have engaged in further discussions in an attempt to secure for the Bill as much support as possible, or at least acquiescence, in all parts of the House. I think that my efforts have met with some success. That has inevitably meant that other parties will have to go along with some provisions, often fundamental ones, which they have hitherto found deeply distasteful. For the Government, it has meant a readiness to go less far in the Bill than we should have liked. However, we shall stick firmly to the principles to which I have referred and, in so doing, make some fundamental changes in our electoral system. It is on that basis that, today and in subsequent debates, the Government will recommend that the Committee accepts some of the amendments tabled by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr, Kaufman).

As to the amendments before the Committee, I propose to advise the Committee to accept the amendment that limits the qualification period for overseas electors to five years after departure, and further amendments to clauses 1 to 3.

We have been presented with quite a menu of choices. Some say that we should not change something fundamental in our constitution and that the basis of residence, which has existed until now, should not be altered. The right hon. Members for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) and for South Down (Mr. Powell) have united on this matter, as they have on similar ones in the past. In an historical sense they are right. Residence has indeed been the basis for the franchise, but my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) gave the complete answer to that argument. He said that our constitution has evolved constantly and that it is right to recognise profound social changes that have taken place. It is true that many people now go to live and work abroad for shorter or longer periods of time. Unlike in the past, they do not lose touch with Britain. They have family and friends here, they might have property and children at school here and they are often liable to the payment of rates and taxes. Hitherto, as long as they were abroad they lost the most essential tie, the right to vote. One of the purposes of the Bill is to put that right. It is high time that we did so, and it is essential to get the principle of doing so firmly on the statute book.

Right hon. and hon. Members who oppose the change are right to argue that, if we are making such a fundamental change, it is reasonable to proceed at a pace which, if not acceptable to those who do not want such change, is at least tolerable to them. After all, they represent a substantial section of the population. It is for that reason, among others, that I do not agree with the recommendations advanced by my hon. Friends the Members for Corby (Mr. Powell) and for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone), supported by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), to whom I am otherwise grateful for his defence of the method by which I have put these issues before the House.

I do not agree with my hon. Friends the Members for Corby and for Lewes and the hon. Members for Caithness and Sutherland and for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), who wished to go less far, but further than is provided for in the Bill or amendment No. 30, because I believe that, as the principle is new, it is right to proceed with caution and general acquiescence and because I accept the argument that there must come a point, although it will vary from person to person, at which a person's links are likely to have been attenuated substantially to the extent that it is unreasonable for that person to expect to enjoy the franchise. It is not right that the extension of the franchise should be indefinite.

Any time limit is arbitrary and the length of time that it takes for links with the United Kingdom to be attenuated will vary according to individual circumstances. There is no right and magic period of time. I therefore listened to the enticing suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) that I should take the power to bring before the House an order to vary the date that is agreed by the Committee. I do not shirk from the responsibility although it would not be mine alone—the House would have to approve any proposition that I put before it. However, I do not ask the Committee to go along with my hon. Friend's suggestion, as we are familar with the limited parliamentary procedures that the passage of such an order involves. Serious principles are involved and I should be unhappy if I or a successor had to make further changes by so cursory a parliamentary procedure.

It is important that the principle be enshrined in the statute book. Although I do not believe in an indefinite period at the moment, I believe that, as time goes on, many of the objections that have been voiced against moving at all will be seen to be invalid. It is likely that a case for a further extension will be made out. Even those who are not convinced that we should move at all will be persuaded, when they see how the Bill works out in practice, that, far from not moving, we should move a great deal further. It is right to proceed on the basis of the maximum consensus or acquiescence obtainable. I therefore commend the five-year limit to the House.

The Select Committee chaired by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) played an important and crucial part in laying the foundations of the legislation. Although the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent has never been a friend of Select Committees, the House will regard his aspersions on them and the slighting way in which he spoke about them as unworthy of the House and the right hon. Gentleman.

I owe my hon. and learned Friend an answer to his specific question about the numbers involved. An estimate of 600,000 people who would be entitled to vote under a seven-year provision appears in the White Paper. It might be thought that through simple arithmetic five-sevenths of 600,000 would produce the right figure for a five-year qualification. I am advised that the figure would probably be more than that because of the pattern of people going abroad and the period that they stay abroad. It is impossible to be absolutely precise, but the figure would be somewhat more than five-sevenths of 600,000.

I hope the Committee will accept that the spirit in which the Government are approaching the entire legislation is not confrontational. We are building on the Select Committee's report and listening to, but not always accepting, what is said by the other parties. Where we cannot accept what is said because of the basic principles that we wish to see enshrined in the legislation, we seek at least to accept in part and to render tolerable what may not always be acceptable.

In that spirit, I ask the Committee to support the five-year proposition put forward by the right hon. Member for Gorton and not any other amendments that may be put to the vote.

Mr. William Powell: During the past two and a half hours we have had a spirited debate. I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary for the way in which he has shown the Government's approval of a principle which I sought to argue, even if he sought to put limits on it.

Those of us who have argued for the amendments have been accused of wishing to tear up part of our constitution. Not for the first time, the House was treated to an eloquent defence of the constitution by the right hon. Members for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) and for South Down (Mr. Powell). The right hon. Member for South Down identified the clash of principle in the amendments. He said that we were a representational democracy, the basis for which was residence plus registration and identified the principle behind the amendments as one of citizenship plus registration. The right hon. Members' eloquent defence of the constitution was the most reactionary that the House has listened to since the days of the Rockingham Whigs.

We live in an evolutionary democracy and the great radical, the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent, has been most active in seeking to secure a rapid evolution for our constitution. He is a student of both history and literature, and managed to make both Colonel Sibthorpe and the late Squire Thorne seem positively progressive.

I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for his support for the principle, but I shall ask the House to divide on the principle as I have laid it down. I accept many of the criticisms made by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook). In reality there is little difference in principle between us. However, those who stressed the representational basis of our democracy as being residence plus registration should remember that exactly the same representational principles are fundamental to the French and United States constitutions. Members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate in the United States and members of the National Assembly in France all represent individual constituencies elected on a single basis. In tabling these amendments we are not seeking to challenge that.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Mr. Corbett: I beg to move amendment No. 24, in page 2, line 22, leave out subsection (4).

The Chairman: It will be convenient for the Committee to discuss at the same time the following amendments:

No. 25, in page 2, line 23, leave out paragraph (a).

No. 67, in page 2, line 24, leave out 'seven' and insert 'ten'.

No. 31, in clause 3, page 5, line 16, leave out subsection (5).

Mr. Corbett: The purpose of amendments Nos. 24 and 31 is to remove the right of people who leave the United Kingdom as children from eventually qualifying for votes in elections to this Parliament.

It is a nonsense for people who, for example, are taken by their parents to Australia, New Zealand, the United States, the Gulf States, to any part of Europe or wherever else in the world and who grow up in those countries and absorb their traditions and cultures to claim that they have a legitimate interest in voting to elect a Member of Parliament for a constituency in Britain which they can scarcely remember.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) earlier pointed out that elections under our system are for Members of individual constituencies. The overall votes are not put into a heap, counted and then Members allocated against the total number of votes cast for a party. That is an important distinction which most, if not all, hon. Members hold precious.

There is a great difference between what is being proposed in the Bill and, for example, postal votes for holidaymakers. I wish to make it clear at the outset that we welcome the concept of postal votes for holidaymakers, remembering that they leave constituencies for a time and return to them because they live in them and are part of those communities.

I was born in Australia. I left that country long before I was able to qualify to be on an electoral register there. However, under matching proposals in the Australian legislature, because I was born in that country, I might be told that I could vote for the equivalent of an MP for Fremantle in the sunshine state of Western Australia. Unhappily, I must confess to having no memory of Fremantle. I feel that it would be impertinent of me either to have the right to vote or to wish to cast a vote for a constituency in that fair city.

It cannot be right that people who have been taken, most likely by their parents, perhaps half a world away should, at a later stage, have a proper claim to a vote on the basis of having a genuine constituency interest.

We shall later discuss amendments requiring those claiming votes, although they live overseas, to declare an intention to return to the United Kingdom. That is a straightforward request for those, for example, whose jobs take them abroad, whether or not they are on fixed contracts. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton explained, it is easy to demonstrate their position on the basis of residential qualification here.

That is not the case for those—we do not know the numbers—who, for whatever reason, decide to live permanently abroad. That does not apply only to those who retire abroad. There are others who prefer to live in sunnier climes or who have other reasons for living elsewhere. I do not criticise them in any way.

As the Opposition pointed out when we debated the last amendment, it is stretching credulity enormously—not to question the feelings of such people towards the place of their birth; I readily confess to having such feelings about Australia—to accept that, having lived out of the country for many years, the links are strong enough for them to have the right to vote for Members of this House in named constituencies.

As distinct from requiring people to demonstrate an intention to return—I hope that, when we debate that later, that requirement will commend itself to the Committee—giving the right to vote to younger people who may have been away from the United Kingdom for a long time and who may have no intention to return would, I submit, be out of step with what the Bill proposes in asking people to give a serious declaration of intent to return.

The view of my hon. Friends and me is that only those UK citizens who reside here but who are abroad temporarily and who fully intend to return should be entitled to vote in our parliamentary elections. I invite the Government to share that view.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) is showing formidable virtuosity this evening. He stood before us announcing the largest victory in a Division that the Labour party has had to announce in many a long year. Before we got over the shock of that, he was at the Dispatch Box moving an amendment in words that made such compulsive listening that an unseen hand dragged me to my feet straightaway to accept it. I do not know what the hon. Gentleman proposes to do next. [Interruption.] Perhaps he should leave while he is ahead in the game.

Mr. Kaufman: What about an Oxford degree?

Mr. Mellor: Whether his name should be submitted for an honorary degree at Oxford university I leave to his Front Bench colleagues to consider. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) goaded me into making that observation, and I shall, if necessary, plead that in my defence.

The Committee has approved arrangements by which adults who leave this country are entitled to vote in United Kingdom elections for a period of five years after they have last appeared on a register for a United Kingdom constituency, and they will vote in that constituency.

A genuine problem has always arisen about what to do with those children who leave the country with their parents but who within the five-year period attain voting age. It seemed logical to the Government that they, too, should qualify for the vote, just as they would if they had been living in Great Britain. However, severe practical difficulties arose about determining in which constituency they should vote. Should they qualify through their parents and be entitled to vote in the constituency in which their parents were registered, or should they qualify in relation to the constituency in which they had previously resided, which might be different from the constituency in which their parents had lived? Both of those alternatives contained practical drawbacks.

Having regard to the importance which the Opposition attach to this amendment and to the very reasonable basis that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary gave in the previous debate for reaching an accommodation over matters of constitutional signifiance like the Representation of the People Bill, the best thing that I can do on behalf of the Government is to recommend to my hon. Friends that they should accept the amendment.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): As was seen by the size of the majority in the last Division, the old alliance, which has probably operated covertly for a long time, has been brought out into the open. This amendment is welcomed by my right hon. and hon. Friends.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) put forward the valid reason that a person who went away from the United Kingdom as a young child would remember very little about the constituency in which he would be entitled to vote. The Minister referred to the practical difficulties. For example, if somebody went to the British consulate in, say, Chicago and claimed that his parents had been resident in a particular constituency it would be impossible to find out whether that was true. Although it would never cross the mind of any hon. Member, it might cross the mind of some of those who wished to disrupt our electoral proceedings that people could be sent en bloc to register as voters in a constituency that they thought they had some chance of winning. There would be no practical way of curbing such an abuse.

For that reason, and other reasons that have been given, the amendment deserves our support.

Amendment agreed to.

8.45 pm

Mr. Barron: I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 2, line 33, at end add—

'(5) The provisions of this section shall not come into operation until such time as the Secretary of State has laid before Parliament an estimate, country by country, of the numbers eligible to apply for qualification as an overseas elector under this section.'.

No hon. Member has stated how many people will be eligible to vote when the franchise is widened by the acceptance of clause 1. I am amazed that during the Committee stage of a Bill that will introduce a major constitutional change in the electoral system of this country nobody has stated how it will work, how much it will cost and how many people will benefit from it. I should have thought that any reasonable, sensible Government would have regarded that as a priority when introducing a Bill of this kind.

[Mr. Barron]

There are differences of view about how many people will benefit from the extension of the franchise. On Second Reading the Home Secretary said that he believed about half a million people would benefit from the extension of the franchise. Earlier today we heard that 600,000 people would benefit from its extension. There are 250,000 members of the armed services serving abroad who are qualified to vote. That figure was given by the Home Office to the Select Committee on Home Affairs. The evidence was that 245,379 people were on the 1982 register. In its written evidence to the Select Committee on Home Affairs, the Home Office stated that 150,000 people living in Europe and 250,000 living elsewhere might be entitled to vote. That works out at an average of about 600 per constituency. The Home Office figures mean that about 400,000 people would benefit from the widening of the franchise. The more we look at the guesstimates relating to the widening of the franchise, the more intriguing the position becomes.

Further evidence was submitted to the Select Committee on Home Affairs by the Social Democratic party. In page 147 of its written evidence it said that probably several million people would benefit from the widening of the franchise. However, when the Social Democratic party gave verbal evidence to the same Committee, its representative, Mr. Briggs, referred in page 162 to about 600,000 people. Therefore, the several million had dropped to 600,000 by the time the SDP appeared before the Select Committee on Home Affairs. But even the addition of 600,000 people represents about 1·5 per cent. on a countrywide basis. In those circumstances, a marginal seat could be put at risk. Hon. Members know that during a hard fought campaign at a general election, even 1 per cent. can influence the outcome. In those circumstances, that figure could have an effect upon the outcome of the election.

Amendment No. 27 asks only for estimates to be made on a country by country basis before the Bill is passed. It is also relevant that the effect upon constituencies of such a widening of the franchise should be ascertained. Certain constituencies may have substantial numbers of voters of this kind. I refer to the recent report of the Boundary Commission that was implemented in 1983. We tried to create average constituencies containing electorates of 60,000 to 66,000. If there are to be 600,000 votes from abroad, or even more if certain people are to be believed, the figures must be ascertained. That should have been done in conjunction with the report of the Boundary Commission.

I am not against the extension of the franchise in certain cases, but I am certainly against its extension by means of the Bill. It does not do justice to the British constitution. It is hurried and it is misconceived because it does not give to hon. Members all the facts that they need before they proceed further with the Bill.

Mr. Mellor: I am not sure that the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) is right to suggest that the proposal is vitiated by the fact that no one can with complete precision say how many people will benefit from it. After all, that is true of many of the changes in the franchise that have been proposed. It is certainly true of one that is not a matter of great controversy—holiday postal votes. Nobody knows quite how many people will be away on holiday. It will depend on the time of year. No one will know the extent to which the franchise is widened by that.

Mr. Kaufman rose——

Mr. Mellor: I appreciate that the right hon. Gentleman will say that they are already on the register. That is fair enough. But we know that a substantial number of British people live and work overseas, some of whom—those who have been overseas for up to five years—will qualify for the vote. Except in certain countries where there is a particularly good reason for British citizens to make themselves known to the British embassy for reasons of public safety and other considerations, it is not a requirement that people should disclose to the British authorities, either within the country or anywhere else, where they are living. So there is no accurate way in which one can say how many British people are living in any particular country, whether a European country or further afield.

However, we can give some estimates, and some have been given. The fact that those estimates are really guesstimates is not a fair criticism. It is just one of those facts which we must acknowledge is inevitable when, in a free society, we do not monitor where our citizens go, how long they stay there or where they live when they are there.

There would be an abuse if people could emerge and claim that they were entitled to vote when that claim was not sustainable. We shall put requirements into the regulations that will ensure that a proper declaration has to be made before a consular official who will satisfy himself that the person who makes the claim is properly entitled to do so. Having submitted the form via the consular official, it will then go to the electoral registration officer, who, before admitting somebody on to the register, has to be satisfied.

Not only do we not know how many people will be potentially enfranchised as a result of this, but we certainly do not know how many people will take up the offer. After all, unlike a vote for somebody who is resident in the United Kingdom, it will cost money. A sum of money will have to be paid in order to apply to be registered as an overseas voter. The only indicator that we have is the service vote where only 55 per cent. of the service men and their wives who are entitled to a service vote actually apply for it.

For anyone to stand at the Dispatch Box or anywhere else in the Chamber and claim to be able to give an accurate figure of how many people will be enfranchised is an impossibility. I do not apologise for the fact that no Government could accept the amendment, consistent with wanting to do what we believe and hope that everyone, however reluctantly, accepts is a not unreasonable aspiration for any Government, in an era where an increasing number of our citizens, for perfectly valid reasons, will live and work abroad for some period in their lives. Therefore, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be too discomforted by the fact that I have not been able to give as good a reception to his amendment as that moved by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett). I hope that he will not feel that he has to press the amendment to the vote.

Mr. Wallace: We cannot support the amendment. It would have been helpful if one could have had some idea of the numbers concerned, but, even if we had had a global total, as far as I am aware there is no information available to any of our agenices abroad which could have told us how that would have affected the 650 constituencies that are represented in the House of Commons. The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) was concerned with the effect that it could have in the constituencies. Even if we had a total figure, that would not give us any greater idea about the effect in individual constituencies.

It is clear, as the hon. Gentleman said, that we have agreed to the extension of the franchise in principle in giving the limited right to vote to people who have been overseas for five years or less. If the Committee agrees to that in principle, it is not a matter of fundamental concern to us how many it will affect. If we believe that people should have the franchise, they should have it, be they 600, 6,000 or 600,000. There is nothing in the amendment which would help us.

The Bill can become an Act without us knowing the figure. Only this particular clause would be inoperative until we had that figure, and even then the figure would be only a matter of interest. The Secretary of State would not have to wait for a positive resolution of the House of Commons to operate the clause once we have the figures. It might be of more than academic interest, but, none the less, it would be a waste of time. I do not believe that the amendment merits the support of the Committee.

Mr. Barron: I accept that in some ways the amendment is badly worded, but I hope that the Committee realises that if the constitution is changed we should make sure that the effect of such a change does not create an imbalance in the electoral patterns of British constituencies.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): As improved by Opposition amendments, the Bill will now allow British residents abroad to vote in British elections five years after they have left Britain provided that they make a declaration that they intend to return to the United Kingdom to take up permanent residence. The five-year limit, and the declaration, which will be moved as an amendment to clause 2, are clearly improvements in the Bill. But they still do not make it a desirable extension of the franchise. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said, we are still opposed in principle to the extension of the franchise to British citizens living abroad.

Our reasons for that opposition are not just that the Bill would give the vote to those who have emigrated, which it would and which is wrong, or that it extends the franchise to those British citizens who have left the country for tax reasons, which it would, and which is equally wrong. Nor, indeed, are we opposing it merely because it will give the vote to those who are fugitives from justice. It will, of course, and their numbers are not necessarily insubstantial. Clearly, it is and should be offensive to all hon. Members that such people should have the vote. It is indefensible that they should have the power to influence the outcome of elections in Britain when they have no commitment to Britain and no responsibility for the consequences or effects of their decisions.

Nor are we opposed in principle to the extension of the franchise merely because there are anomalies. There are anomalies. Clearly it is wrong that a British citizen should have committed an offence by failing to fill in the application to register whereas a resident living abroad has an option whether to register for the vote. We believe that that is wrong, and we oppose the extension of the franchise in that area, because we do not believe that those citizens living abroad who are making no financial contribution towards the maintenance of Britain should have any part to play in determining what Government shall be elected. Nor are we opposed merely because there are no sanctions for any false declarations made by British citizens living abroad. Those are all valid and important reasons why one should critically question, if not oppose, any such proposal substantially to enlarge the numbers of those eligible to vote in British elections. However, the main reason we oppose the amendment is that it offends against the basic principles of our democracy.

Our constitution is based upon the notion of representative government in which single-Member individual constituencies elect single Members of Parliament and votes are cast by citizens, electors who live in the constituencies, and have a residential qualification in the constituencies. It is based upon the assumption that an elector carefully evaluates the candidate, his record and his views and has the opportunity, although he may not exercise it, to see, to meet, to question and to hear the candidate at public meetings. It is based upon the assumption that an elector, in exercising his right to vote and determining his choice of the competing candidates, will have regard to the issues in a locality in a local campaign and, indeed, in a national campaign.

None of that can happen if the elector resides abroad. He cannot have a proper or continuing relationship with his Member of Parliament. Although some hon. Members earlier in the debate suggested that such people can find out what is happening in this country by reference to British newspapers which are circulating abroad or by occasionally tuning in to the BBC world service, those are in no sense adequate substitutes for a long, continuing and thorough understanding and knowledge of British politics at a national level. They cannot provide an effective means for British citizens living abroad, sometimes in the most remote parts of the world, to have ready access to what is happening in the locality, in the community and in the constituency in which they are nominally registered or to knowledge of the Member of Parliament whom they are supposed to be able to hold to account and for whom they will be able to cast a vote for or against at any subsequent election. That kind of relationship or intimacy is not possible, yet it is crucial to our democracy and to our relationship with constituents and electors who are residing abroad and may have been so resident for a considerable time.

Mr. Beith: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that those matters are essential, why does he believe that postal votes or proxy votes should be allowed to be exercised by persons resident abroad who have a property qualification in this country?

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: I am establishing the principle, which I think most hon. Members have always acknowledged and accepted, but which in certain cases may not be able to be policed. We all acknowledge that the hon. Gentleman and his party make a great play of the number of multiple registrations that occur. We know that they occur. There may be a good case for doing away with them. We recognise that in practice it is difficult to stop that practice, still less to police it. In no way am I trying to suggest that the kind of individuals to whom the hon. Gentleman refers should possess that right. I am realistic enough to acknowledge that there is no means by which one can prevent it. All those British citizens—and we are talking now about 600,000—were they to purchase property in the country and, quite misleadingly, fill in their electoral registration forms to suggest that they are resident permanently at the relevant time presumably could get away with it. One would not want to approve or endorse that, but I see no way at present in which one could police it.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: The hon. Gentleman was speaking as if the ownership of property in the constituency entitles the owner to be registered. Surely that is not the case. A registration which was claimed on grounds of ownership of property surely ought to be rejected by the registration officer. If I may say so, I think that underlay the intervention of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith).

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: The right hon. Member is quite right. This is based not on the ownership of property but on the register of residents at a particular time. That principle, which we believe is important, underlines our democracy, and therefore ought to be protected.

If it be the case that those British citizens resident abroad cannot have a continuing understanding and knowledge of what is happening in a particular constituency over the period of a Parliament, even through the best efforts of the airmail editions of The Times or of the world service 24-hour broadcast, they cannot keep up with a campaign in a local election or a national election in which the issues arise on a daily basis and the campaign is fast-moving and changes daily.

British citizens living abroad do not see the daily effect of the Government's policies. They do not feel the consequences of unemployment and the destruction of our major cities. They do not suffer the results of cuts in education, social services and health provision. They have not witnessed the destruction of our environment and the quality of our life. They do not participate in the daily dialogue and debate with their fellow citizens, which is so crucial in moulding and sustaining political attitudes and decisions on the way in which individuals will vote.

That sort of knowledge and intimacy is impossible to acquire while living abroad. It is clear that it could not be sustained if, as the hon. Members for Corby (Mr. Powell) and for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) suggest, British citizens resident abroad were able to vote in perpetuity in British elections. They advanced an extraordinary, indefensible and absurd suggestion in taking the opposite view and the Committee had the good sense to discard it.

The arguments of principle against extending the franchise to British citizens resident abroad are powerful and compelling. The Government have not addressed themselves to the issue of principle. Instead, they have had a clear regard, as always, to their own narrow self-interest. Conservative Governments do nothing else. They have a clear, conspicuous and deliberate regard for their own self-interest. Apart from the arguments of principle, that in itself is a good and sufficient reason for my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the clause this evening.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): It is regrettable that we are being asked to support the amendment. I did not find it possible to support that which it seeks when the Committee divided earlier. The hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) has talked about British citizens resident abroad not being able to keep fully up to date with United Kingdom affairs. No one would expect the BBC to have the ability to enable them to do so. The occupants of the Opposition Front Bench have treated the BBC as a tuppenny affair of no account whatsoever, which provides a service that is not listened to abroad.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk rose——

Sir John Farr: No, I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. I have listened to him for quite a bit today and I shall not give way now. I shall be prepared to let him intervene in a moment.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: I have spoken only once in this debate.

Sir John Farr: And that was for too long.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene. I wanted to correct what he has said. I am not critical of the BBC's world service. It is a service that I hold in high esteem. I listen to it a great deal and no doubt I shall listen to it when I leave this place tonight. I was taking up the comments of other hon. Members, who seem to think that the service provided by the BBC by means of its world service is sufficient to allow British citizens living abroad to know exactly what is happening in the constituencies in which they have a vote. It is clear that it is not. It is not intended to provide that information and it cannot be a substitute for living in a British constituency.

Sir John Farr: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that clear. No one could suggest that an individual could base his opinions on British domestic politics, or on those of any other country, on the strength of a radio programme being broadcast from that country. However, the BBC's world service is an opinion-maker abroad. Its current affairs programmes are highly regarded and it is listened to avidly in every English-speaking country of the world, and in most non-English-speaking countries. I have taken the trouble, with a battery pocket radio, to listen to the BBC on the short wave in most countries of the world and the programmes have come over very well and clearly.

Ex-British residents who are still British citizens but who have probably lost the vote in the United Kingdom still have their national daily newspaper sent out from time to time from London or wherever. They have their own local newspapers in Africa and Asia. Most of the countries within those continents are basically English speaking. The media are delivered in English.

The most important item of English news of which people in other countries are far more abreast than we in London is the state of the English football league. The second most important item is the state of English domestic politics—which party is favoured for election, which party is doing well and which is doing badly. I do not accept that people who go to live abroad—perhaps earning valuable foreign currency for Britain—are out of touch with all that matters in Britain after as short a period as seven years.

The position is even worse now because of the last series of Divisions. The seven-year period was bad enough, but it has been reduced to five years. That is a ridiculously short period. I agreed with what my hon. Friends the Members for Corby (Mr. Powell) and for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) said about the privilege that should be automatically associated with a British passport holder — having the vote as long as he or she wishes to exercise it. My hon. Friends mentioned the fact that many of the people who went abroad earned valuable money for Britain and our balance of payments. My hon. Friends did not have time to mention one point, but I believe it is right for the Committee to bear this fact in mind. Many of those people who are living in African and Asian countries are agents for British invisible earnings. They are engaged largely in transmitting insurance to Lloyds and the London insurance market and in helping with the consignment and shipping of goods around the world and may not come to Britain for a number of years.

I know people who are intensely proud of being British and who, in a calendar year, can earn a great deal directly for our balance of payments but have not been on an electoral register for 10 or 15 years. I do not believe that it is right for the Committee to say, "We shall reduce that period from seven years to five years so that anyone who has forgotten the events of the recent past in Britain will be disenfranchised." I believe, nevertheless, that five years is better than the previous position when people overseas did not receive the vote.

I admire the memory of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. He may recall that, when corresponding with me in recent months about the proposed change in the legislation, he told me that seven years was the period during which a person would be entitled to vote in British elections after leaving the United Kingdom. In good faith I told my constituents who had gone abroad that the Government undertook to stipulate a seven-year period. I shall now have to explain—I do not know how to do so, because I did not vote with the Government last time—how a sudden shift of opinion after many years of deliberations can be justified in changing the period from seven years to five years.

In addition to having a good memory, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is a sensible and balanced Minister. I hope that he will say that this measure will be undertaken for a trial five-year period and that, after that trial, the Government will introduce another Bill to abolish the provision altogether.

Mr. Beith: I do not propose to add a great deal to what I said about the amendments, which also went to the heart of the issue of overseas voting. It is obvious that overseas voting has been a part of our electoral pattern for a long time for service voters and for others who work overseas but maintain their electoral qualifications in this country. They can do so, as was mentioned earlier, not merely by virtue of the ownership of property, to which I referred, but by the occupation of property or the claiming of residence. That is what it is all about. They can make that claim in respect of a parental home long after they have, for all normal purposes, ceased to reside there.

We have referred, and will refer again, to the wide way in which a residence is defined and interpreted in British electoral law. I make the point to underline the fact that many people who are already abroad exercise voting powers in the precise circumstances which the hon. Member for Knowsley, North thought unsuitable.

9.15 pm

There are arguments of principle against any departure from the notion that one must be resident in the country to exercise a vote in it. Those arguments have been set aside previously for similar reasons, but they exist, and the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) pressed them. They do not outweigh the reasonable claim that citizens of this country, often serving its interests abroad, have to exercise an influence upon the Government who greatly affect their lives, as they affect the lives of those resident in the country.

The justice of such a claim is recognised by most of the other democracies with which we deal. It is wrong to apply to those people some greater test of their ability to put a cross in the ballot paper than is applied to citizens here. Were such a test to be applied, many of them would pass it with flying colours and would demonstrate a greater awareness of and following of affairs in this country than is shown by many of our countrymen when they vote. That is not the issue.

We are not seeking to apply an education test. It almost takes us back to the days when people could not vote in many southern states of America unless they passed an entremely partial test of knowledge of the American constitution, which was often applied more rigorously to those with a black skin than to those with a white one. We do not apply such a test. There is no reason why we should raise such a point in this context as an argument against extending the franchise.

I do not believe that the Labour Front Bench is primarily motivated by an argument of principle. It has drawn the conclusion that two characteristics are possessed by many of those who live abroad and might wish to vote in this country. One of the suggestions that comes sometimes from the Front Bench, and sometimes from muttered interventions, is that such people are, by and large, disloyal and that by their decision not to live in this country they have forfeited their claim to any vote here. I dismiss that claim, but it is repeated. Earlier in the debate — for those who questioned it — there were cries of "Strasbourg votes" and other such terms of derision from hon. Members around me. I believe that there are those in the Labour party who choose to see residence abroad as a fundamental disloyalty to this country. That is nonsense.

The second characteristic attributed to people living abroad is the likelihood that they will not vote in any large proportion for the Labour party. I have no idea whether that is so. The Labour party has no idea either. Were they even to follow the proportions of people within the United Kingdom, they will not vote in large numbers for the Labour party. They merely reflect trends in the United Kingdom.

I fear that the Labour party's apprehension of how such votes will be cast has primarily motivated it tonight. That is not the basis upon which we should be arguing the matter. There are reasonable grounds for accepting the claim of people living abroad, who are often serving the needs and interests of this country, to exercise voting rights here. I shall therefore support the inclusion of the clause in the Bill.

Mr. William Powell: This is one of the clauses which was capable of improvement in Committee. It has been altered, but in my judgment it has been worsened as a result of the Committee's decision. No improvement has been secured — exactly the reverse. Nevertheless, a principle has been established for the first time which I hope will be capable of enlargement in the future. It is that British citizens resident abroad should be enabled to vote at our elections.

The hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) did neither himself nor the Labour party any service by the manner in which he chose to advance the case of the official Opposition, and I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) correctly analysed the motives behind that. It is absurd to dwell at such length on tax exiles, fugitives and emigrés. The great majority of people who would qualify under this provision come into no such category. They are working abroad, usually for the good of this country and to its very substantial advantage. The emphasis placed on fugitives and the like in the weeks and months during which the Bill has been under public discussion is patently absurd. Virtually all fugitives would be disqualified in any event because of their previous criminal convictions. It is inconceivable that people who have emigrated should choose to register, let alone to vote in this country, and the same applies to tax exiles. It is utterly unjust to place so much emphasis on entirely negative factors.

The hon. Member for Knowsley, North relied on what he described as two fundamental princples of British democracy — representational government and the intimacy between elector and candidate, which he said was essential to the working of our democracy. Representational government is in no way affected either by the original Bill or by the amendment that has now been passed. In other equally democratic sytems the principle that we have now begun to accept is already part of the law. No one would seriously challenge the quality of representational government in the French National Assembly because French citizens are entitled to vote even if they are resident abroad. Equally, no United States citizen would dream of suggesting that the quality of representational democracy—each member representing an identifiable geographical constituency — is in any sense diminished because nationals resident abroad are entitled to vote in United States elections. It is equally wrong to suggest that the quality of our representational democracy will be diminished as a result of the small step that we have taken today. On the contrary, it will be improved and for that, at least, I welcome the acceptance of the principle, even though it has been severely qualified by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

As for the intimacy which the hon. Member for Knowsley, North regards as essential to our democracy, we would naturally like to have the most intimate possible democracy. The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) suggested that even in the most intensely contested constituency contact between candidate and electors scarcely rose to more than 1 per cent. during the course of an election campaign. I believe that it is rather more than that, but let no one deceive himself that it is possible for any candidate to become intimately involved with and known to every elector in the course of his campaign.

At the time of an election, any register will contain the names of thousands of electors who have moved to other constituencies, often a great distance away. Is it seriously suggested that it is fundamental to our democracy that such people should travel hundreds of miles to follow the kind of campaign that may have characterised ancient Greece but which has very little coincidence with current democratic practice in this country?

There are many imperfections in our system, and the existence of removed voters is one of the most severe. However, in laying so much emphasis on such matters, without appearing to realise how blemished and inaccurate his remarks were, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North was almost selling himself and his party short.

Not only today, but on other occasions, the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) has concentrated a great deal of gunfire on whether the Government have played fair over the method of consultation. The right hon. Gentleman and I seem to have one thing in common. In the past week, only one of our national newspapers has not brought to the attention of its readers the stories and suggestions made in all the other national newspapers. It may be that the right hon. Gentleman, like myself, reads only that one newspaper. We were therefore unaware of what was appearing in other sections of the press. Experience may have taught the right hon. Gentleman to doubt the quality of other newspapers. However, surely no one can be in any doubt about the fact that there have been substantial consultations between the Government and the Opposition about the form that the debate should take.

I am very dissatisfied with the outcome. However, for the first time, we have enshrined a new principle in our law — a principle which will enable our constitution to evolve as it should, rather than to become static and ossified, surrounded by the carbuncles of history, which have no place in our evolving society. Because we have achieved that much, and because of the manner in which my right hon. and learned Friend presented his arguments in support of that principle, even though he went on to urge that it should be limited, I must, for all my disappointment, support the inclusion of the clause in the Bill.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The essence of the remarks of the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) is clear. He does not want any distinction to be made between those who live here and those who live abroad. He believes that, however long someone has lived abroad, he should continue to have the vote here. Like the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), the hon. Gentleman seriously distorted, in a malicious manner, the grounds of our opposition to the clause. They did not present our case fairly—but perhaps that was not to be expected.

The hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) said that the Bill is an improvement because at least it introduces the principle that people who do not live in this country should be able to vote. One could argue that the Bill is an improvement to the extent that the number of years has rightly been reduced from seven to five. However, that improvement does not deal with our basic objections to the clause.

Extending the right to vote to those not resident in this country is a major constitutional departure. Reference has been made to the Select Committee. I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), like myself, is not an enthusiastic admirer of Select Committees. I voted against the establishment of the new Select Committees. However, I am, I suppose, to some extent an opportunist in that, once the Select Committees had been established by an overwhelming majority, I decided that I might as well serve on one. I am serving on one now. I am sure that my right hon. Friend would be interested in the subject of its inquiries, which is the working of the special branch.

Before I was a member of it, the Select Committee recommended, amongst other things, that the right to vote should be extended to those who live in EEC countries. It did not recommend that the right be extended as widely as the Government propose. What is so wrong is that people who are to be given the right to vote need not have any link with a constituency. It is not suggested that they should be paying income tax. It will indeed be representation without taxation. Nor is it suggested that people should own a property or be a tenant of a property in the constituency. There is absolutely no link. The case for introducing this new concept would be stronger if such qualifications were included.

In a highly marginal constituency——

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Watford): Like the hon. Gentleman's.

9.30 pm

Mr. Winnick: No, I am glad to say; but like several Conservative Members' constituencies where the majority is perhaps only a few hundred votes or less it is likely that the decision about who will be the Member of Parliament will be made by those who live abroad. That is quite wrong. People who have no link with a constituency and who do not pay taxes should not be able to determine who represents a constituency. Some unkind things have just been said about the majority of the hon. Member for Corby.

Whatever might happen in other countries—the hon. Member for Corby has given some examples—there is an important link between residence and voting which should continue. Right hon. and hon. Members have referred to how the right to vote has been extended previously. The extension of the franchise to women has been mentioned. In all previous campaigns, especially with the extension of the franchise to women, there was tremendous pressure in the country. Indeed, we all know that some women suffered greatly in prisons as a result of campaigning for their right to vote. It is almost impossible to believe that that was only 70 years or so ago. The same was true for the campaign to remove property qualifications. I see no pressure to extend the right as it is now proposed.

Mr. Foot: There was at the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Winnick: That is quite likely. The right to vote is being extended purely for political gain. The Conservative party has concluded that more votes are to be gained in this way than in keeping the present position. If it had come to any other conclusion, we should not now be considering clause 1. It is unfortunate that the Conservatives are using their majority, as they have on other issues, to advance their own cause. For those reasons and others which I and my right hon. and hon. Friends have explained, I believe that there is every reason for voting against clause 1.

Dr. Marek: We live in a world of nation states and we vote to elect a Government so that we can be guided and have rules to enable us to live together. If certain people decide to leave one nation state to live in another, for whatever reason, there is no reason why they should be given a vote in the state that they have left.

We have a representative form of government. Such a form of government is never perfect. We can argue whether we should have proportional representation or a first-past-the-post system. There are different ways of trying to achieve the aim, which is that every person should be able to vote on and in full knowledge of every issue. Clearly that is impossible. We must approximate, and so we have representatives.

In deciding to whom we grant the franchise we must do the same. Should we grant it willy-nilly and to everyone who has been in the United Kingdom and leaves it? That end of the spectrum was suggested by the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell). I vehemently oppose it. Should we decide not to grant the vote to anybody living abroad, even if a person has lived abroad for a couple of years in the service of the country, such as in the armed forces? Most hon. Members would agree that there should be provision for granting service men and women the vote. There is provision for other people such as members of the British Council and diplomats to vote, but there are injustices. People who work for the World Health Organisation do not get the vote if they leave the United Kingdom.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): Why would the hon. Gentleman extend the vote to diplomats and the other people whom he classified but refrain from extending it to a person who works, for example, in the oil industry in the Gulf?

Dr. Marek: The hon. Gentleman misheard me. At present the vote is extended to diplomats, who must make a declaration every year, whereas service voters can make one declaration which will run from year to year. The vote is already given to those people.

However, the vote is not given to people who work abroad because of their employment or occupation. It is a grey area and we must draw a line where we think we can provide the best form of representation. I disagree with the clause. It is a better clause now because it gives people who have left the country only five years during which they can exercise their right to vote as opposed to seven years. But there is a blanket covering for anyone who leaves the country for five years to vote. The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), in advocating an indefinite time, said that people abroad may return from time to time, but a person could return for a couple of weeks every year for 40 years. At least as of now they can do it for only five years. Nevertheless, that is not good enough.

We have three options. We can extend the vote by this open method, which is the Government's choice. We can do it by insisting that people who move abroad have the vote in the country in which they live. That is certainly possible. The Select Committee's report gives a list of countries where the right of vote is given. That point has not yet been made tonight. In Antigua, Bermuda, Australia, Barbados, Canada — some hon. Members mentioned the United States, but not Canada — Dominica, Grenada, Guyana, Jamaica, Mauritius, New Zealand, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Surinam, and Trinidad and Tobago we have the right to vote.

Mr. Stanbrook: All those countries are members of the British Commonwealth; they are states in which all citizens are British subjects. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a difference between Commonwealth states and foreign states?

Dr. Marek: I am talking about general principles, and the Government have chosen the first principle that I mentioned. The second way to tackle the problem is to allow people to vote in their country of residence. An EC committee considered that matter, but I do not know whether it has produced a report.

The third way to tackle the problem is to limit the franchise to some categories of people, and to say that we will give the vote to people who go abroad, provided that they are in the armed services, in the Diplomatic Service, employees of the World Health Organisation, employees of a British company, or those in the service of, and connected with, British companies. We would not give the vote to those who go abroad simply to become tax exiles or — this has not been mentioned in the debate — as fugitives from British justice.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Has not the Opposition Front Bench tried to achieve that by amendment No. 29, which might be accepted? If it is accepted, it will have the effect of excluding tax exiles from the franchise.

Dr. Marek: We have not yet reached that amendment, but I hope that it will be accepted by the House. It will go some way to solving the problem, but it will nevertheless be imperfect. I would prefer the vote to be given on a definite basis. Only those who go abroad for valid reasons should be allowed to vote here. Ideally, those who wish to vote in Britain should be liable to general taxation here. Why did not the Government think of that?

My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) said that the expatriate votes could make all the difference in a general election. Of the 16 memoranda included in the minutes of evidence to the Home Affairs Committee, No. 6 was submitted by the Conservative and Unionist Central Office, and No. 8 was submitted by the British Conservative Association in France. Conservative Members must realise who is interested in such matters. Memorandum No. 9 is a supplementary document from the British Conservative Association in France, and memorandum No. 11 was submitted by the British Conservative Association in Belgium. We should compare that with the one memorandum submitted by each of the other political parties.

However impartial or objective one wishes to be, one cannot completely dissociate oneself from the political consideration of whether the change will benefit one party or another. I would not believe an hon. Member who said that he was being dispassionate and objective and that anything he said should be taken as the gospel truth.

The Bill has been improved, but I still do not like it, and I shall vote against clause stand part.

Mr. Mellor: We have been over this course before, but I was grateful to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) for taking us on a tour of his speech in the House last December, which was a re-working of what he said in the debate on the White Paper last June.

The surprising thing about the proposal is not that it has been made, but that it has taken so long for it to come before the House. Britain is a trading nation—a Labour Prime Minister once said that exporting is fun—and we all know that some people spend an increasing amount of time working overseas for Britain. As I said on Second Reading, the increase in overseas work knows no class barriers. One need only look at the people travelling on an aircraft to the Gulf to know that it has nothing to do with class. Therefore, as the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said, it is a sign of the lack of self-confidence of the Labour party that its members should be so troubled by the proposal.

9.45 pm

The Government attach importance to obtaining as much consensus as possible for the proposal. We must also consider the practicalities involved in enabling the Bill to reach the statute book in a sensible timescale. For that reason, I unashamedly say to the those of my hon. Friends who are unhappy about the restriction of five years that this is an appropriate bite out of the problem. It may not be as much as they would wish, but it represents all that is reasonably practicable at this time. I am confident that after a general election, in which these arrangements will work well, it will be possible for the House of Commons to return to the issue in the next Parliament. I for one would be all in favour of the House doing so. I believe that the clause is a worthy part of the Bill and I commend it to the Committee.

Question put, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill:—

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report Progress.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Representation of the People Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.

Business of the House

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about a rearrangement of business on Thursday. There will now be a debate on the Opposition censure motion, and the proposed debate on the Royal Air Force will be postponed until a later date.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): The House will recognise that this is the second business statement that we have had in two days. Whether we shall have any further business statements during the week perhaps events alone will decide. I thank the right hon. Gentleman for conceding on Tuesday evening that which he denied on Monday afternoon.

Mr. Biffen: Only the foolish optimism of the Opposition would determine the number of additional statements.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): has the rearrangement of Government business consequent upon the announcement in any way reduced the likelihood that an Opposition day will be available next week to discuss the miners' strike?

Mr. Biffen: The topic for that day has not yet been announced.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): In view of the importance of the change in business, is there any reasonable supposition that the Opposition will turn out for the debate in any worthwhile numbers?

Mr. Biffen: That question should not be directed at me. In any case, I advise my hon. Friend not to be provocative.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): As the debate on the RAF has been unavoidably postponed, would it not be wise to have a Government statement on the revelations of Mr. Duncan Campbell in the New Statesman?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Questions on the business statement must be confined to what the Leader of the House has announced.

Mr. Dalyell: It refers to RAF spy planes using Punta Pirenas and Hawker Hunters being sold to Chile for questionable reasons, and the urgency of this is that there have been strong complaints from both Chile and Argentina in relation to the Beagle channel and the matter should be cleared up one way or another. We had hoped to clear it up during the RAF debate, but it looks as though the Pinochet Government have been aided greatly by a British Government who have said that they would have nothing to do with juntas. Let us have the truth on this.

Mr. Biffen: Such is the ingenuity of the hon. Gentleman that I am dumbfounded that he should not think that it could be contained within the terms of the Opposition censure motion.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Bearing in mind the urgent decisions that need to be taken in regard to RAF matters on the new trainer and the next fighter for the RAF, will my right hon. Friend look closely at the urgent need for an RAF debate and arrange it as soon as he possibly can?

Mr. Biffen: Most certainly.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Can the Leader of the House tell us to what extent the massive amount that has been lost as a result of the miners' strike will have any bearing on the censure motion? Can he also give us an assurance that the iron lady with the plastic pound will be speaking?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. Gentleman is able to catch your eye in the debate on Thursday he will be only too pleased to make then the point that he now trails.

Representation of the People Bill

Again considered in Committee.

Clause 2

REGISTRATION OF BRITISH CITIZENS OVERSEAS

Dr. Marek: I beg to move amendment No. 29, in page 3, line 22, at end insert—

'(e) declares that he intends to return to the United Kingdom for permanent residence'.

"I think it is clearly unjust that diplomats and Crown servants can have the right to vote but people who go abroad because of their occupation, service or employment with private companies or perhaps working for the World Health Organisation, do not have this right. We would like to see, if it is possible, the right to vote by proxy to be extended to those abroad because of their occupation, service or employment—citizens of the United Kingdom who have the intention to return."

As hon. Members will realise, I have been reading from the minutes of evidence given to the Select Committee for Home Affairs in 1982. The witness, Mr. Mitchell, who gave that evidence upon examination by the Select Committee is the organisation and legal officer of the Conservative party.

The Conservative party clearly believes that citizens of the United Kingdom should have the vote if they go abroad because of their occupation, service or employment and, indeed—and importantly for the amendment—have the intention to return. The amendment seeks to do precisely this. It is a way of ensuring that people claim a vote if they have the intention to come back to the United Kingdom at some time.

As I said earlier in Committee, I do not believe that clause 1, which we have now passed, should have been passed because it is an open-ended clause and allows anybody to claim the vote whether he is a tax exile, a fugitive or properly going abroad because of his employment or service to the country. The amendment seeks to tighten this up so that such people will have to go to the consulate and sign a declaration. That declaration would have to be kept by the consular officials and passed on to the electoral registration officer in the constituency in which the vote would be cast.

I refer the Committee to the memorandum submitted in evidence to the Select Committee on Home Affairs by the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives:

"It would seem necessary for there to be some sort of annual renewal of registration through British embassies or consulates abroad, who would have the responsibility of checking the facts stated".

In evidence, Mr. Jones, chief executive of Gillingham borough council, stated:

"I think it depends really, Chairman, on how far you think these facts need to be verified. Personally, I would think they should be verified with considerable consideration, and I would prefer the consulate or embassy."

While Mr. Jones may have been talking about slightly different matters, he was giving his opinion on whether people should be able to claim the vote because of their occupation or service. That applies to the amendment. The declaration must not be treated as something that anyone can sign in his back kitchen and send to the consulate or elsewhere. It should be a proper declaration that is given in at the consulate or some other appropriate place where its existence is duly noted.

I hope that the Government will be persuaded by this moderate amendment. It is not designed to create a watertight procedure, but I feel that my right hon. and hon. Friends would be considerably relieved if the Government were to accept the spirit of the amendment, redraft it and insert it in its redrafted form into the Bill.

Mr. Mellor: I congratulate the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) on making his debut on the Opposition Front Bench. It was good to have the opportunity of hearing his oratory from rather closer quarters than it has been my privilege to enjoy before this evening.

It is no part of the Government's case that as a matter of principle the franchise should be extended to Britons living overseas who have no intention of returning to the United Kingdom. We take no exception to a declaration which would set out in appropriate words that the individual concerned intended at some stage to return. We need to find the appropriate way of putting that on to the statute book. It is no criticism of the amendment that it may not be the best way of achieving what we want. Would the hon. Gentleman be satisfied with the undertaking that the Government would bring forward an amendment at a later stage that would have the same effect as the amendment which he has introduced this evening if he were to seek leave to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. Douglas Hogg: If the phraseology of the subsection is to be redrafted, it is important that it is done in such a form that the purpose of the provision is achieved. It is rather an interesting subsection, which is designed to strike, I believe, at tax exiles. No tax exile —that is someone who wishes to arrange his capital affairs in such a way as to escape capital gains tax or capital transfer tax — would be able to sign the declaration. To do so would have the effect of causing the original domicile to be resumed. If someone wishes to achieve a foreign domicile they will not be able to sign the declaration. I agree with that because I do not see why tax exiles should have a vote in United Kingdom elections. When the declaration comes to be redrafted in accordance with the undertaking that has been given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, I hope that steps will be taken to ensure that no tax exile can properly sign it.

Mr. Bermingham: Perhaps it is appropriate, on the back of the amendment, to draw to the Government's attention amendment No. 28, which has not been called but which is in the same vein. I draw it to the Government's attention because the declaration needs to be signed in the United Kingdom so that it is enforceable in the United Kingdom. When someone signs the declaration to obtain the vote that is referred to in amendment No. 29, and if we are to have jurisdiction for the penalties that are subsequently to occur, jurisdiction must arise as a result of a decision of the Court of Appeal that the declaration has been signed here. The offence, if it turns out to be one, must be one that is committed here, and the courts here will have the jurisdiction to deal with the matter.

When the Government come to redraft in accordance with their undertaking, it will need to be written into the amendment in its amended form that the undertaking is executed in the United Kingdom. I accept unreservedly that it would be ludicrous to say that those who are abroad and who seek to take advantage of clause 1 will all have to come home to sign the declaration. That is why I suggested in amendment No. 28 that anyone who sought to apply for a continuation of his vote after 1 January 1986 had only to make a declaration in the United Kingdom. I did not attempt to impose upon those already living abroad and intending to return and take up the advantage offered by clause 1 the obligation of having to return to make the application. Although I stand by my overall position, I accept that those people should be able to make the declaration in the consulates in the country in which they are residents.

The point at the heart of this matter is that those who intend to sign the declaration to keep their vote should do so after the Bill comes into law.

10.15 pm

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): I should like to underline what my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) said and I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will consider his point. The intention behind the amendment is much to the liking of both sides of the Committee. I hope that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) will be prepared to take advantage of the offer made by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State.

Dr. Marek: I thank the Under-Secretary of State for his kind words. My appearance at the Dispatch Box was not too traumatic. I ask the hon. Gentleman to pay attention to what has been said about the amendment by hon. Members, including myself and the hon. Members for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) and for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). I believe that there is a strong measure of cross-party support for this measure. I should like the Committee to allow me to withdraw the amendment so that the Government can table a proper amendment on report. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: There has been much jubilation among Conservative Members at the acceptance of a major constitutional innovation in the form of clause 1 by a majority of rather less than half the Government's normal majority. The significance of that innovation was underlined by the Home Secretary in that umbrella speech of his, which was intended to foreshadow the agreements and concessions that might be made at later stages of the Bill's consideration. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he was friendly to the widest application of the principle, and regarded what is now contained in clause 1 as only an instalment of the eventual grant of the franchise in the United Kingdom to British citizens, as such, not resident in the United Kingdom.

In the light of that statement, I draw to the Committee's attention that wicked little paragraph (3)(b) which states: "that the declarant is a British citizen".

It would have been impossible for the Home Secretary to have said what he said—indeed, it probably would have been impossible for clause 1 to have been introduced at all —had it not been for the British Nationality Act 1981, which created such a thing as British citizenship—a status that is all but exclusively identified with connection with the United Kingdom.

In past times, the qualification for the franchise in the United Kingdom was to be a British subject. Had that condition still remained, it would have been impossible to assert the principle that a British subject, wherever resident in the world, should have the right to vote in the United Kingdom. The introduction of the narrower, national concept of "British citizen" made possible such a move and such a declaration from the Home Secretary.

Of course, we have the relics of that former dispensation in our present franchise law which, as the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) reminded the Committee at an earlier stage, extends the vote not only to British citizens but to Commonwealth citizens and to citizens of the Irish Republic who, ever since 1920, we have been endeavouring to persuade ourselves are still really British subjects, only they have not woken up to this fact and are a bit slow to recognise it. Those three categories are still included in the franchise within the United Kingdom; but be it noted that, contrary to some incautious statements which have been made about the effect of the Bill during these debates, it is not any elector in this country who can go abroad and for five years retain the right to vote at elections in the United Kingdom—it is only an elector who is a British citizen who can go abroad and retain that right.

Mr. Mellor: Quite right.

Mr. Powell: The Parliamentary Under-Secretary says, "Quite right". Amen, say I; but we have revealed the thorn within the rose or, perhaps from another point of view, the silver lining behind the cloud for those of us who did not want clause 1. This is the beginning of a train of thought which will lead us to the conclusion that if it is to be the proposition that the British citizen is, as such, entitled to the franchise, then we will say that that, of necessity, applies inside as well as outside the United Kingdom. We have laid the foundation tonight of an erection which was not perhaps intended by some of the supporters of the clause, though it may not have been entirely absent from the ruminations of the Government and their advisers.

We have laid the foundations for a reform of the law of the franchise in the United Kingdom whereby it will logically be restricted to British citizens, that being in all normal acceptance the meaning of "citizen"—a person who exclusively has the right of franchise, as well as the other appurtenances of citizenship, in his own country. So, be it noted, as they say, Sir Paul, as we part with clause 2, that that wicked little subsection 3*(b)* may point to the way to a reform in our franchise inside the United Kingdom which many have considered to be logical and which many have argued for over many years.

It is a way that things have of happening—that what one has most desired comes from an unwelcome quarter. There is a Virgilian tag to that effect with which I shall not trouble the House——

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Go on.

Mr. Powell: All right, it is the one which starts "qua minime reris": "from a quarter from which you least expect it, namely, from the Greeks, shall salvation come." I hope that the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) is willing to accept a spontaneous translation. It is a common experience that those of us who have sought the prevalence of an argument or a cause find the way to achieve it open from an unexpected and even disagreeable direction. I believe that may prove to be the case with sub-section 3*(b)* of the apparently innocent clause 2.

Mr. Stanbrook: The purport of subsection 3*(b)*

"that the declarant is a British citizen" is intended, presumably, to ensure that the person who claims the right to vote in United Kingdom elections is in fact a British citizen. One presumes that he will be able to prove that he is, but there is no provision in the Bill that he should so prove, and the only sanction against someone claiming to be a British citizen and who is not is in clause 11, which is the penalty clause.

The essence of giving a vote to someone living abroad lies in the fact that there is no jurisdiction in British courts overseas, and therefore clause 11 is inoperative so long as the person involved remains overseas. Apparently, therefore, a person who declares that he is a British citizen cannot be challenged and his vote must be allowed even though the local British consul may have good reason to believe that the declaration is false. How on earth do the Government intend to get over that?

Mr. Bermingham: I hope that the Minister will answer that point, which I stressed earlier. If the declaration is not made in the United Kingdom before the person goes abroad, our courts will have no jurisdiction and the penalties will be unenforceable. I concede that for a person who goes abroad and stays abroad there is a semi-deterrent in the knowledge that if he makes a false declaration he can be prosecuted if he ever returns to the United Kingdom. Nevertheless, if the penalties are to bite we must ensure that our courts have jurisdiction.

Mr. Mellor: Extra-territoriality is created by paragraph 62 of schedule 3, so if the person returns within the jurisdiction he can be tried here as though the offence had been committed within the jurisdiction. If he does not return, that is a different matter, but that applies to a whole range of other offences.

No one is under any obligation to accept a declaration if he does not believe it to be true. This applies equally to a British consul and to the electoral registration officer. If the officer believes that the assertion made is not true, he has complete discretion to refuse to enter the person's name on the register. It will thus be a matter for both officers to do their duty as they see it.

On that basis, I commend clause 2 to the Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3

EXTENSION OF FRANCHISE FOR EUROPEAN ASSEMBLY ELECTIONS

Amendments made: No. 30, in page 5, line 8, leave out 'seven' and insert 'five'.

No. 31, in page 5, line 16, leave out subsection (5). —[Mr. Kaufman.]

Question proposed, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Bermingham: We intend to oppose clause 3, as amended. It seems ludicrous to extend the right to vote in European elections to people resident in non-European countries. It is absurd to argue that people resident in, say, south America have an interest in European elections. I make no secret of my own view of the usefulness, or lack of it, of the European Parliament, but, leaving aside one's personal views on the whole European question, if we are to be part of Europe the European Parliament should be elected by people resident within the European area. For that reason, I ask the Committee to oppose the clause.

Question put, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill:—

M25 (Reigate-Leatherhead)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Lang.]

10.42 pm

Mr. George Gardiner (Reigate): I wish to raise the matter of work on the Reigate-Leatherhead section of the M25, which, with the Leatherhead interchange and the section from Leatherhead to Wisley, constitutes a vital missing link in the orbital route round London, with long sections of completed motorway stretching either side of it. Within the unfinished stretch, work on the interchange is well advanced. Despite earlier difficulties, work is proceeding well between Leatherhead and Wisley. Work is furthest behind on the section between Reigate and Leatherhead.

The contract for the latter section was given to Bovis-Birse, which since a management buy-out has become Birse-Farr. The consulting engineers are W. S. Atkins and Partners of Epsom.

The completion of the section is of strategic importance for traffic movement in all of south-east England, and of acute environmental importance to Reigate, through the narrow streets of which the traffic thunders on its way between the eastbound M25 and the westbound A25, and to those who live along the A217 and A240 to the north, who suffer all the traffic that follows the signed route between the two open sections of the M25. Those who live by the A240, which is single carriageway south of Ewell, must suffer the passage of more vehicles each day than are carried by the six-lane M40. In Reigate and along the A217/240 this heavy traffic is increased during the summer as holiday traffic from the midlands and the west drives to and from the channel ports. My hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton) is as concerned for the welfare of his constituents as I am for mine.

It was therefore with great anticipation that we awaited the promised completion and opening of the Reigate-Leatherhead section in the spring of this year. Imagine the dismay when we learnt last summer that the contractor had been granted a six-month extension until 25 August this year. That meant that our overloaded roads and overburdened communities had to endure the vibration, noise, fumes and danger from all that traffic through another summer.

But worse was to come. No sooner were we through last summer and into autumn than Bovis-Birse announced that it was stopping all work on that section, pulling off all equipment and laying off men, for the six months which the construction industry defines as winter, from 21 October to 21 April. A six-month extension of contract time plus a six-month holiday from further work calls for an explanation.

No satisfactory explanation has been given. The first excuse advanced was the wet spring of 1983, although one would have thought that some allowance was made for inclement weather when drawing up the contracts. That wet spring was followed by two good summers. However, I have my hon. Friend's assurance, in a letter to me dated 27 September 1983, that the weather was not a factor taken into account in granting the extension. The next excuse offered by Bovis-Birse was that the Department of Transport changed the specification for concrete used on motorways just before its programme for laying concrete commenced. I would not criticise my hon. Friend for changing the specification to give greater durability to our motorways, and I do not question the fact that the necessary adjustment by the contractor would cost a little time—but as much as six months? The suggestion is not credible.

Why was the contract extension granted? At this point, I must make it clear that this was not a decision of my hon. Friend or her colleagues. Under the Institution of Civil Engineers Conditions of Contract, fifth edition, it is the engineer appointed to supervise the works and administer the contract who is responsible for deciding whether an extension of contract time is appropriate, and for how long. Therefore, the decision was taken by W. S. Atkins, and my hon. Friend was informed of it later. It is all very fishy.

It is hardly surprising that, when the cessation of work was announced soon after, it was suggested in my constituency that the extension of time owed more to cash flow problems at Bovis-Birse, and to the impending management buy-out, than to the weather or to concrete specifications, and even that a backhander might have been passed to the consulting engineers. I know enough of the repute of W. S. Atkins to discount that story, but the fact remains that no satisfactory explanation for an extension of as long as six months has ever been offered.

Then there is the mystery surrounding the contractor's decision to cease all work during the winter months. I gather that, under the terms of his contract, he can do so, although my hon. Friend assured me in her letter of 27 September that it was open to the contractor to carry out winter concreting if he wished to do so. Senior officials of the Transport and General Workers Union tell me that they have never encountered a case of a contractor pulling all men off an unfinished site in winter. It is noteworthy that Fairclough, the contractor on the Leatherhead-Wisley section, has kept some men on the site throughout. The concrete could easily have been laid on the Reigate-Leatherhead section in November; indeed, only half a kilometre of road remains to be done. Meanwhile, other staff could have continued lesser work in preparation for full resumption.

I do not doubt that Birse-Farr, as the contractor is now called, is within its contractual rights to cease all work for six months, just as it would incur no penalty if the road was not ready for handover before 25 August; and I accept that my hon. Friend has no power to order it to do otherwise. But Birse-Farr badly needs to win back some good will, and, although my hon. Friend has no power, she has influence. After all, the Government are the client, and my hon. Friend or whoever succeeds her will have further motorway contracts to place. If Birse-Farr is to secure any of those, it would be wise to turn in a better performance on this contract than it hitherto has; and the same goes for W. S. Atkins's supervision of it. I submit that if Birse-Farr gets men back on to this site well ahead of 21 April, if it starts concreting earlier weather permitting, and if it then works flat out, it will be possible to have the motorway open before the contract deadline of 21 August. I urge my hon. Friend to apply her utmost endeavours to that end.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): Before I deal with the particular inquiry of my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Gardiner) — and I thank him for bringing the issue before the House tonight—I should like to confirm that the M25 continues to be top priority in our road programme. I am pleased to say that we are well on course for achieving our target of opening the entire 122-mile orbital route by the end of 1986. Already we have 86 miles open to traffic and the remaining 36 miles are all under construction.

I well understand the anxiety of my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate and of my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton). The Leatherhead-Reigate section of the motorway, with which my hon. Friends are particularly concerned, is of vital importance to the whole of that southern ring of the M25. I share the disappointment felt in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate that the road will not be open sooner than August of this year. But there are some clear engineering and contractual reasons for the situation that he has described so clearly.

It may be helpful if I start by explaining the contractual position. It is not one that comes before the House on more than the rare occasion. The contract for the Leatherhead-Reigate section was let in April 1983 to the Bovis-Birse joint venture, which was set up for that stretch of road. The intention was that the three contracts that would fill the gap between Wisley and Reigate should be ready to be opened together, or more or less together, in the spring of 1985.

The Department's contracts for this type of work follow the conditions of contract laid down by the Institution of Civil Engineers, as my hon. Friend said. These conditions were established some 20 years ago, and have worked without problem in the intervening years in nearly all cases. But there is an integral part of the conditions which may not be well understood. It is that an independent and impartial engineer is appointed to supervise the works and administer the contract. W. S. Atkins and Partners, the consulting engineers, were appointed for this purpose for the Leatherhead-Reigate contract. This is in line with our policy that the responsibility for the supervision of the Department's larger road contracts should be undertaken independently of Government and thus in the private sector. I know that my hon. Friend welcomes the amount of work that is done in the private sector away from the Government machine.

Clause 44 of the conditions lays down that an extension of time for the completion of the works should be granted to the contractor by the independent engineer if circumstances arise that the contractor was not aware of the time when he prepared his tender. Such circumstances could include exceptional adverse weather conditions, unforeseen ground conditions, changes in the design required by the engineer or the employer, or any other unforeseen circumstances. It is the engineer's responsiblity—and his alone—to decide whether an extension is appropriate and, if so, the period for which it may be granted after treating each case on its merits.

In this case, the engineer, W. S. Atkins and Partners, granted extensions of time because of an unforeseen problem with piling to one of the structures and because as my hon. Friend said, of an improvement in the Department's specification for concrete roads.

This later change was introduced nationally as part of our continuing programme to improve the quality and durability of our roads. It will have long-term benefits by reducing traffic delays associated with future maintenance, and I am sure that it will be fully justified for such an important road as the M25. The extensions of time would not ordinarily have led to an eight-month delay in completion had it not been for the fact that the original contract was priced on the basis of summer concreting.

This is not unusual, as contractors frequently cease concrete laying during the winter. The extensions, of necessity, carried the contract completion date beyond 21 October, which is the seasonal limit of summer concreting. This meant that the contractor was entitled to have sufficient extension to enable him to complete the work in the following summer season, which officially commences on 21 April. The new contract completion date, therefore, became 26 August 1985. My hon. Friend referred at one point to 25 August, but I understand that he agrees that in fact it is 26 August.

The contractor is, therefore, entitled to take until 26 August 1985 to complete his work. It is for him to decide his own work programme to meet that completion date. However, if this new date were not met, liquidated damages would be payable.

The firm—Bovis-Birse, now known as Birse-Farr—decided in November to cease all work for the winter and resume again in the spring. This is a decision that it is entitled to make under the contract, but I agree with my hon. Friend that it is most unreasonable.

My hon. Friend is understandably concerned that the consultant is not required to refer requests for extensions of time to me in situations such as this. The consultant works closely with my officials, and he is keeping them advised of events. But I must re-emphasise that, within the terms of the contract, the decisions are those of the consultant, and it is for him to satisfy himself that the factors were outside the contractor's control when the consultants granted the extensions.

My hon. Friend is aware from previous discussions that we have had that I have already ensured that my officials will remain in continued close contact with the consultant. Everything possible is being done to encourage the contractor, Birse-Farr, to press on as fast as possible with the work on this vitally important section of the M25 motorway.

I fully appreciate that local residents who are anxiously awaiting the completion of the M25 will have found it difficult to understand why the contractor has chosen to close the site completely. However, having received the extension of time, he was exercising his right to take a management decision as to how the work should be completed within the contract period.

The question has been asked why Bovis-Birse closed down in the winter, whereas the contractor on the nearby Wisley-Leatherhead section — Faircloughs — continued concreting well into December. I can only repeat that this is a matter for the management of the respective contractors to decide, bearing in mind that any work done during the winter months would not necessarily have a material effect on the completion of the works. In other words, there is work that may be done by a contractor who continues in the winter, but that will not necessarily speed up the end of the concrete paving that has to be laid in better weather.

As my hon. Friend now knows, we have no power to instruct the contractor to reopen the site. We might be able to induce him to do so by paying him what could be a substantial sum of money, but this would mean that budgets would be exceeded and, because of the difficulties associated with work in winter weather which I mentioned earlier, such additional payments as might be made would not necessarily represent value for money. Notwithstanding the priority that we give to the M25—I do not hesitate to re-emphasise that point — value for money must be achieved on every contract. I would not think it right to authorise additional expenditure on this contract which would inevitably be at the expense of other urgent road needs, particularly in view of the considerable uncertainties involved, and the use to which this money might be put.

Although 21 April is the start of the summer concreting season, there is no reason why the contractor should not restart work on site before that date and my officials, through the consulting engineer, will be encouraging Birse-Farr to do so.

My hon. Friend has made very clear his concern that the section of the motorway between Leatherhead and Reigate should be opened as soon as it is ready. The Leatherhead interchange is being completed ahead of contract and the Wisley to Leatherhead section will probably be ready prior to completion of the Leatherhead-Reigate section, so there should be no obstacle to opening the latter section immediately upon completion of work.

I know that my hon. Friend has not been concerned with the related timings of the adjacent contracts, but for the sake of the record and for those who may read the report of our debate he will understand me when I say that if there should be a substantial difference between the opening dates of the two adjacent sections — Wisley to Leatherhead and Leatherhead to Reigate — there would be discussions with the local authorities involved. The last thing in the world that my hon. Friend and I want is that traffic that has travelled quite reasonably on the motorway should suddenly turn on to roads that were not built to take that type of traffic. It is against that eventuality that I must provide.

I can assure my hon. Friend and the House that my Department is in no way complacent about the wider problem to which he has referred. As I said earlier, we attach very high priority to the completion of the M25, but we are concerned that the section between Wisley and Reigate should be completed as soon as possible. Existing traffic problems in Reigate, Ewell and other areas are badly affected by heavy goods vehicles and other orbital traffic. I well understand the disturbance, distress and inconvenience that this causes both to local residents and to the other road users. One of the reasons for building the M25 is to take traffic out of residential, shopping and commercial areas and we shall certainly do all in our power to see that the M25, in Surrey and the remainder of its length is completed as quickly as possible.

I hope that my hon. Friend will realise from what I have said that we shall not let up in our efforts to get the contractors back on site as early as possible so that this section of the M25 can be completed as soon as possible. Only upon its completion will my hon. Friend realise with me why there is a need not only to get the job done as fast as possible but as thoroughly as possible and up to the specifications that the Department lays down so that the road shall have a proper life without interruption. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall leave no stone unturned to make sure that the contractor has the M25 in his area open as soon as possible.

Question put and agreed to.

HIGHLAND REGION (KINLOCHBERVIE) ORDER CONFIRMATION

Mr. Secretary Younger presented a Bill to confirm a Provisional Order under section 7 of the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act 1936, relating to Highland Region (Kinlochbervie); And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be considered upon Tuesday 5 February and to be printed. Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Tourism (Grant-aid)

1. Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied with the operation of section 4 grant-aid under the Development of Tourism Act 1969; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): The operation of the section 4 scheme is primarily a matter for the national tourist boards for England, Scotland and Wales, which have authority to approve individual offers of assistance up to £200,000. I believe that the scheme helps to stimulate investment in tourism projects which would not otherwise take place.

Mr. Hicks: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a strong case for making additional funds available for this purpose; funds which not only widen and improve the quality of tourist projects in this country but help to create employment? Is he aware that whereas the average cost of creating a new job in the tourist industry is £4,500, each unemployed person costs the nation £6,000 a year?

Mr. Butcher: There is no doubt that the tourism industry has made a magnificant contribution to job creation in the United Kingdom. In the hotel trade alone there was an increase of 14,000 jobs in the 12 months to September 1984. In that context, section 4 assistance has been cost effective. I cannot give my hon. Friend any reassurance on future spending under section 4, but he will be aware that our hon. Friend the Minister of State has said that he wants expenditure to continue over the next three years at approximately the 1983 rate.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Minister accept that, given the parity of the pound against the dollar, this is a particularly good time to try to attract tourists to Britain, in particular from the United States? Will he ensure that adequate finance is available — even more finance than the expenditure limits at present allow for the Development of Tourism Act 1969—to maximise that potential?

Mr. Butcher: There is no doubt that the current movements in exchange rates could provide a massive boost for the balance of payments through tourism. While the British Tourist Authority is doing its job very well indeed, we hope that it will take advantage, within its current funding levels, of the bonus that is being presented to it.

Mr. John Townend: Will my hon. Friend see whether changes need to be made so that seaside towns which are outside assisted areas and are not in receipt of tourist grants are able to make application for EEC grants?

Mr. Butcher: Section 4 is available, at the request of the tourist industry, on a national and sectoral basis, but it envisaged that the assisted area policy might result in some discrepancies which would not be wholly welcome to the industry. However, I note my hon. Friend's point on the European dimension and will convey it to my appropriate colleagues.

Local Enterprise Agencies

2. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many local enterprise agencies are in existence; and how many are in the process of being set up.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. David Trippier): There are 238 local enterprise agencies and a further 38 are in the process of being set up.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my hon. Friend aware that a local enterprise agency is in the process of being set up in King's Lynn, where, regrettably, the unemployment level is above the regional average? Is he further aware that, when established, it will play a crucial role in helping small buinesses, and thus will help to reduce unemployment? What Government help is available to such local enterprise agencies?

Mr. Trippier: I am aware that an enterprise agency is in the process of being set up in west Norfolk. Having visited my hon. Friend's constituency on two occasions, I take this opportunity to pay him a warm tribute for the initiative that he has displayed in bringing forward this enterprise agency.

The main assistance that is available for the establishment of local enterprise agencies is from the private sector. The principal assistance available from the Government is the tax relief on the contributions made by the private sector, provided that those enterprise agencies are established. In addition, pump priming funds are available at regional offices of the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Loyden: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in enterprise zones the development——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a different question. The question is about enterprise agencies.

Mr. Loyden: I am referring to these zones in the context of small businesses. Is the Under-Secretary of State aware that the retail outlets that have been developed in enterprise zones are destroying the small businesses that lie outside those areas? Is it not a fact——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is still referring to a different subject.

Shoes

3. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in persuading foreign countries to reduce their import tariffs on United Kingdom-manufactured shoes to levels the United Kingdom imposes through the common external tariff.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): Footwear, like other British exports, has benefited from reductions in duty granted by trading partners in successive GATT negotiations. But many tariffs remain far too high—and not only on shoes.

Mr. Freeman: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer. As he knows, footwear manufacturing is important in my constituency of Kettering. We face high and often unfair tariffs. Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity to urge the European Commission, on the accession of Spain, to increase the common external tariff, as we are allowed to do under GATT, to the weighted average between the European Community as presently constituted and Spain, and to use that bargaining weapon with those other countries which so far have refused to reduce their tariffs?

Mr. Channon: I note what my hon. Friend says. I have been much impressed by the representations that he has made to me on a number of occasions on behalf of the footwear industry. The answer to my hon. Friend's specific point is that this would depend upon negotiations between the Community and the other contracting parties to GATT. I cannot say that any great increase in tariffs is in prospect.

Mr. Kirkwood: If the Minister is concerned about the prospects for the shoe manufacturing industry, will he, in the coming weeks, spend less time considering the important question of tariff quotas and spend more time making representations to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is considering imposing VAT on children's shoes?

Mr. Channon: I think the hon. Gentleman knows that that is a matter for my right hon. Friend, and not for me.

Mr. Marlow: As my right hon. Friend is well aware that the footwear industry is deeply concerned about the fact that everyone seems to be able to get into our markets, but we do not seem to be able to have the opportunity to get into other people's markets, will he tell the industry that there is nothing that he can do about the matter because he is quite powerless, and all power resides in Brussels with the European Community? The industry will then direct its complaints and attention to where something can be done about the problem.

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend has slightly exaggerated the position. The British Government are perfectly capable of making representations to the Community and pressing the Community to take effective action. There are many areas where the footwear industry faces difficult exporting problems, but there are certain places—for example, South Korea—where progress is being made. We shall continue to press for progress to be made.

Mr. Williams: Is it not nonsense for the Minister to pretend that VAT is a matter for the Chancellor and not for him? After all, does not the Minister's Department represent the manufacturers? Will not the manufacturers be severely harmed if VAT is introduced? Does not the Minister's Department allegedly and purportedly represent the consumers? Will not the consumers be severely hurt if VAT is introduced?

Mr. Channon: Surely even the hon. Gentleman does not expect me to anticipate my right hon. Friend's Budget.

Small Businesses (Assistance)

4. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to educate professional advisers about the help available from his Department to their small business clients.

Mr. Trippier: We are curently sponsoring seminars for professional advisers on the importance of business planning. I am confident that these will prove as popular and successful as our earlier series on Government grants and advisory services and on small firms finance.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I thank my hon. Friend and welcome his reply. Can he reassure the House that during the endeavour there will not be too great a shift of finite resources away from direct help to small businesses?

Mr. Trippier: I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance. I am anxious to educate, as far as we are able, the professional advisers who act as intermediaries and advise the important people—the small business men.

Mr. MacKenzie: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the best help that he can give to small firms is to ensure that they obtain orders? If our large companies, whether they are in the public or the private sector, are going bust—and many of them are—then, by definition, the number of orders placed with small firms will be reduced. The best assistance that the hon. Gentleman can give these small firms is to ensure that there is an upsurge of demand by the large companies for the products of small companies.

Mr. Trippier: That certainly has an obvious effect. However, the right hon. Gentleman overlooks the fact that the Government's record on helping small firms is of the highest order. I published some figures not so long ago which showed that there had been a net increase in the number of small firms of some 47,000 in a year—slightly more than double the figure for the year before. That shows clearly that we are on the right track.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will my hon. Friend join me in applauding the work of the small firms centres, and in particular the Nottingham one, which covers the Leicestershire area and the city of Leicester? Will he ensure that those advising and helping — to a large extent from Leicester—are properly updated about all the assistance available for small firms, which represent the future of our country and which will provide real jobs?

Mr. Trippier: I am grateful for the compliments that my hon. Friend has paid to the small firms centres, especially the one in Nottingham. I am certain that the service provided by the inquiry officer and the small firms counsellors in that region is very much appreciated in my hon. Friend's area and in his constituency.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister keen for his Department to assist producer co-operatives? Do his officials work closely with local authorities, many of which have done good work in encouraging co-operatives in their areas?

Mr Trippier: We have shown that we are anxious to encourage the growth of co-operatives. The Co-operative Development Agency and Industrial Development Act was passed by Parliament in 1984, and we are keen that the co-operative sector should expand. However, we must recognise that there are little more than 1,000 co-operatives in the country at the moment—we should like to see more—compared with an overall figure of 1·3 million small firms.

Mr. James Lamond: Is the Minister aware that the Government's loan guarantee scheme for small businesses is not working as well as it might? The scheme could be very valuable if everyone who could benefit from it was aware of its existence. Does the Minister know that in the area which he and I represent even some of the banks deny knowledge of the scheme?

Mr. Trippier: That situation has not been brought to my attention. If it is correct, it is extremely worrying. I do not think that the Department has any difficulty in increasing awareness of the scheme. Our difficulty, and my personal embarrassment, has been that the loss rate has been far higher than we expected. I have therefore changed the terms and conditions of the scheme, thereby improving the appraisal and monitoring procedure.

Mr. John Smith: Is not the biggest problem faced by small firms the severe decline in medium-sized and large businesses? Surely the biggest help that the Government could give the small firms would be to find a strategy for the survival and prosperity of manufacturing in this country? Is it not true that the most severe decline has taken place since the present Government took office and that a reversal of that decline is more important than all the schemes in the world?

Mr. Trippier: The right hon. Gentleman's statement reflects the views held by his party when last in government. They took no cognisance of the fact that a greater concentration on small firms — as has been effected by the present Government—would increase employment potential in the larger firms. I find it difficult to imagine that the larger firms would increase their demand on the labour market as much as smaller firms, which have not only wealth-creating potential, but employment potential. It is a matter of balance.

EC (Manufactures)

5. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total surplus or deficit in trade in manufactures with the European Economic Community in 1984; and what was the comparable surplus or deficit in 1974.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Norman Tebbit): The deficit in trade in manufactures with other members of the Community was £7¾ billion in 1984, offset by a surplus in trade in oil of £7·4 billion. In 1974, the deficit in manufacturing was £½ billion.

Mr. Taylor: We still have a surplus in our manufacturing trade with the rest of the world. What are the main reasons for the devastating and appalling deficit in trade with the Common Market, which must be having an appalling effect on unemployment in this country?

Mr. Tebbit: What is important in these matters is not the particular balance in relation to one country or group of countries, or one manufacturing or trading activity as opposed to another, but the overall balance. In 1984, overall, we were in surplus, whereas in 1974, overall, we were in deficit. The position has improved in the last decade.

Our customers come here to buy because we offer the best value for the things that they buy from us. In exactly the same way, our consumers go where they think they can find the best value.

Mr. Crowther: Will the Secretary of State urge on the Leader of the House the need for a debate, in Government time, on the report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, which has demonstrated dramatically the seriousness of the problem? Despite what the right hon. Gentleman said about the need to balance one thing against another, does he agree that manufacturing is at the heart of wealth creation in Britain? What does he suggest that we live on when the oil runs out?

Mr. Tebbit: Of course manufacturing is an important part of wealth creation, but it is not the only part. If we lived in a slightly more rational world, coal extraction would be a wealth creating activity, instead of a wealth destroying one as it is today. The hon. Gentleman's question about a debate is an appropriate one to put to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House during business questions.

Mr. Michael Marshall: What is the latest indication that my right hon. Friend has received from the Confederation of British Industry about membership of the EEC? Does he agree that the CBI's previous assessment showed that 90 per cent. of its members thought that withdrawal from the Community would be a disaster for their business prospects?

Mr. Tebbit: Like the great majority of the British people, the CBI favours our continued membership of the Community. The problem for some right hon. and hon. Labour Members is that they opposed membership, lost the battle and have not yet been able to reconcile themselves to our membership.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Secretary of State agree that the most striking feature of our current trade figures is that our non-oil visible trade deficit has increased from £2·5 billion in 1982 to £11·4 billion last year, while our oil surplus has steadily increased? Does he agree that that explains why the pound has been under pressure; that it is because we are overdependent on the oil part of our economy?

Mr. Tebbit: If the hon. Gentleman is right—I am not saying that I necessarily agree with him — the reasonable consequence of what he says is that we should try to stick the oil back in the ground and pretend that we never found it.

Mr. Dorrell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that EC countries still represent the largest and richest market for manufacturers in the world? How can it possibly be in our interests to cut ourselves off from that market? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the answer lies in making our manufactures sufficiently competitive for European consumers to choose to buy them?

Mr. Tebbit: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That is why, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said earlier this week, it would be prudent for those who are engaged in wage negotiations to consider the type of wage negotiations that are going on in Germany and to contrast them with some of the absurd demands that are being made in Britain.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Do the figures which the right hon. Gentleman has just given include steel manufacturing? If so, are we not in danger of becoming over-generous compared with some of our European partners?

Mr. Tebbit: I always try not to be over-generous with our European partners. My business is to try to be as generous as possible with Britain. I understand that the figures include steel, but, as the hon. Gentleman knows, our steel industry was almost destroyed by the ravages of the Beswick review and other idiotic affairs of that type.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the demand for overall industrial protection, which is implicit in many of the supplementary questions that have been fired at him, are utterly inconsistent with Britain's need to earn its living in a competitive world?

Mr. Tebbit: My hon. Friend is right. It is theoretically possible for us to put up barriers and to prevent our people from buying goods in the most advantageous markets, but we cannot force the rest of the world to buy our goods against its will.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Japanese have managed to penetrate the European market, despite all the problems? Does he further agree that the lesson for British workers and management is that, if the Japanese can penetrate the market, the answer lies in their own hands?

Mr. Tebbit: Yes, but I only wish that it were a little easier for all European manufactures to penetrate the Japanese market. That seems to be rather difficult, and the reason does not always lie in the quality or price of the goods.

Mr. Gould: The Prime Minister professes to be puzzled by the fall in the pound's value. Do not the calamitous figures which the Secretary of State gave at least offer part of the answer? How can the Government continue to talk convincingly about economic recovery when this deficit, which is worth 1 million jobs in British industry, is allowed to continue and to grow? Can the Secretary of State tell the House whether the issue is being considered by the special working party which he set up to examine our disastrous decline in manufacturing trade? Will he assure us that, despite his public show of indifference, he, at least, is taking the matter seriously?

Mr. Tebbit: If it were a question of our balance of trade and balance of payments, sterling would, in general, have been lower under Labour Governments than it has been under Conservative Governments.

Child Buggy Pushchairs

6. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the organisations which he has consulted about his proposed new draft regulations concerning the safety of child buggy pushchairs.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Alex Fletcher): The consultation documents on the proposed new safety regulations for pushchairs are available in the Library. They include a full list of those consulted.

Mr. Chapman: Recognising the deficiencies in the existing regulations, will my hon. Friend say when he hopes to introduce the new regulations? Considering the serious, albeit few, accidents that there have been with the collapsible type child buggy pushchair, can he reiterate that that form of perambulator comes within the scope of the existing regulations?

Mr. Fletcher: On the second point, I can confirm that the existing regulations apply to buggies, and they will be covered also in the new ones. On the first point, the regulations will come into effect later this year.

Mr. Williams: Will the Parliamentary Under-Secretary bear in mind that when the regulations were introduced in September 1978, after the death of children, they were described as the first step? Why are we still waiting for the second step six and a half years later? Has he read Which? magazine, which carried out a survey in 1982 and found that five of the 20 pushchairs that it checked were unsafe, that half of the owners of the buggy type of pushchair, and a quarter of the owners of the traditional type of pushchair, reported that they had had accidents, and that in one in 20 of those accidents a child had been injured?

Mr. Fletcher: I appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's points. We are making new regulations to BSI standards, which will be put into practice as soon as possible.

West Midlands Initiative

7. Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in his Department's west midlands initiative.

Mr. Butcher: The primary object of the Department's west midlands initiative was to increase the application of new technologies and new production techniques in the industries of the region, and that was achieved. Much of the region has now been granted intermediate area status, and hence the emphasis of the Department's work there has shifted to regional assistance.

Mr. Taylor: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply, but will he tell the House what hard results he has to show for his efforts for innovation, new products and new processes in companies in the west midlands?

Mr. Butcher: I am delighted to report to my hon. Friend some of the excellent results achieved during that period. More than 1,200 companies received grants to introduce new techniques and machinery into their existing manufacturing processes, support under section 8 and under support for innovation totalled £70 million, and levered a total spend of £200 million in a cost-effective market-driven manner.

Mr. Park: How does the Minister reconcile his reply to his hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) with the fact that money available for technology has been reduced, as he knows? The two do not add up.

Mr. Butcher: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. If he is referring to the support for innovation programme, he will know that it was significantly increased for the current financial year. The moratorium, to which I think he is referring, was invoked because awareness of the programme arrived like an express train and the application rate consequently increased. During the first few months of this year we therefore spent what had hitherto been a total year's allocation.

Sir Dudley Smith: Is my hon. Friend aware that his original reply is most encouraging? Will he make further efforts and do everything that he can to encourage and help the car components industry, which in its way is even more important than the car industry?

Mr. Butcher: The car components industry was one of the major recipients of expenditure under section 8 and, indeed, under support for innovation. I hope that my hon. Friend will join me in commending the excellent work that is going on, for example, at Warwick university with BL Systems and two other key companies, which are trying to spread best practice in innovative manufacture of components throughout the British motor industry.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Is the Minister aware that for most industries in the west midlands his so-called initiative was either stillborn or died of paralysis? Is he also aware that since the Government came to power we have lost one third of industrial manufacturing capacity in the west midlands and one third of jobs in manufacturing totalling 225,000? Is he further aware that in the west midlands the phasing out of capital allowances, the massive hike in interest rates and the moratorium on regional aid amounts to nothing more than a further prolonged period of disaster for that region?

Mr. Butcher: The Labour research department has fouled up again. The hon. Gentleman should know that section 7 assistance, the type of assistance that applies in the west midlands, is still being used in that region. There is no moratorium on that.

The hon. Gentleman should also know from discussions on the subject that the prejudice of Government against the west midlands emanated directly from Labour Government activity, not least on industrial development certificates. They encouraged industry to leave that region wholesale. We have ended that and have produced much more equality of treatment for each of the assisted areas.

Small Firms (Cash Flow)

8. Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to provide assistance to smaller firms to help them to cope with the problems caused by late payments of bills by large firms.

Mr. Trippier: I share the concern about the serious difficulties which that practice can cause for small firms. I have recently invited organisations representing industry to join me in examining possible initiatives.

Mrs. Peacock: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. Will he consider withholding DTI grants from those firms which do not settle their accounts, or delay settling their accounts, with smaller firms?

Mr. Trippier: My hon. Friend advocates a course of action that has been suggested to me on a number of occasions. My immediate reaction to the suggestion is that that approach would be a recipe for bureaucratic complexity.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the Minister recognise that, as well as large firms, among those most guilty of this practice are local government organisations, many of them Conservative-controlled? Will he also recognise that in a period such as the present, with ruinously high interest rates, the late payment of bills can mean the death of small firms? If legislation is not appropriate in this matter, will he give consideration to the Government backing a code of practice, which can then be operative in the field?

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman obviously recognises the problem that I identified in my answer to the substantive question. It is important that we should stop short of legislation, as he seems to be suggesting, because a problem may arise where small firms may not be paying the bills of other small firms on time and where small firms may not be paying the bills of large firms on time. I should prefer to see some code of practice initiated by industry rather than by the Government.

Mr. Dickens: I congratulate my hon. Friend on all the measures that he has introduced to help small businesses in Britain, for which they are deeply grateful, but is he aware that many of the small companies in Britain are having inflicted upon them the large companies, who are dining out on the overdrafts of those small companies, and that many of those large companies are enjoying massive Government contracts? Is it at all possible that one or two of those companies could be exposed as late payers to help the small businesses?

Mr. Trippier: I doubt whether there would have been anything wrong if my hon. Friend had chosen to expose one or two of those companies in his question to me. If there is evidence that a number of large companies are delaying the payment of bills, I shall be grateful to receive it so that we can look at it more carefully.

Mr. O'Brien: I have noted the reply to the question from the hon. Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock). Will the Minister also have regard to the problems facing small industry and the help and protection that it needs because of water charges? Will he have a word with his colleagues——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about the late payment of bills.

Mr. O'Brien: This is a problem, because the water authorities demand payment immediately and the increase in water charges is causing a problem for small firms. Will the Minister have a word with his colleagues to try to get some easement for small firms?

Mr. Trippier: Certainly I am prepared to discuss the matter with my colleagues in the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Williams: Will the Minister recognise that, disastrous enough in itself as the 4 per cent. increase in interest rates has been for small firms, that increase worsens the problems outlined in the initial question? Will he further recognise that not only does it make it massively more expensive for small firms to finance the cash gap caused by this practice by large firms, but the higher rate of interest encourages large firms to delay payments even more?

Mr. Trippier: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said yesterday at Question Time, it is a disappointment to see interest rates at this level. We all hope that the present level of interest rates is only temporary. As my right hon. Friend said yesterday, the effect could be worse if inflation were to rip as it did under the Labour Administration. I must take the opportunity to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that I welcome his new interest in small firms. We were appalled when in a debate on small firms on 18 January the official Opposition——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that that is also a bit wide of the subject of late payment of bills.

Small Firms Service

10. Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has for improving publicity for the small firms service.

Mr. Trippier: I am keen to ensure that small business men are fully aware of the advice and information available from the small firms service. We are at present advertising in the national and regional press to promote greater use of the service.

Mr. Maclean: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. Why is it thought necessary to run a Government information service through the small firms service when private initiatives are being taken in this regard?

Mr. Trippier: The small firms service provides a national facility, which offers consistent quality. It does not seek to compete with other initiatives, which are very welcome. It is a complementary service to local initiatives. Those services offered at local level are very much appreciated.

Mr. Cyril Smith: Will the Minister attempt to ensure not only that the small firms service is known throughout the community but that small firms are assisted to become known throughout the world? The deputation that is to go to China does not, so far as I am aware, contain any representatives of small firms. That is a great disappointment to small firms in my part of the world. What steps has his Department taken to ensure that small firms are represented on such delegations?

Mr. Trippier: Small firms are normally well represented on delegations abroad and the British Overseas Trade Board is anxious to encourage that. I shall certainly consider seriously the particular point that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

Mr. Robert Atkins: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the work that he has done for the small firms service. Does he not agree that there is room for involving people apart from those who would otherwise be retired in giving advice to potential small business men on developing businesses, in that the older people tend to be slightly out of touch with current developments concerning small business advice?

Mr. Trippier: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I am anxious to encourage people who are working in industry, some who are semi-retired and some who are retired, to come forward. Many of them will have a significant contribution to make. It is important to underline that in the local enterprise agency movement mushrooming throughout the country we have a source of business counselling dealing with problems at the sharp end, which is invaluable.

Mr. Haynes: Does the Minister recall that in the 1979 election campaign the Conservative party said that it intended to help small businesses because that was where jobs would come from? Since then, year by year, more and more small firms have fallen by the wayside. Does he appreciate that if nothing is done about that problem there will be no small businesses left to publicise?

Mr. Trippier: If the hon. Gentleman would open his ears rather than his mouth, a whole new world might be opened up to him. As I pointed out in reply to an earlier question, a net increase in small firms in this country has led to greater employment. I am glad that he referred to the commitment to small firms in our 1979 manifesto. We have consistently continued that commitment, but it was notably absent from the Labour party manifesto in 1979 and also in 1983.

Contributions to Political Parties

11. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to place contributions by companies to political parties or for other political purposes on the same legal footing as contributions by trade unions to political parties or for other political purposes.

Mr. Tebbit: I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Winnick: Will the Secretary of State explain why trade unions need to have a political fund and are now required to have a ballot, but companies do not need a political fund before contributing to political parties? Does he recognise that the way in which the Government have used their majority in this Parliament can only be described as a form of political corruption?

Mr. Tebbit: I do not recognise that at all. The hon. Gentleman fails to recognise that companies and trade unions are governed by completely different statutes and are set up for completely different purposes. He would be the last person to want standards of company law applied to trade unions. If they were so applied, I can think of at least one prominent trade unionist today who would probably have been prosecuted for the way in which he has debased the union for which he works, destroyed its power, corrupted its members and wasted its money.

Mr. Ward: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the annual general meeting of a company allows shareholders to express their opinions each year? Does he further agree that it would be a good thing if trade union members had the same right to express an opinion in that way each year?

Mr. Tebbit: Yes, I do. Again, however, my hon. Friend must not assume that unions and companies should be run in the same way or governed by the same kind of statute. One must also keep a sense of proportion in these matters. In 1981, for example, in respect of their political funds trade unions spent £4·8 million or 12·8 per cent. of the amount that they spent on benefits to their members. When companies donate money to political parties it is more like 0·02 per cent. of profit or turnover. [HON.

MEMBERS: "What is the total?"] According to The Economist, the total is about £2·5 million. Moreover, the figure that I gave for trade unions excludes spending such as the £1 million campaign to "Kill the Bill"—a Bill which is now in good health as an Act of Parliament and helping to democratise trade unions. My figure also excluded £1 million spending by NALGO on another fruitless exercise against the interests of its members.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: If the Secretary of State is ever tempted to go down that road, will he stop the nonsense of having ballots on the existence of political funds and instead introduce ballots for the party to which the funds should be donated? Is he aware that that would prevent the current attempt by the Labour party to camouflage the fact that 80 per cent. of the political funds of the trade union movement go straight into Labour party coffers?

Mr. Tebbit: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point, but I wish there was more consistency in these matters. Perhaps he will tell us at some time whether the president of the SDP, Mrs. Shirley Williams, asked for ballots of members of APEX when it was giving money to the Labour party, and whether the SDP has sought and obtained donations from companies without requiring the companies to ask their shareholders.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: Accepting the Secretary of State's point about the need for a sense of proportion on the matter and the fact that the laws for trade unions and companies are different, would it not be a good idea to consider this from the point of view of the House? If it is right to control political expenditure by trade unions, surely it is equally right to control it by companies. If he considered it that way, could we not have an interesting argument and dialogue and come to a conclusion that accepts both sides and is not based on party dogma?

Mr. Tebbit: It is always a sign of a pretty rocky case in the House when an hon. Member says, "Let us decide this without reference to party dogma". One knows that the hon. Member is trying to slip a quick one in somewhere.

There are no controls on the amount that trade unions may spend on politics. Much of the money that they spent on what the man in the street would see as a political campaign, such as "Kill the Bill" was not regarded as political spending. Equally, when a company's board of directors decides that money should be spent in the interests of the shareholders, it is surely reasonable that they should be able to do so, and that is done against the background of the Companies Acts and the requirement for a meeting of shareholders.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is nothing wrong in any company giving a political donation? If Opposition Members care to read any annual report, they will realise that all declarations in excess of £500 are already declared.

Mr. Tebbit: My hon. Friend is right. Once again one has to look at these things in the round. I am indebted to the New Statesman of 30 November 1984, in which I read that part of the Labour party's jobs and industry campaign for this year includes a strong recommendation that the Labour party should approach companies for political donations. Perhaps the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) should speak to his own party about these matters.

Mr. John Smith: Despite all the attempts by the Secretary of State to cloud the issue, is it not crystal clear to any fair-minded person that what the Government want to see is special controls on the political funds operated by trade unions but none whatsoever on the companies and corporate forces that support the Conservative party? Is that not blatantly and grossly unfair from any standpoint?

Mr. Tebbit: No. There are controls in each case, but because of the different natures of the organisations they are different controls. The right hon. Gentleman knows full well that the 1908 Act, which first arranged the compact, as one might call it——

Mr. Smith: 1913.

Mr. Tebbit: I think that the 1908 Act was the first. The right hon. and learned Gentleman may well be right on the date. The Act in question provided that the union had to have a ballot of its members to authorise the setting-up of a fund. Whether those ballots were held just after 1908 or 1913, there cannot be many of that electorate who are still left around and it is about time there was another ballot.

Anglo-Soviet Trade

12. Mr. Cockeram asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what prospects for increased Anglo-Soviet trade resulted from the recent visit of Mr. Gorbachev.

Mr. Channon: When I met Mr. Gorbachev last month we agreed that trade between our two countries should be developed on a long-term basis. Mr. Gorbachev said that he hoped for an increase in trade of 40 to 50 per cent. in the short term and we discussed a number of opportunities that would help us to achieve this objective. These are now being actively pursued by the companies concerned.

Mr. Cockeram: Will my right hon. Friend ensure that Russian promises to ease restrictions on mutual trade are borne out in practice, and further ensure that when Russian cruise ships, which offer lower grade cruises than Britian's luxury cruise ships, use British ports they receive fair and equal treatment?

Mr. Channon: I shall be delighted to look at the point raised by my hon. Friend.

Bankruptcies

14. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many firms went bankrupt in 1984; and what is the total number of bankruptcies since 1979.

Mr. Fletcher: Provisional 1984 figures for Great Britain are 8,509 bankruptcies and 14,210 company liquidations. In the six years 1979 to 1984 there were 34,862 bankruptcies and 61,785 company liquidations. The bankruptcy figures include deeds of arrangement, and cover all individuals and partnerships.

Mr. Brown: Does the Minister agree that the figures are a terrible indictment of his Government? How many more firms will go bust as the pound declines and interest rates reach record level,s? Will he tell us the truth for a change?

Mr. Fletcher: I shall tell the hon. Member another truth—the number of new company starts is also at a record level with almost 100,000 new starts in 1984 alone. In other major industrial countries the number of bankruptcies and insolvencies in the last few years has been very high. Perhaps the next time that the hon. Gentleman visits the Red Army in Afghanistan he will stop off at one or two countries and find out for himself.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: Is my hon. Friend aware that many bankruptcies are caused by poor management, but that occasionally companies run into difficulties because of unfair trade barriers set up by other countries? Is my hon. Friend aware that Siemens sell telex machines and telecommunications equipment on the British market and that other companies, such as Olivetti, have telex equipment on sale and approved in this market but that British telex and telcommunications manufacturers are not allowed to sell in Italy, Germany, Japan, France and most other countries?

Mr. Fletcher: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. If he can provide details I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade will look into that.

Mr. James Hamilton: Will the Minister be realistic and rectify what is happening in my constituency, where virtually every week, without fail, bankruptcies occur? Is the Minister aware that the construction company for which I worked, which is now over 100 years old, will close its doors on 1 February? Is he also aware that, because of Government policy, that company has gone out of commission? Does the Minister remember the 1979 Conservative manifesto in which promises were made to smaller companies and to industrialists in general? Finally is he aware that companies are now sadly disillusioned with the Government? Pray God that they will vote Labour at the next general election.

Mr. Fletcher: I am interested in the fact that the hon. Gentleman seeks aid from yet another place. The point is that manufacturing investment in companies in the market today amounted to £6 billion in the year to September 1984. That was up 16 per cent. on the year before. Retail sales were up 4·5 per cent. in real terms in 1984 compared with 1983. There is no shortage of demand in the market. The challenge is for British companies to meet that demand.

Mr. Spencer: Does my hon. Friend agree that a number of firms in the city of Leicester went bankrupt because they were crucified by a monstrous rate bill imposed by the city council?

Mr. Fletcher: I am sure that that is correct. It applies to many companies, especially small companies, throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gould: Is the Minister aware that because the deposit on a debtor's petition and the minimum debt to support a creditor's petition were increased by 100 per cent. and 120 per cent. respectively in October last year, the figures which he has just given the House do not fully reflect the full severity of this immense and record surge in business failures? Is the Minister further aware that if the figures are disaggregated they cast a yet more unflattering light on Government policy because they show that, following the imposition of VAT on home improvements, business failures among glazing firms have doubled and that even in high technolgy — computer manufacturers and distributors — so much touted as a success by the Government, the failures have doubled?

Mr. Fletcher: Even taking into account the increase in the debtor's petition, the monthly figures show a levelling off in the number of bankruptcies.

Regional Aid

16. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many recent representations he has received on his decision to alter the criteria governing regional aid.

Mr. Butcher: About 120 written submissions on the changes in regional industrial policy have been received since my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry announced them on 28 November. Ministers in the Department have also had a number of discussions with right hon. and hon. Members and others about local and general industrial development questions against the background of the new policy.

Mr. Fisher: Will the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State concede that the five or six criteria in the new policy for regional aid are adequate to respond neither to the underlying unemployment trends, such as job vacancies or youth or long-term unemployment, nor to the inherent industrial problems of an area such as mine in north Staffordshire? Will he recognise that his plans leave an area such as north Staffordshire in a worse position, sandwiched as it is between two areas to which he has given aid? Will he therefore reconsider his plans?

Mr. Butcher: I fully understand the reasons for the hon. Gentleman's question, particularly in the light of the pending early redundancies. However, I hope he will agree with me that there was no other way for the Government to proceed but upon objective criteria, impartially applied, and paying due cognisance to the core factor, which was the absolute level of unemployment and the level of long-term unemployment. On that basis, and on the travel-to-work-area basis, unfortunately — or perhaps one should say fortunately — Stoke was not sufficiently disadvantaged to qualify.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Will my hon. Friend accept that the west midlands welcomes the modest change in regional aid in our area, but could he help us about what the effect will be upon BL, a company which is owned in the majority by the taxpayer? Although in the past BL needed aid to save it from bankruptcy, it has now become a successful company. Are the Government, as the major shareholder, willing to invest further in its success so as to secure the jobs that are most desperately needed by the motor industry and the west midlands.

Mr. Butcher: My hon. Friend referred to the new changes as modest, but I am bound to say that industrialists in the Birmingham area do not see it in that light. I would cite as evidence the fact that 2,000 companies have already made inquiries about the workings of the system, of which 10 are from the inner city area of Birmingham, with which I know my hon. Friend has some preoccupation. As for BL, we look at its applications for various forms of assistance on their merits, but at the moment there is no application, either formal or informal, before us. We are also anxious to continue the support that we give to the BL component suppliers, which BL regards as a very important part of the industry.

Mr. Wilson: On top of the Government's recent discriminatory refusal to give to Scottish old-age pensioners the heating allowances that they are dishing out in the south of England and in the midlands, does the hon. Gentleman not understand that in Scotland we feel that we are also being discriminated against on industrial aid——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I find it difficult to relate the hon. Member's question to regional aid.

Mr. Wilson: I did, Mr. Speaker, refer to industrial aid. What proposals do the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. Friend have for restoring to the Scottish economy the £100 million that they have embezzled from it?

Mr. Butcher: I find that a most incredible assertion. Scotland has received significant aid,, from this Administration and from many other Administrations during the last two or three decades. Not only has Scotland received significant aid, but the Scots were not discriminated against during the last evaluation of assisted area status. Scotland has been subjected to exactly the same criteria as the rest of the country.

Small Firms Service

17. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many inquiries the small firms service answered during 1984.

Mr. Trippier: During 1984 the small firms service dealt with 279,201 inquiries in Great Britain.

Mr. Smith: Is this not a most encouraging figure? Does it not demonstrate quite clearly the resurgence of interest in the starting up of new businesses? Is my hon. Friend satisfied with the quality of the advice that is being given as well as with the quantity?

Mr. Trippier: I agree with my hon. Friend that the figure is encouraging. For counselling cases it seems to improve year on year. I am very proud of the small firms service. Nevertheless, it should be reviewed. I am concentrating upon a review of that service right now.

GATT

18. Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether Her Majesty's Government favour a new round of negotiations on the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

Mr. Channon: Yes, provided the preparatory discussions show good prospects of success.

Mr. Carlisle: When are these talks likely to take place? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the United Kingdom depends very heavily upon trade and that we must aim further to reduce barriers? Therefore, when these talks take place will my right hon. Friend insist that those countries to which we experience difficulty in exporting freely, such as Spain and Japan, significantly reduce their trade barriers?

Mr. Channon: It would be a prime aim during the talks and in other fora to ensure a genuine opening-up of the Japanese market. With Spain coming into the European Community, there will be free trade between Spain and the rest of the Community in a comparatively short time. No one can yet tell whether there will be a round of talks on the GATT, but I think that there will preliminary talks this year and every likelihood of substantive talks towards the end of the year.

Cheese (Exports)

19. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total volume of cheese exported from the United Kingdom in 1984.

Mr. Channon: Thirty-two thousand tonnes of cheese and curd were exported in 1984.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Minister aware that producers in my constituency have been advised that they should expect a cut in the exports of cheese to markets such as Japan, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela and the Caribbean? Are the Government taking any steps to impose such an artificial restriction? If so, what is the reason for that?

Mr. Channon: Some of those points are probably matters for my right hon. Friends the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for Wales. I know of no plans deliberately to limit exports. We export a great deal of cheese, not only to the countries mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, but to Algeria. A great deal of Cheddar cheese is exported all over the world.

Foreign Affairs Council

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): With permission, Mr. Speaker I should like to make a statement about the Foreign Affairs Council that met in Brussels on 28 and 29 January 1985. I represented the United Kingdom. Ministerial conferences with Spain and Portugal were held within the margins of the Council.

Ministers discussed outstanding points in the negotiations with both Spain and Portugal on agriculture, fisheries and social affairs. We remain determined to conclude the negotiations to allow the date of 1 January 1986 for Spanish and Portuguese accession to be met.

The Council discussed the financing of the 1985 budget and the text of the new own-resources decision. More detailed work will now be done. The Council will return to this subject in February.

The Council considered the new Canadian restrictions on Community beef exports. I urged others to work for a satisfactory negotiated outcome.

Ministers of the Ten, in political co-operation, issued a short statement regretting the failure of the New York high-level meeting on Cyprus and calling for the resumption of negotiations. Copies of the statement have been deposited in the Library of the House.

At an intergovernmental conference in the margins of the Council, Foreign Ministers appointed the Vice-Presidents of the new Commission.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I thank the Foreign Secretary for making his statement so generously. It is important that the House has the chance to seek information on progress or, equally important, lack of progress made in these crucial meetings—all the more so since it seems that the failure of the Council means that the Community is yet again steering complacently towards paralysis.

Is it not true that the failure to make progress at the Foreign Affairs Council seriously endangers any chance of resolving the chronic and almost perpetual calendar of EEC financial crises? No progress was made on a new budget to replace the one rejected by the European Parliament; no progress is being made to resolve demands on the integrated Mediterranean programmes, which threatens a Greek veto on Spanish and Portuguese accession; no progress was made on the accession negotiations themselves, which must be completed urgently if they are to be ratified in 10 countries on time; as a consequence, no progress can be made on increasing own resources, which will be necessary to pay the Prime Minister's much trumpeted rebate.

Is not this sad and sorry mess proof positive of the emptiness of the fine words at Fontainebleau? Will the Foreign Secretary tell the House whether the new budget Commissioner, Henning Christopherson, did warn Foreign Ministers yesterday that agriculture expenditure will exceed income by over £1 billion—nearly 2 billion ecus? If so, precisely where will Britain's rebate now come from? Secondly, will the Foreign Secretary consider reducing our monthly payments to the EEC by one twelfth of our expected rebate, in the light of the accounting nightmare that is yet to come? Thirdly, when does the Foreign Secretary expect ratification of Spanish and Portuguese accession to be before this Parliament?

Will the Foreign Secretary give the elusive guarantee that the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office failed to give during last week's debate, that no more special payments will be demanded of this House this year to fund the endemic inability of the Community to control farm spending?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I must begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) on his accession to the position of principal spokesman on European Community affairs on the Opposition Front Bench. I encourage him to avoid the somewhat histrionic attempt at dramatisation which characterised his intervention this afternoon.

There was a routine meeting yesterday at which discussion took place on all the matters that I have identified. The suggestion that we are steering complacently towards paralysis, and all other fanciful language of that sort, is beside the point and remote from the truth. We discussed the matters that I have identified. We do not accept the warning of the new vice-president in charge of the budget of an overrun of the estimated expenditure on agriculture. We were not given any justification for the figures yesterday, and we shall want to challenge them and examine them most closely. It is worth reminding the hon. Gentleman that in 1984 the original Commission figure of 2·3 billion ecu was in the end reduced to 1 billion ecu.

It is universally acknowledged that provision must be made by the conclusion of discussions for the United Kingdom abatement to be made on the revenue side in accordance with the Fontainebleau conclusions.

As I said in my statement, we expect the accession and enlargement negotiations to be completed to enable ratification of enlargement to be presented and to take place on 1 January 1986.

As for any other matters being brought before the House, the object of the exercise is to secure a conclusion that will cover the overrun already established in the 1985 budget and to secure implementation of the Fontainebleau summit agreement on our own resources.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, no matter how desirable he may consider the political aims of enlargement, there is nothing particularly magical about January 1986 and that it is much more important to get the negotiations correct than to conclude them early and on the wrong terms? The overriding importance is to get the negotiations right in terms of United Kingdom interests and those of existing Community members rather than to let in two new members on the wrong terms.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with the importance of the objectives that my hon. Friend has described. It is important also to seek to achieve them in accordance with the foreshadowed timetable. We shall seek to achieve both.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Although the Foreign Secretary has spoken of a routine meeting, are we being led to believe that, with the unprecedented instability of oil prices and exchange markets, the Council did not discuss, at least on the margin, the problems that this presents to the Community of 10? What was the right hon. and learned Gentleman's attitude in any such discussion, especially as we are now producing 2·5 million barrels a day while Saudi Arabian production is down to 3·5 million barrels? The United Kingdom is therefore a significant factor in oil prices. Was the question of British membership of the exchange rate part of the EMS discussed, and, if not, why not?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Neither of those questions was raised. It was a meeting neither of the Energy Council nor of the Finance Ministers' Council. We were addressing ourselves to the agenda before us.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Surely my right hon. and learned Friend is seized of the importance of not entering into a new and heavy financial commitment until he knows that the EEC is in a position to meet its existing financial commitments as well as the additional ones. Must this not control any putative date of enlarging the EEC if it cannot meet its existing financial commitments with its existing resources? Until that conundrum is resolved, how can we contemplate increasing the liabilities of the EEC?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is precisely why all these issues are being addressed together. We are covering the 1985 budget overrun, the completion of the enlargement negotiations and the establishment of the own resources position. These issues were discussed yesterday.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Did the Foreign Affairs Council discuss, or does it intend discussing, the question of having some celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the victory over Nazism and the liberation of Europe from Nazi tyranny? Is it intended to make a protest to the Austrian authorities over the way in which a senior Austrian Minister went out of his way personally to welcome back a notorious Nazi mass murderer who had just been released by the Italian authorities?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I understand why the hon. Gentleman has some interest in that topic, but it was not one to which the Community addressed itself yesterday. Nor would it have been appropriate to have done so, it being a matter arising within the Government of a state which is not a member of the Community. The question of the commemoration of the conclusion of hostilities in Europe is being considered substantially as a matter for national Governments.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): In view of the proper concern that is being expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House about the financial cost of the entry of Spain and Portugal to the Community, is it not more than ever essential to emphasise the paramount political importance of ensuring that those two countries, recently returned to democratic Government, are firmly anchored in the Western community?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Did the Foreign Affairs Council consider the important problem of famine in the sub-Sahara? If so, was it recalled that in September there was a promise that 250,000 tonnes of grain would be delivered, as against the reality of 13,000 tonnes delivered, despite the fact that the grain mountains are still growing?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That was not discussed yesterday — [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] — because the Community's conclusions about the supply of grain to meet the needs identified by the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) were agreed at the Dublin summit, on a commitment to supply 1·2 million tonnes of grain, and the substantial food aid commitments made by the Community in November are being delivered now.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwickshire and Leamington): My right hon. and learned Friend mentioned the vexed question of Cyprus. Will he encourage his European colleagues to put some moral pressure on the Greek Cypriots to negotiate more meaningfully with the Turkish Cypriots to try to reach a reasonable conclusion?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: In the course of the discussions yesterday, and in the course of the discussions I had last week with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, we made clear our expectation and hope that both sides would continue to negotiate with the utmost seriousness in the context of the initiative taken by the Secretary-General.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Was there a report before the Council of those states which had ratified the intergovernmental agreement which raised a loan for the EEC's 1984 budget? In the opinion of the Council, what article of the Treaty of Rome authorises the EEC to spend over its own resources, for 1984 or in any subsequent year when it needs to do so?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There was no discussion of that subject in the Foreign Affairs Council yesterday. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the intergovernmental agreement has been before this House in relation to the position that arose last year.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I welcome the prospect of Spain and Portugal becoming full members of the Community. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree, however, that the administrative costs of the EEC are increasing at a colossal rate? Is he aware that the expenditure by the intervention board for agricultural produce last year was more than £1,300 million? Does he and his colleagues have any plans to change the system, for better or for worse?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is important that every effort is made to reduce and control those costs, and that will, no doubt, be a question to which the new Commission will be addressing itself.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that many hon. Members believe that these meetings are extremely valuable and take great pleasure in the knowledge that the accession talks are going well? How long will the transition arrangements last for the fishing agreement in respect of Spain?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks about the value of these meetings. It is important to understand that, although they do not give rise to high drama, they are important. The discussion yesterday enabled substantial advantages to be made in securing agreement on all these questions.

As for the fisheries regime for Spain, the main issues are still under negotiation, and that concerns the length of the transition arrangement and its possible extension, in the event of no agreement being reached in the original period.

Mr. Norman Atkinson (Tottenham): On the breakdown of the talks on Cyprus, how on earth can the Foreign Secretary or Mr. Pérez de Cuellar expect progress to be made if Mr. Denktash, the Turkish Cypriot representative, under instructions from General Evren of the Turkish Government, was not allowed to discuss the following issues: first, the withdrawal of Turkish troops from Cyprus; secondly, the free movement of Turkish Cypriots and Greek Cypriots; and, thirdly, the unification of a single currency? In those circumstances, will the Foreign Secretary make further representations to the Turkish Government to ensure that next time they meet there is an open agenda on the table allowing full discussion of those items?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly entitled to offer the House his view of the present state of the negotiations. His view contrasts with that offered by my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith). Both sides need to be urged to make every effort to bridge the gap between them. Before the last round of talks, the Secretary-General made an assessment that the gap between them had never been so narrow. I know that the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Atkinson) attaches importance to closing the gap. I assure him that we shall continue to give every support and encouragement to the parties concerned, the other countries interested and the Secretary-General. I should not like to express a judgment about the two views that have been offered on both sides of the House.

Mr. Anthony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will my right hon. and learned Friend explain to a puzzled public why when we joined the Community we had to pay through the nose for the privilege, whereas when the Spanish and Portuguese seek to join the Community the Community has to pay through the nose for the privilege?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: At the time we joined the Community we were subject to a substantial transitional period which was designed to meet our particular circumstances. There will be negotiations about the transitional arrangements for the two new countries applying for membership. The negotiations must take account of the relative poverty of those countries.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): When the Foreign Secretary last reported what happened at a Foreign Affairs Council he claimed that arrangements had been made to ensure that, when Spain and Portugal joined the Common Market, an olive oil lake would not be created. The right hon. and learned Gentleman also gave assurances at that time that action would be taken to reduce the beef and butter mountains and the wine lake. Although I have recently enjoyed cheap butter from the EEC, I point out that the butter mountain has not been reduced significantly and the wine lake is still growing. How confident can we be that an olive oil lake will not be created when Spain and Portugal join the Common Market? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman assure the House that if there is an olive oil lake it will not be mixed in with the wine lake?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman is entirely correct to draw attention to the importance of maintaining strict discipline in the control of agricultural policy. For that reason, we are insisting upon a tight price regime for decisions in accordance with the financial guidelines that have been adopted and for the effective application of guaranteed thresholds to the commodities already covered by them. It is important that that regime should apply to olive oil as to other products.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Although many of us welcome the accession date and hope that this time it will be adhered to, will the Foreign Secretary explain the budgetary arrangements for Portugal, which is one of the poorest countries? The Treaty of Rome mentions the need to reduce the gap between the rich and the poor. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman assure us that Portugal will not be a net contributor and that the accession arrangements affecting the budget are satisfactory?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Lady is correct in drawing attention to that matter as being important to Portugal. In that context I drew attention yesterday to the need for the Commission to bring forward proposals to deal with the own resources chapter of the enlargement negotiations.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that my political friends in Portugal were very disappointed when the 1984 date for entry was not achieved and that, after 50 years of brutal dictatorship, they are anxious to join the Common Market and will be extremely distressed if the January 1986 date is not achieved? I welcome the Foreign Secretary's determination, but what are the specific issues involved and which countries are likely to cause a hold-up at this stage?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Questions of some difficulty still remain, especially in relation to fisheries and some parts of the agriculture dossier. Establishing a fair balance of interests within the Community and with the applicant countries is bound to take some time, but I recognise the importance of what the hon. Gentleman says about Portugal's view of accession to the community.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): At a time of great and mounting crisis within the Community, the Foreign Secretary has given a picture of two days of total inaction. Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) has said, we consider it a disgrace that there was no discussion about aid to Ethiopia. The reality is quite different from the picture drawn by the Foreign Secretary. A written reply that I have received revealed that only 13,000 tonnes of grain have arrived in sub-Saharan Africa, whereas 1·2 million tonnes had been promised and there are now 12 million tonnes in store.

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman admit that time is running out for a decision on the accession of Spain and Portugal and the consequent decision about increasing VAT and own resources, both of which have to be ratified independently by the 10 sovereign Parliaments, and the delay to which jeopardises our abatement? What contingency plans does the right hon. and learned Gentleman have for dealing with that?

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman admit that the Government's policy on Europe now appears to be as big a shambles as their economic policy?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I caution the hon. Gentleman against over-excitement about the alleged mounting crisis that he perceives. The Community is addressing itself to the business of completing the necessary instruments to cover the overrun on the budget this year, to provide for the own resources decision that is necessary to fulfil Fontainebleau and to complete the enlargement negotiations.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we must not allow time to run out. We are pressing ahead with the urgency that I consider necessary. The hon. Gentleman must not believe that, because I do not report to the House each month a series of either conflicts or dramatic conclusions, no progress is being made. Progress was made on the matters discussed yesterday, and that is a good thing.

Early-Day Motions

3.54 pm

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that this morning you were personally involved in refusing an early-day motion that I wished to table. The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) has today tabled an early-day motion condemning the University of Oxford for not giving an award to the Prime Minister. My early-day motion would have pointed out that Droylesden Littlemoss boys' county secondary modern school has not recognised its own favourite and most distinguished son, my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts).

Is it a sign of the class nature of the present Parliament that it is in order to table an early-day motion about the University of Oxford, but not in order to table an early-day motion about a secondary modern school? If you have turned down my request, Mr. Speaker, would you reconsider that decision? Many Labour Members who attended secondary modern schools find it offensive that those schools are not recognised in the same way as the University of Oxford.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was deeply honoured when my colleagues came to me and suggested that my secondary modern school should be honouring me as it is suggested that the Prime Minister should be honoured by Oxford and Cambridge. It is suggested that the failure to honour me was a slight and it now appears that, as the early-day motion has been refused, there is an insult to my school as well. It gave me a good education—far better than the type of class education that is given at Oxford and Cambridge.

I am worried because the Clerk told me that the early-day motion would not be allowed because it was designed to annoy. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that any early-day motion that suggests that there is something wonderful about honorary degrees from Oxford and Cambridge when there are no honours from Droylesden Littlemoss boys' county secondary modern school, which educated me, is not designed to annoy anyone except me, because that school gave me a very good education. I therefore hope that you will allow the early-day motion.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. While you are ruling on the point of order raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) and for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), will you say whether it is in order to table a motion congratulating Oxford university on showing such good sense and making a decision that will be welcomed by most people?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member's point is a hypothetical question at the moment.

As for the first point of order, if the hon. Members for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) and for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) study "Erskine May", as I am sure they do, they will find that on page 382 it states clearly that an early-day motion of this type has been turned down by my predecessors because it is "tendered in a spirit of mockery".

Mr. Boyes rose——

Mr. Allan Roberts rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have ruled, and in accordance with precedent. There is nothing more to be said.

Mr. Boyes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it a new point of order?

Mr. Boyes: Yes. I now have to clear my own name. I study "Erskine May" every night before I go to sleep. There was no intention of directing mockery towards the Prime Minister but rather a desire to recognise the role of secondary modern schools. Would it be possible to have an audience of you, Mr. Speaker, to see whether there is any way around "Erskine May"?

Mr. Speaker: It would be a pleasure.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether, in the discussions, we could take account of how many Clerks and Officers of the House went to Oxford and Cambridge.

Mr. Speaker: I should be very happy if the hon. Member for Bootle joined the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington.

Pensioners' Right to Fuel and Communications

3.57 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to abolish standing charges for gas, electricity and water and to abolish rental charges for telephones and television licences for pensioners.

Several Bills on this subject have been introduced previously, but we are now in the midst of a severe winter during which many pensioners are not eating properly, are going to bed early and are suffering badly from hypothermia because they cannot afford to pay heating bills and therefore keep themselves warm and in health.

I present the Bill with a sense of urgency and hope that the House will take serious note of it. I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House have been asked during election campaigns whether they support the principle of standing charges being applied to pensioners and have answered that they do not.

The House should be aware that pensioners are treated badly. I should be happy if the Government presented proposals for a serious and real increase in the old-age pension. The real problem for pensioners is poverty. Although my Bill would help to alleviate that poverty, the real problem is the low level of the state pension. Many pensioners organisations are fed up with the patronising attitude of political leaders and newspapers at festive times, especially as they are forgotten for the rest of the year. I hope that the Bill will be widely supported.

I propose the abolition of standing charges for gas and electricity for pensioners, and that there should not be an immediate increase in the unit cost of gas and electricity. The cost of abolition, which was estimated at £300 million in a recent parliamentary answer to me from the Department of Energy, should be borne by the Government only, so that the real cost of gas and electricity will be lower for pensioners than for other people.

At present a rebate scheme on standing charges is in operation. If a standing charge is less than half the total bill for gas or electricity, it is reduced accordingly. Surely that shows acceptance of the principle that the standing charge is wrong because it is a tax on those who consume least. An example of how the rebate principle does not help pensioners is the fact that more than half the people who benefit from it are not old-age pensioners, nor necessarily small consumers, but owners of second homes who leave the heating on to prevent their second homes from freezing up in winter. As the Government accepts the principle of the rebate scheme, they must accept the principle that standing charges are fundamentally wrong.

In 1976, in a report on the issue of standing charges, the Department of Energy said:

"We are satisfied that there is a sound case in economic principle for a tariff structure under which standing charges are maintained separate from the unit consumption charge."

I do not understand what the Department means by that, but I know that there is no social case for it. It is a penalty on the poorest people to continue making standing charges on them.

After I tabled a similar Bill in July 1984, I received a great deal of correspondence from pensioners' groups throughout the country and from some fuel boards which were interested in the thinking behind the proposals. They said that we had exaggerated the position, but I am not sure that we have. Since last July the standing charge on gas credit consumers has been £9·90. Information available as of that date shows that the average standing charge for an average household has been 0·54 per cent. of its total income, and that for a single pensioner it has been 2·24 per cent. In other words, it costs pensioners 4·5 times as much as anyone else. At that time the pension was £34·05, which meant that pensioners were paying 76p a week in gas standing charges alone. A reduction of 76p a week from the gas bill would help many pensioners. The same applies to electricity and other bills. The water standing charge, which should also be abolished, operates on the same principle.

I include in the Bill the abolition of the television licence fee for pensioners. A television is a basic and necessary form of communication for many people, especially single elderly people. We live in a highly mobile society. In my constituency and many others, many elderly people have no young relatives living near them. Often the young relatives have gone to live in the new town areas. That adds to pensioners' sense of isolation. A television licence fee of £46 is a monstrous charge on pensioners for their basic form of communication. It is not a luxury. The abolition of that fee for pensioners is a small price to pay to help them.

The same applies to telephone rentals for the elderly. Telephones are a basic necessity for many elderly people. The Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 recognises that principle. Some chronically sick, elderly people can get telephones, but only with great difficulty. Under the Government's rate-capping proposals many local authorities will no longer be able to meet that need. Although many people are not chronically sick within the exact terms of the Act, they desperately need and rely on a telephone. They tend to be small users, and use it when they are in trouble to call friends, neighbours or the emergency services, or to receive calls from relatives who live far away. Often the rental for the phone is the major part of the Bill, and in some cases it is virtually the entire bill.

With this Bill I am asking the House to take note of the tremendous poverty among elderly people. If the Government are prepared, as they apparently are, to spend £5·2 billion of public money to break the miners' strike, why do they not spend the same sum on making real improvements to the living standards of our poorest elderly people? The Government should seek to do that, rather than take £1 from the heating allowance of elderly people as they did in November.

They are many dreadful stories about pensioners who have been extremely badly treated by the fuel boards, and who have been threatened with disconnection or been disconnected because they could not pay their bills. The Citizens Advice Bureaux in London produced a report entitled, "Cold Comfort For The Poor." One of the examples that it gives is as follows:

"Pensioner (73 years) receiving retirement pension and occupational pension. In debt to both LEB and NTG. Gas bill of £96 on which the CAB is trying to negotiate fuel direct, which is finally refused since the client is ineligible for supplementary benefit due to income. By this time the debt is £208. Client offers £10 per week, NTG demand £96 (the amount brought forward) before they will accept weekly amount. Client cannot afford this. LEB bill of £66—negotiated with Board to pay off £3 per week. Gas disconnected."

Imagine what that pensioner is going through without gas for cooking or heating during these cold winter nights. That is the kind of poverty that we face.

There is a great deal of misunderstanding about whether special help is available for pensioners. There is not. A large number of charities do their best to help, but a pensioner is not eligible for special help unless he is eligible for supplementary benefit, as is the case with everyone else. Pensioners need warmer rooms than the rest of us, and warm food. They are in their homes for longer than the rest of us and tend not to go out, especially during the winter. Therefore, their fuel bills are of major concern to them, as is the payment of their telephone bills and the television licence fee.

I hope that my Bill will help those people. While disconnections of gas and electricity supplies continue this winter, and while old people are frightened to turn on the gas fire, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that 84 per cent. of disconnections——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has now spoken for 10 minutes.

Mr. Corbyn: I shall be brief, Mr. Speaker. Eighty-four per cent. of people about to be disconnected draw state benefits, 80 per cent. receive less than £70 a week, and 60 per cent. have debts in addition to fuel debts. The matter is serious and urgent. The Bill will help elderly people to achieve decency in retirement. The House should recognise that need immediately and support the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Ms. Jo Richardson, Mr. Tony Benn, Mr. Chris Smith, Mr. Harry Cohen, Mr. David Winnick, Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Robert N. Wareing, Mr. Dennis Skinner, Mr. Frank Dobson, Mr. Ron Davies and Mr. Tom Clarke.

PENSIONERS' RIGHT TO FUEL AND COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn accordingly presented a Bill to bring in a Bill to abolish standing charges for gas, electricity and water and to abolish rental charges for telephones and television licences for pensioners: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 22 February and to be printed. [Bill 67.]

Airports Inquiries 1981-1983 (Inspector's Report)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Major.]

Mr. Speaker: Before we start on this important debate, may I tell the House that so far I have had applications by letter from no fewer than 44 right hon. and hon. Members. I propose to adopt the 10-minute limit on speeches between 7 o'clock and 8.50 pm, but I hope that in view of the large number of hon. Members who wish to take part in the debate all speeches will be reasonably brief, please.

4.9 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): In opening this debate we are honouring the commitment that we gave during the Second Reading of the Civil Aviation Bill that the House would have an opportunity to express its views on airports policy in the light of the inspector's report on the Stansted and Heathrow terminal 5 public inquiries before final decisions were reached.

I shall say a few words on the history of the matter and then on the procedures that we intend to follow.

Airports policy has exercised the minds of all Administrations, of whatever political persuasion, over a number of years. I shall not go back further into history than 1975-76, when the foundations of current airports policy were laid.

Following the decision to abandon the Maplin project, the then Labour Government published, in November 1975, part 1 of the "Airport Strategy for Great Britain", as a basis for further consultation. This set out a strategy for accommodating air traffic demand in the London area for the 1980s and identified several options to handle further growth in traffic in the longer term. Those included a fifth terminal at Heathrow, a second terminal at Gatwick, expansion of Stansted to a capacity of 16 million passengers per annum and further development at Luton.

In June 1976 the Government published the second part of that strategy, which dealt with the regional airports. This considered the way in which regional airports might be developed in the future and the possibilities of diverting traffic away from London to the regions. After extensive consultations on the basis of those documents, the then Labour Government announced their decisions in the airports policy White Paper in 1978.

Let me paraphrase the conclusions that were reached in that White Paper. It said that there was no case, in transport terms, for diverting traffic which had origins and destinations in the south-east to regional airports, and no case for the damage to the air transport industry which a policy of forced diversion would cause; that although some switch in traffic to the regions would occur naturally, this would not avoid the need for additional capacity in the south-east after 1990; that up to 1990, the growth in demand in the south-east should be accommodated by the provision of a fourth terminal at Heathrow, a second terminal at Gatwick, and the development of capacity at Luton and Stansted up to 5 million and 4 million passengers a year respectively; and that the Government would consider how demand might best be met beyond 1990. The possible solutions might be a major expansion at Stansted, the development of an existing military airfield as a civil airport, or the construction of a new airport.

Following the White Paper, the then Secretary of State for Trade announced, in August 1978, the establishment of an Advisory Committee on Airports Policy and a Study Group on South-East Airports, in which the main interests concerned were represented. Their immediate task was to give detailed consideration to the options for accommodating air transport demand in the London area in the longer term.

When the Government took office in 1979, those two committees were part way through their work and we therefore awaited their reports before making any decisions on airports policy. The reports were published in December 1979 and their conclusions, which were broadly the same as those expressed in the 1978 White Paper, were accepted—that the development of regional airports could not obviate the need to meet demand in the south-east and that in the light of the forecasts then available further airports capacity would be needed in the south-east before 1990.

In line with this assessment, the then Secretary of State for Trade, Sir John Nott, as he later became, while giving the Government's support to the fullest possible use of regional airports, announced that the British Airports Authority would be invited to bring forward proposals for the development of Stansted to meet the expected growth in demand in the south-east; and that because this raised issues of considerable national and local importance, the proposals and the wider social and environmental implications would be thoroughly examined by means of a public inquiry. In accordance with this undertaking, the airports inquiries were opened in 1981 and ran through until well into 1983.

By any standards, the inspector's report is a colossal piece of work. In 1980 the then Secretary of State for Trade, Sir John Nott, said:

> "We intend the public inquiry to be wide-ranging and to give objectors an opportunity not only to expand on their objections to the Stansted proposal but also to question the need for a major airport expansion anywhere and to put forward alternative sites." —[Official Report, 21 February 1980; Vol. 979, c. 701.]

No one could doubt that that remit has been fulfilled. The inquiries lasted for 258 days, brought forth around 4,000 written representations, and took oral evidence from some 250 witnesses. It is appropriate at this point for me to record my thanks and those of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to the inspector, Mr. Graham Eyre, Q.C. and his two assessors, for the conscientious and efficient way in which they tackled and discharged their formidable task.

However, before Ministers now is the equally formidable—some would say more formidable—task of reaching decisions on the 20 formal recommendations made by the inspector. I am sure that I need not summarise the terms of the inspector's recommendations. I am sure also that the House, like my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and myself, will have read every word carefully over the Christmas recess.

The issues before us are complex. Hon. Members have read the inspector's report and the reasons which led to those recommendations. Therefore, I hope that this debate will provide the opportunity for hon. Members to express their views on all these issues.

On the procedural side, the debate is taking place on the Adjournment. I should say why, and also amplify what my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said on Thursday about the future parliamentary handling of this matter.

Normally, the inspector's report is published at the same time as the decision is issued. Although this is not the first time that there has been a debate in the House on a planning application before that application was determined, the holding of a debate in these particular circumstances presents certain difficulties.

Parliament has laid down in the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 a system for determining planning applications by the local planning authorities, and, in the event of an appeal or a calling-in of the application, by the Secretary of State. Members of the public have an opportunity to make objections, or other representations, to the local planning authority or to the Secretary of State, as the case may be. If the case comes before the Secretary of State, a public inquiry may be held.

There is no provision in the planning Acts for Parliament to play any role in determining planning appeals or called-in applications. The duty of making a decision in such cases has been placed, by Parliament, by the Act, on the Secretary of State, and he must, in discharging his duty, base his decision on the evidence before him, taking account of Government policy.

By holding a debate on a substantive motion and voting on it, the House could be held to be seriously prejudicing the proper exercise of our quasi-judicial function of determining the applications. While my right hon. Friend and I have the applications before us for decision we are unable to express any views on the issues covered in the inspector's report. To do so could prejudice our consideration of it. I know that the House understands and accepts that.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead) rose——

Mr. Ridley: In view of the extreme delicacy of my position in relation to not prejudicing that position, it would be better if I were not to respond to interventions. I know my hon. Friend will agree that on every other occasion I have always, I hope, been courteous to hon. Members who wish to intervene.

That would also mean that Ministers may not be able to vote—so as not to prejudice the decisions that my right hon. Friend and I will have to take—depriving about one sixth of the members of this House of the right to express their opinions.

Secondly, we have to consider what would be the effect of a vote on a substantive motion. Let us suppose that the House voted to reject the inspector's recommendations. If Ministers decided then to accept the recommendations, they would be disregarding the will of the House. But if they rejected the recommendations simply because that was the will of the House, rather than on the merits of the case, they would lay themselves open to challenge in the High Court. The parties affected, which could be numerous, could justly complain that the decisions were based on considerations extraneous to the inspector's report and that the whole painstaking process of public inquiry would be devalued.

I think the House will agree that the problem should be resolved as soon as possible, and that, consistent with proper consideration, is the Government's intention. Whatever hon. Members may think about the matters before us, I doubt whether they want to subject the whole process to a further period of delay and uncertainty. There has been uncertainty about a third London airport for over 20 years. This uncertainty has borne not only on the people of Stansted, but on those living near Heathrow, Gatwick, and other sites which have been proposed in south-east England and beyond. There has been uncertainty also for the aviation industry and those employed in it. To prolong this uncertainty will not make the problem go away. It would merely mean that we would have to return to it at a later date.

That is why this debate is taking place on an Adjournment motion. Indeed, there is no other way to proceed if hon. Members are to express their views and if Ministers are to discharge their responsibilities—unless, of course, the House simply wants no decisions to be taken and the whole matter left in limbo for a further indefinite period. This is not to say that I am not acutely aware of the enormous political interest which this subject has aroused—how could I think otherwise? But I suggest that the only way in which that great interest can be properly combined with the requirements of planning legislation is for the House to debate the issue, for Ministers to listen intently, and for no substantive votes to take place—to avoid prejudicing the decisions.

What I can confirm, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said on Thursday last, is that after the decisions have been taken and announced the House will be given a further opportunity to debate and, if it wishes, to vote on the Government's airports policy. What I have in mind is that the Government will publish proposals on airports policy when the decisions are taken and announced, as the inspector urged us to do. These will cover a wider canvas than the narrower one of these particular planning applications.

I should like to make it perfectly clear that we approach this debate without having reached any conclusions as to what the final decisions might be. We will listen carefully to everything that hon. Members have to say.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds) rose——

Mr. Ridley: I am sorry; I shall not give way. I did say that I feared it would be unwise for me to engage in debate on these complicated matters.

Before I leave the Floor to hon. Members, I should like to make one further point. Almost every airport policy decision in the last 40 years has been controversial. Wherever there is an airport, or the potential for an airport in this crowded island, there are people who object to its development, understandably so, and their views are of the utmost importance. But the aviation industry plays a vital role in transporting people and supports a large number of jobs of all sorts. Any responsible Government must take account of the interests of all these people. Airlines and airports exist only to serve the needs of the travelling public. Air travel is no longer for the privileged few; it is our objective to bring it within the reach of more and more people. Every Government have had to face these dilemmas and attempt to reconcile these conflicting interests. It is not an easy task. I can only say that my hon. Friend and I will do our best to get the right answer.

4.23 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Is it not truly remarkable that we are debating on a motion for the Adjournment of the House probably one of the most important decisions in relation to airports policy to be taken for the next 10 years? The Secretary of State tells us that this is because he is in rather a delicate position. During this week his delicate position seems to have taken on more and more of a close resemblance to the perils of Pauline. He seems to stagger from crisis to crisis, for most of which he is entirely responsible.

It is not true that similar debates on airport policy or on planning applications have been handled in this manner. One way the right hon. Gentleman could have dealt with any legal difficulty would have been to have given a decision and then allowed the House to have a full debate, because he would still have had the right under existing powers to call new expert evidence if he believed that something worthy and important has been brought to his attention. He could have taken account of all the views of the different sections of the House of Commons.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Will the hon. Lady admit that because it has been done in this way we shall get two bites at the cherry? If the Government had done as she has suggested—made a decision and then allowed a debate—we would have had only one bite at the cherry.

Mrs. Dunwoody: What has happened is much clearer. The Secretary of State started out trying to take a major decision by the back door. He brought in a Civil Aviation Bill, which was slung out by his colleagues. When that did not work, he decided that today we would have a debate on a Whip. When it became painfully clear that even his well-disciplined troops would not fall for that load of nonsense, he gradually reduced the Whip until suddenly, rather like the Cheshire cat, not only has the Whip disappeared but the payroll vote has disappeared as well. The payroll vote, which can normally be relied upon to troop through the Lobby, has been told that the Secretary of State is now in such disarray that the only thing he can possibly do to cover his own discomfiture is to suggest that we should have a vote on the Adjournment of the House.

We are all well aware that the Stansted report has far-reaching implications for the whole of our airports policy. We have had a week of leaks, a sort of, "Will they, won't they?" We are now told that we have had to proceed in this manner because there might be legal complications. The Secretary of State should have thought of that before he sought to push through the ceiling on Heathrow and take decisions that would pre-empt the decision that the inspector asked for in a carefully researched report. Today, we are being asked to decide on one area and to make policy in effect in a vacuum.

The report made clear that the inspector was anxious to give an overall picture of airports policy, but he could not. He made great efforts to run the widest possible survey before reaching a conclusion, but the nature of that system produced two main flaws. First, the inspector could not consider issues that were not brought to him for consideration. He actually mentioned the expansion of Gatwick, but there was no deep examination of the implications. The logic of the Government's desire for two equal and competing airlines is that they should operate from equal airports. Under those circumstances, Gatwick would have a second runway. That would mean destroying the village of Charlwood. The Government tell us frequently that we should face up to taking hard decisions. Why are we not being asked to push ahead in that manner? Could it be that all the voters in Charlwood are Conservatives?

That leads to the second flaw. Airport policy is being considered but there has been no debate on airline policy. The computer models have included such assumptions but that is not the same as a discussion of the problems in depth.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): The Government have not seen fit to proceed with a second runway at Gatwick because they have an agreement with West Sussex county council forbidding them to do so.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am well aware of that. The Secretary of State seems to think that he can take a salami approach to airports policy — putting a ceiling on Heathrow, ignoring the views of people living in that area, and simply pursuing his own interest in relation to one specific airport in the south-east.

There has been no discussion of the public expenditure implications or of the needs of regional airports, and precious little explanation of why the Minister is pushing ahead in this way. We all know why the debate is on the Adjournment. It is because the Government could not have faced the result if there had been a motion that could be amended and voted on in the proper way.

We need to consider what type of airline structure we want in this country. Should domestic companies such as British Midland be encouraged to limit themselves to being feeder services for B-Cal and British Airways or should they start their own international flights? Should there be one major flag carrier airline or two? Those questions lead not just to major decisions about airports but to major implications for licensing policy. It is crucial to decide which companies should use Stansted, if we want Stansted at all, and the type of service to be provided. Is tourism to take the lead from business travel or are we to have three major airports in the south-east warring for existing business, which will involve considerable interlining problems and serious implications for regional airports?

Since the last war, international business and international airline growth have been closely related. Do the Government expect that trend to change? If so, a more decentralised system of airports, extending regional airports and using them specifically as hub airlines not only makes sense but would produce positive dividends. The Government are using this inquiry to decide airline policy in general without proper consideration of all the airports. There is no consideration of Gatwick or the effect on Scottish airports and on major airports such as Manchester, which could develop, not just as a massive and useful international service, but act as a hub in relation to other regional airlines.

There was no comment from the Secretary of State about the investment implications. We should be considering the implications of Stansted for British airports finance. The British Airports Authority figure for capital needs this year is set at £150 million. In April, that will fall to £117 million. It will then be £139 million for 1986-87 and 1987-88. The external finance limit is also to fall in 1985-86. Those reductions are to take place at a time when Stansted is presumably to be built at a cost of more than £400 million. More than 75 per cent. of all investment will be at Gatwick, Heathrow and Stansted. What will be the effect of that on Scottish airports? Prestwick is under threat and a report is imminent with major implications for Scotland. It seems inevitable that landing charges will have to be raised in other southern airports to cover the investment involved, although many airlines are complaining that landing charges are far too high already.

We should also consider the investment implications for British Rail. We have no clear idea of the cost of a British Rail link with Stansted, although those who worked on the northern airline scheme, especially in relation to the Natural Environment Research Council, claim that £166 million would be needed to build the link. At a time when investment has fallen from £522 million to £270 million in 1983-84 at constant prices, British Rail will have to find extra money not currently allowed for. If the Government are serious about this, they should tell us the effect on British Rail investment, on provincial services and on important factors such as section 20 grants. Commuter services in the provinces will be under enormous threat because the Government have not taken account of the investment that British Rail will have to find.

Thirdly, and most important, the Government and especially the Secretary of State have created an atmosphere of distrust. Why has there been such virulence in the north about the suggestion that Stansted should go ahead? It is because people in the north have no faith in the Government being prepared to consider the public expenditure implications on such an enormous injection of capital into the south-east or the loss of jobs and inability to attract new industries to the regions that the development of Manchester airport could have prevented. The Government have deliberately made it clear that in their view the regions take not first, second or third place but fourth place in relation to developments in the south-east.

On 17 January 1985 the Government stopped all regional aid. That moratorium will have a direct and deleterious effect on everything that is important to the regions. Next year aid will be cut by £300 million, with a further cut of £300 million in each succeeding year. That aid is concentrated in the north and in regions outside the south-east.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: As one who rather admires Manchester airport and uses it a great deal, I am glad that British Airways is to extend its flights from that airport, but why are the landing charges there so much higher than those at other airports in this country?

Mrs. Dunwoody: As I have said, the BAA has no provision for the investment that Stansted will require. If the hon. Gentleman is worried about the charges at Manchester now, the result of the Stansted plan will be far worse. In common with many other regional airports, Manchester is capable of developments that would allow it to take a great deal more traffic, both international and domestic. Economies of scale would then make it easier for airlines using that airport to benefit from lower costs than are now possible.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): The BAA boasts about the prices charged for franchise, enabling it to keep its charges artificially low because of the large number of people going through. If the regions had the same privilege of numbers, they could lower their charges.

Mrs. Dunwoody: That is exactly the point. Those who oppose the development of regional airports, and especially Manchester, are using the argument not in relation to economies of scale but because they want even more investment in the south-east.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): Is not the hon. Lady completely ignoring the fact that the pressure for developing airports round London arises from the fact that many passengers want to use airports round London? To develop Manchester airport in response to this demand in the south-east is rather like building an extra railway line into Manchester because there is over-demand for the railway into Euston.

Will the hon. Lady answer the point made by the trade union representive, Brian Crocker:

"We are most disappointed that it now appears to be Opposition Party policy to oppose any further development of Stansted and Heathrow Airports. We feel this is both impractical and unworkable."

Mrs. Dunwoody: If the hon. Gentleman will give me two minutes to continue my speech, I shall come to those points later.

The kind of attack that the Government have mounted, particularly on regional aid, is one reason why there is such deep distrust in the north of the suggestion that the development at Stansted should go ahead. The distrust of those in the north of the Government's claim that investment in Stansted will in no way be deleterious makes it impossible for them to believe in the sincerity of the Secretary of State. To combine these two plans at the same time is a failure of leadership, which reveals the Government's desperate economic problems.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): The hon. Lady has spoken several times as though she speaks for the north of England. May I tell the hon. Lady that she does not speak for the north of England? Teesside chamber of commerce wrote to me this morning to make sure that I put my voice behind Stansted, which would be in the best interests of the north-east of England.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I hope that those views are widely known, not only to the people in the north-east, who are very close to the excellent airport system that already exists round Newcastle, but to those who will be anxious to see a development of their own regional airport traffic and who will not take kindly to that kind of remark from a Member of Parliament who represents the area.

Two types of airline will have special worries about Stansted. Will Stansted be a repository for charter and domestic airlines? I ask this advisedly. The Secretary of State, when he brought in the Civil Aviation Bill, showed that the Government's interest was in selling landing slots. Allocation to the highest bidder means that British Airways will win, as will large foreign international airlines. The small airlines might find themselves pushed out into Stansted. It is possible that they will be unable to compete with the BA domestic feeder services or the international flights from Heathrow. Equally, the charter flights—and we believe that there is a good case for the development of tourist traffic in the north of England—might find that, with the availability of Stansted, British Caledonian will fight to have them thrown out of Gatwick. This will allow British Caledonian to expand and deal with some of the problems that it already has because of the restrictions to which previous Governments have agreed.

[Mrs. Dunwoody]

It is, therefore, in line with the Government's abortive competition policy. Why is it that the Government have not made clear to the House their intentions for these two particular types of airlines?

Mr. Cecil Franks (Barrow and Furness): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I was asked to keep my speech short. It has not been easy to do so.

Mr. Franks: Will the hon. Lady take the point that many Conservative Members, including Conservative Members representing the north-west, would be prepared to take common cause with her if, instead of trying to make points against the Government, she kept her argument to the issues involved?

Mrs. Dunwoody: Let the hon. Gentleman understand that the Secretary of State has responsibility for creating an airlines and airports policy. He has signally failed to do so. He has taken it to the extent of introducing a major planning report on a motion to adjourn the House because he does not want to have the matter considered in any great detail.

It is important also to understand that the implications of Stansted involve real problems for the people living round Heathrow airport. No contribution has been made by any Conservative Member about the effect about pushing up the number of aircraft movements at Heathrow. I believe that we should be asking why, if there is to be any expansion at Stansted, the Government are insisting on such a large expansion all at once. It is obvious that in economic terms it would be possible to build a £5 million passenger terminal without any difficulty. It would be economic and would greatly reduce the guesswork that has so far been done to justify the expansion.

For example, the Stansted plan involves building a taxiway but widening it from the standard 23 m to 45 m along 2,700 m of the 3,900 m length. In other words, Stansted would gain the potential for expansion into a two-runway airport. While that is not likely in the near future, it makes it plain that the atmosphere of distrust that has greeted the plan can be justified by these facts on which the decisions are being taken. It is possible that Stansted could be expanded rapidly without a great deal of difficulty.

The Labour party does not welcome the idea that there should be a fifth terminal at Heathrow. We believe that that would take 15 years to build. It is clear that it will take at least six to eight years to move the Perry Oaks sludge works and that would therefore not solve the existing problem at Heathrow.

Heathrow is the busiest airport in the world and the residents in the area already know that to their cost. Because of the history of airport plans by various Governments and the vagueness of the forecasting—and there is considerable doubt about the processes that were used for forecasting in the report since this is not an accurate science—the residents will not feel particularly safe if the sludge works are moved but terminal 5 is not given the go-ahead. They will rightly fear that there will be yet another change at some point in the future. They will want a much clearer statement from the Secretary of State that he is aware of the environmental danger to the people living round Heathrow airport.

Once again the Heathrow expansion is beset by all the same problems that we have seen in relation to the Secretary of State's airport plan. Is the expansion to ensure that domestic airlines can stay at Heathrow or is it to let BA take over the domestic airline market as well? It is claimed in the report that only another 51,000 people will be seriously affected by terminal 5. That brings the 1995 total to 274,000 people while the Civil Aviation Authority has already said that 943,000 people were affected in 1980. The damage that is being done to save Heathrow from a problem that it will have to solve before terminal five could be built is considerable.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Can the hon. Lady clarify her remarks for the benefit of people who work at the airport—or who might wish to do so—and who are involved in civil air transport there? Is her party not committed to the fifth terminal at Heathrow for environmental and other reasons? If that is the case, she is diametrically opposed to one of the important recommendations of Mr. Eyre, QC.

Mrs. Dunwoody: It is not Labour party policy to support the building of a fifth terminal at Heathrow. We believe that people who live round that airport have rights. I am well aware that people who work in airports have the right to have their jobs protected. Expansion at Heathrow would create extra jobs. Similar expansion at Manchester would create an equal number of jobs and the opportunity for many businesses to come into the areas close to the airport. It would also allow Manchester to act as a hub airport for many other regions. I should like to know whether Conservatives are prepared to take into account the effect of job creation when considering whether we should go ahead with expanding Manchester airport.

Working in a vacuum is always bad. The Government should make all their airports plans clear in the light of an overall air industry strategy. In turning their face on forecasting methods they are incapable of providing accurate statistical information. We should understand that many of the assumptions are about as accurate as trying to manoeuvre a poker hand.

It is essential to have a proper plan from the Secretary of State that will take account not only of the effects on regional airports but of the effects on Scottish airports, Heathrow and individual airlines.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) has done nothing but harp upon Manchester airport. Clearly she has not read the Eyre report. If she had she would have noticed that specific reference is made to Manchester. Mr. Eyre says that the idea that Manchester airport is being discriminated against has reached the stage of being a phobia. He therefore investigated with particular care and came to the conclusion that there is no evidence for that contention. Has the hon. Lady any further evidence than that which Mr. Eyre considered to justify her statements today?

Mrs. Dunwoody: There is no clear evidence that the inspector was right in saying that the assumption on which the northern consortium had built its plans were incorrect. If the hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) believes that we are talking with any certainty about numbers I refer him to the section of the report on forecasts. The inspector says that by 1995 demand in the London airports could be 61 million passengers per annum, or even 89·3 million. The inspector looked carefully at the implications but he had to admit that when forecasting the size of aircraft, the noise, the number of passengers generated and where they would come from, there was considerable room for different interpretations. We do understand, however, that there is no room for doubt about what the investment will do if it all goes into the south-east of England and it is very plain that the effects of such massive investment will be very considerable on other regions.

This afternoon the Secretary of State has got himself into considerable political difficulty. He has not been prepared to come forward with a clear explanation of how he views the future of airport policy. He has not even been prepared to consider that, within a short time, another inspector's report about Prestwick and the Scottish airports will be published. He has endeavoured to stymie his colleagues, who do not wish to see any development at Stansted but who are not prepared to concern themselves about the implications for Heathrow, the regions or those airports that are important outside the London area.

The Government have gone out of their way to take decisions behind closed doors which have major implications for the future. Tonight's vote will show the heavy price that has to be paid for their dislike and fear of open government. If Government Members are really serious they will not support a Secretary of State who wishes to close all the options, with little concern for the airlines or the airports policy.

Sir Humphrey Atkins (Spelthorne): Over the years I have often been in disagreement with the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). Today is no exception. I particularly disagree with her on two matters.

The hon. Lady criticised the Government for having the debate today. It is strange that the Opposition should criticise the Government for having a debate in advance of a decision. Oppositions almost always say that there is no point in having a debate after a decision has been made because the Government do not listen but merely use their majority to push their decision through the House. Here we are, on a rare and welcome occasion, being given the opportunity to tell the Secretary of State exactly what we think and to give our views to him so that he can take them into account—I know that he will—yet the hon. Lady objects. That is strange.

The hon. Lady said that she had not heard much about the case in connection with Heathrow. Perhaps she has not heard it, but that does not mean that the case has not been made. If she missed it, she can hear it again now because I propose to talk about it. Although the case has been made, it is not as widely known as it should be.

Heathrow is in a ridiculous place. Nobody in his senses designing a capital city from scratch in a country governed by predominantly westerly airstreams would place the major airport 15 miles due west of the city centre. It means that every plane landing or taking off flies over the city centre. Any hon. Member who has had the pleasure of taking a cup of tea on the Terrace in the summer will be well accustomed to the sight of a stream of aeroplanes turning on to the flight path, apparently immediately over St. Thomas's hospital. They then travel the 15 miles to Heathrow, causing trouble and disturbance.

Thousands and thousands of aeroplanes fly over the middle of London, but — touch wood — no serious accident has occurred. That speaks highly for the pilots, engineers and flight controllers. I can remember only one accident, about 12 years ago when an aircraft fell out of the sky on to my constituency after taking off from Heathrow. Everyone on the plane was killed but by the mercy of Heaven no one on the ground was killed. The aircraft fell exactly 220 yards from Staines high street. We should be thankful that we have had no major accident. Long may that continue.

However, Heathrow is where it is. It has been developed out of all recognition over the past 40 years and it is still being developed. Terminal 4 is still under construction and is expected to come into operation later this year. That will increase Heathrow's present capacity of 29 million passengers a year by another 8 million. Yet Mr. Graham Eyre, in the report, recommends further development at Heathrow to cater for another 15 million people. He admits that it will take a long time for any such development and do nothing to solve the problem of providing enough capacity in the next few years.

It is important that the case against further development at Heathrow should be made today because Mr. Eyre says that if the fifth terminal is to come into operation in 1997 or later the go-ahead must be given now because of the enormously long lead time.

I am not sure whether the House is fully aware of the great weight of opinion around Heathrow against any further development. Surrey county council — my constituency is in Surrey — led a consortium of local authorities to put the case to Mr. Graham Eyre against any further development at Heathrow. The consortium consisted of the county councils of Surrey, Buckinghamshire and Hampshire, the London boroughs of Hounslow, Kingston-upon-Thames and Richmond and the borough and district councils of Mole Valley, Reigate and Banstead, Runnymede, South Bucks, Surrey Heath, and Spelthorne which I have the honour to represent. This involves a large number of people. There are about 1 million people in Surrey, about 600,000 in Buckinghamshire and 1·5 million in Hampshire. Therefore, we are referring to the elected representatives of more than 3 million people. That leaves out of account the London boroughs to which I have referred.

At a meeting that I attended last week to discuss this debate, we were told by the vice-chairman of the planning committee of Berkshire county council that the Berkshire county council is also totally against the development of a fifth terminal at Heathrow. Unfortunately, I do not know how many people live in Berkshire, but undoubtedly many people live in that county. I should also mention, though I hardly dare, that the chairman of the planning committee of the Greater London council was at that meeting and said that his council is totally opposed to any further development at Heathrow.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): As the constituency of my right hon. Friend abuts mine, would he comment on that part of the report which refers to the noise impact and the urban growth impact of a fifth terminal at Heathrow on his area and also on my part of Surrey? No doubt my right hon. Friend's constituents, like many of mine, are concerned about the increase in noise, if there were to be such an increase, and the pressure upon urban development.

Sir Humphrey Atkins: I thank my hon. Friend for his invitation. I shall not rehearse all the arguments that were presented by the consortium to Mr. Eyre because anybody who wishes to find out what they are can read them. However, I shall refer to noise and to the effect upon the roads. I do not propose to dwell upon the subject of noise, for it is only two months since the Second Reading debate on the Civil Aviation Bill and I made the case on noise as well as I could then. Therefore, it would not be profitable to repeat it now. However, in chapter 42, paragraph 10.1, Mr. Eyre states:

"Air noise is a modern curse from which the unfortunate inhabitants of the Heathrow area have been required to suffer over a long period. There will be substantial improvements in the noise climate in the next few years"—

I should like to argue that point with Mr. Eyre—

"but conditions will still be worse than at any other location in the United Kingdom."

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Sir Humphrey Atkins: No; I am in the middle of this point and I shall not give way.

It is alleged that as time passes—this is part of the reason why Mr. Eyre believes that there may be an improvement—there will be less noise because there will be fewer aeroplanes. I have yet to meet anybody who seriously believes that 23 million extra people can be carried in and out of Heathrow each year without an increase in the number of aircraft. There is talk of super jumbos carrying 600 or 700 passengers to replace the present generation of jumbos. Indeed, terminal 4, which has not yet been completed, is designed to accommodate aeroplanes of that kind. It is worthy of note, however, that not only are no such aeroplanes flying but that, so I am advised, no such aeroplanes are even in production.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I represent constituents who have suffered from serious and severe noise pollution for many years. The result has been that many of them have suffered physical and nervous breakdowns; and it is well known that those who live in Ealing and in the surrounding areas that have already been mentioned by my right hon. Friend cannot hold conversations inside their flats or houses during the winter, let alone during the summer. Therefore, noise, as my right hon. Friend has pointed out, is a major factor.

Sir Humphrey Atkins: I accept everything that my hon. Friend has said. However, I shall turn from the subject of noise, because we have already heard a good deal about it, to roads—another important part of the case made by the consortium. The difficulties surrounding getting into and out of London to the west are well known. When the construction of terminal 4 was being considered about seven years ago, Mr. Justice Glidewell, who wrote the report, said:

"Heathrow is London's largest generator of road traffic and the A4/M4 corridor is the Airport's most important route into and out of central London—it has been overloaded for many years."

Mr. Justice Glidewell continued:

"Unrestrained road traffic growth in the past has progressively increased this overloading to such a degree that"

today it has

"reached levels that must be regarded as intolerable."

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Would my right hon. Friend allow me to comment upon this part of his argument?

Sir Humphrey Atkins: No, otherwise I shall be on my feet all afternoon, and nobody wants that.

In his most recent report Mr. Graham Eyre was more dismissive. He said:

"conditions on the highway network in the Heathrow area and in particular along the M4/A4 corridor are unacceptable."

In chapter 38, paragraph 11.9, he said that a working party ought to be set up to investigate what could be done about this difficulty. That seems to be quite a good idea until one realises that it has already been done. The Department of Transport's evidence to Mr. Eyre's inquiry was as follows:

"The overall picture towards the end of this century will therefore be one of a highway network under stress with drivers operating under considerable strain (and) . . . conditions are likely to get worse on the M4 itself."

The Department went on to say:

"The Department have no proposals for any further roads in the area and indeed see no scope in providing any additional capacity in the A4/M4 corridor into Central London."

Therefore, one is bound to agree with the statement made last week by the transport committee's chairman of Surrey county council:

"yet the A4/M4 corridor cannot cope with only three terminals at Heathrow. With a Fourth and Fifth terminal and over 1 million passengers a week, traffic congestion would be intolerable. Not only would the M4 come to a standstill; the M25 would be heavily over-loaded as well."

Mr. Adley: May I ask my right hon. Friend whether he believes the Government have studied the plans by British Rail for tunnels both for its Western region main line at Iver and for its Southern region line at Feltham? Does my right hon. Friend agree that if one looks constructively at this matter and tries to reduce the road congestion to which my right hon. Friend properly referred, major investment by the state in the rail infrastructure to ease the congestion at Heathrow must be a vital part of these considerations?

Sir Humphrey Atkins: Indeed, it would have to be. If this development went ahead, any rail link would need to take a very much higher proportion of passengers than the current underground link because the underground link represents only about 10 per cent. of passenger traffic and is virtually insignificant.

Over a number of years, the Government have consistently stated publicly that terminal 5 will not be built. Sir John Nott, as Secretary of State for Trade, said:

"these considerations have led us to the view that a fifth terminal should not be provided." — [Official Report, 17 December 1979; Vol. 976, c. 36.]

In another place, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade, Lord Trefgarne, said:

"We have come to the conclusion that a fifth terminal at Heathrow . . . would take perhaps 11 to 13 years to build . . . and would not provide a long term solution." — [Official Report, House of Lords, 14 February 1980; Vol. 405, c. 327.]

Sir John Nott also said:

"I have made clear the Government's position. We do not favour a fifth terminal".—[Official Report, 21 February 1980; Vol. 979, c. 694.]

My right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said in 1980—it may come as a surprise to hon. Members to know that he was then only a lowly Parliamentary Under-Secretary:

"The Government's view remains as set out in the statement made on 17 December 1979 by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, that a fifth terminal should not be provided." —[Official Report, 3 November 1980; Vol. 991, c. 411.]

That was confirmed by my right hon. Friend in a letter of 13 November to my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), and the letter was subsequently issued by the Department as a press release.

The present Leader of the House, who was Secretary of State for Trade in 1981, reaffirmed in a written answer on 13 May 1981, at column 273, the Government's view that a fifth terminal should not be provided. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre), the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade, said:

"The Government have stated their view on a number of occasions that a fifth terminal at Heathrow should not be provided."—[Official Report, 23 July 1981; Vol. 9, c. 193.]

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), the then Leader of the House, said: "the Government have on a number of occasions said that a fifth terminal at Heathrow should not be provided. That remains our policy."—[Official Report, 23 July 1981; Vol. 9, c. 544.]

Finally, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister wrote a letter on 19 October 1981 to my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst). Of course, I have not seen that letter, but it was quoted in the House by Mr. Iain Sproat, who was then the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade. He said that the Prime Minister had written:

"The Government's airports policy was announced by John Nott in the House of Commons on 17 December 1979 and has been repeated since."

Small wonder then that hundreds of thousands of people believed in and took comfort from those assurances. Even less wonder that those of us who represent them felt able to say to anyone who expressed anxiety to us, "Do not worry. The fifth terminal will not be built. We have the Government's assurance on that." I have been saying that all those years and I said it during the last general election campaign. I have no doubt that some of my hon. Friends also did so.

Therefore, it will come as no surprise to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to discover that if my assurances prove to have been false, there will be no way that he can count on my support—only my opposition. However, I do not believe that it will come to that. The Secretary of State is an honourable man; we all know that. He said as recently as 21 November in reply to an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn)—admittedly on aircraft movements rather than the fifth terminal:

"I agree with my hon. Friend that when a Government give a firm and unequivocal pledge of that sort it behoves them to seek to implement it".—[Official Report, 21 November 1984, Vol. 68, c. 301.]

Therefore, I hope that I can rely on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to do exactly that.

It is only proper that any hon. Member who contributes to the debate should spell out, as far as possible, the line that the Government ought to pursue. I shall try to do that briefly. All our discussions and Mr. Graham Eyre's report are based on the assumption that, because an increasing number of people want to land in aeroplanes as near to the centre of London as they can, it is our business to make arrangements for them to do so. I suppose that it could be said to be the law of supply and demand, which, in general, is a very good thing. However, a balance has to be struck between the operation of that law and the well-being of the people it affects. There is nothing new in that; it is the basis of all our planning law.

For example, if a large number of people said that they worked in the centre of London and wanted to live in the city centre, so they wanted permission to build houses in Hyde park, any planning authority would immediately say that such a proposal would be so damaging to the environment of those living nearby that it could not be approved. I believe that the Government should say that to airline passengers: "So many more of you coming into Heathrow would so damage the quality of life of those living near the airport that you should land somewhere else."

The question of a fifth terminal at Heathrow is not an immediate problem, unlike the future of Stansted or developments at Manchester. No extra passengers would be able to use the fifth terminal until almost the next century. However, the Government would be wrong to give the go-ahead to a new terminal in defiance of everything that has been said over all these years.

5.16 pm

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I am very glad to be able to participate in so crucially important a debate, which may even prove to be an historic one.

I have two interests to declare. The first is that Manchester international airport, a most successful public enterprise in which, like all Mancunians, I take a legitimate pride, is in my constituency. It employs more people than any other enterprise there, and I am naturally anxious that it should go on expanding to provide more jobs in an area of unacceptably high unemployment.

My other interest in the debate is that I chair the all-party group of hon. and right hon. Members that liaises with the North of England Regional Consortium — NOERC. It was in that capacity that I sponsored early-day motion 146 on "Stansted and the Regions" which, with 233 signatories from all parties, has won more and wider parliamentary backing than any other motion awaiting debate in this House.

As the House will appreciate, I receive no financial reward from NOERC which, as most right hon. and hon. Members will know, speaks for 19 major local authorities in the north and represents millions of people, of all political persuasions and of none, in its opposition to the ill-conceived and unnecessary plan to develop Stansted as London's third airport.

The unemployment rate in the north is 17·1 per cent. In the south-east it is 9·2 per cent. The area immediately around Stansted has hardly any unemployment at all. The northern regions, with 27 per cent. of Britain's population, have 33 per cent. of its unemployment. The south-east, with 31 per cent. of the population, has 24 per cent. of the unemployment. Unemployment is a tragedy anywhere, but it hits much harder in the north, where losing a job means spending at least two and a half times longer on the dole before getting another chance to earn one's living.

In many parts of the north today we have male unemployment rates in excess of 50 per cent. In the city of Manchester there are now many localities where over two thirds of the under-25s are out of work. That is a shocking statistic from a city of which it was said, by one of the best economic historians to have written in the English language, that whoever spoke of industrialisation spoke of Manchester. It is a city today whose name has become synonymous with deindustrialisation. Moreover, even the figure of 66 per cent. unemployment among our young people in Manchester would be much higher but for the masking effect of the youth training scheme on youth unemployment. In this International Year of Youth, the prospect for most of our youngsters is from school to scrapheap.

Even to suggest a £1 billion-plus investment at Stansted not merely derides but mocks the ever-lengthening dole queues of the north. It excites not just total opposition but outright anger among my constituents. We cannot spend the same money twice, and it would be a crime against the north to plan expenditure on that scale in the south-east. Yet it would seem that the inquiry inspector's view of the relationship of Stansted to the north, as to where such vast investment should go, is that while it does not want it, we cannot have it. That is not just voodoo economics, but logic worthy of Fred Karno.

Until only a short time ago it was the Government's intention to take their decision on Stansted without reference to this House. That was their stance in one parliamentary answer after another, and they have made an important concession. In response to pressure they agreed to a parliamentary debate and I am both relieved and grateful that Ministers have now, if reluctantly, conceded Parliament's essential role in debating and deciding issues of this importance. The Government as yet have not declared a view on the inquiry inspector's recommendation on Stansted. By refusing to table an amendable motion for this debate, they have attempted to make it impossible for the House to declare a definitive view. What the 233 signatories of my motion wanted today was an opportunity to vote, not against the Government, but against the inspector's recommendation to develop Stansted to a capacity of 15 million passengers per annum. The only way in which we can now demonstrate our concern, in all parts of the House, is to divide the House tonight and to make it clear that we are doing so as the only means of signalling our opposition to the huge development of Stansted now proposed. This may well be the last parliamentary opportunity to debate Stansted before the Government take their decision, and I hope that enough right hon. and hon. Members on the Conservative Benches, by their votes tonight, will leave the Government and the country in no doubt what that decision must be.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): The right hon. Gentleman has made it clear that he is against spending a lot of money on developing Stansted, with the object of resources going to the north-west or the north instead. Will he make it equally clear, with equal emphasis, that he supports the view of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) that a fifth terminal should not be built at Heathrow, for exactly the same reason?

Mr. Morris: I shall be making reference to Heathrow as I proceed. Meanwhile I much admire the hon. Gentleman for the tenacity with which he fights his constituency case, just as I admire the hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) for the admirable way in which he has campaigned for his constituency.

To proceed, I trust that the Secretary of State will himself agree that this House has much to thank the North of England Regional Consortium for. It is the only body prepared to look in depth at the regional airport option as an alternative to developing Stansted. The consortium has exposed the implications, both for public expenditure and tourism, of the British Airports Authority's plans. It has drawn national attention to the widening chasm, in social and economic terms alike, between the south-east and other regions. Even more important, NOERC has shown how a positive policy for encouraging the development and growth of regional airports can assist in regenerating ailing regional economies.

Those with the stamina to have read the inspector's report must have been reminded, by its length and content, of some of the old transportation studies undertaken in the conurbations in the 1960s. Technicians were sent away with a brief to produce a shopping list of highway, rail and pedestrian schemes to meet the transportation needs of their areas for the indefinite future. They normally came up with a huge list of schemes. Costs were never questioned until the time came to look at how they could be implemented. Nor were future trends considered which ultimately rendered the proposed strategy largely unnecessary. The studies were models of academic achievement but had little or no relevance to the practical world. As a leader in The Times, of 11 December 1984, said perceptively of the inquiry inspector's findings:

> "It would be a cruelly consistent end to a long story of muddle if Stansted were developed as a stop-gap for a gap which never happened."

The North of England Regional Consortium is an unprecedented coming together of major local authorities as far north as Northumberland and as far south as Derbyshire. It commands political support from all parties throughout the north of England. It is supported by authorities and agencies in Scotland, including the Scottish Tourist Board, by authorities in Wales and the midlands, by chambers of commerce up and down the country and by trade unions at both a regional and national level. Over 500 individual firms either made representations to the inquiry inspector or to the Government and Members of Parliament in support of the consortium's case. I cannot think of any other single body which has ever attracted such widespread and positive support in a matter affecting airports.

There is no need in purely air transport terms for a further major development in the south-east of England to meet that region's air transport needs until the mid-1990s at the earliest.

The consortium has also shown that a very high number of regional air travellers are now forced to use airports in the south-east and that, if some of them could be reallocated to services from our regional airports, then expansion could proceed in the regions rather than the south-east. This would bring substantial economic and employment benefits to the regions and, as I have made clear, such benefits are urgently needed to reduce the widening disparities in both employment opportunities and social and economic conditions as between the south-east and the rest of the country.

Of all the alternatives to Stansted canvassed at the public inquiry none has been subject to more misinterpretation than that put forward by the consortium.

Let me give a few examples. The BAA has stated that we are against any increase in the capacity of the London system for all time. Yet we did not oppose the development of Gatwick terminal 2 nor Heathrow terminal 4. We understand and made it pikestaff plain at the inquiry that, beyond the time framework fixed for considering the case for a third London airport—the mid-1990s—there may well be growth in airport need which would justify further expansion of airport facilities in the south-east. But we also made it clear that the distorting effects of massively developing Stansted now, as opposed to some essential development in London later, could not be justified. The extent of any development will depend upon how long regional passengers have to continue using London's airports.

The BAA also said—it is now echoed by the CAA—that the consortium's alternative to Stansted would help foreign airports. That is a scare. It is a facile attempt to throw dust in the eyes of the uninformed. What it seeks to ensure is that passengers who originate in the regions, or who have destinations in the regions and are forced now to use London, will have to go on using London.

But why cannot our regional airports be allowed to accommodate regional passengers? Schiphol and Frankfurt are profiting already from the over-centralised air transport system in this country. What is more, failure to expand regional air services will benefit foreign airports even more.

As the House knows, the BAA and Government Departments rely on CAA surveys which classify passengers on the basis of where their journeys began on the day of the survey. The cumulative effect is that regional passengers who travel to London, or touring passengers who are forced to use London's airports despite the fact that they spend little or no time there, are actually counted as south-east passengers. In fact, they are passengers from Birmingham, Cardiff, the east midlands, Humberside, Leeds, Manchester, Newcastle-upon-Tyne and from everywhere else in Britain. To regard them as south-east passengers adds insult to the inconvenience they suffer.

Mr. Adley rose——

Mr. Morris: I am anxious to proceed as quickly as possible, but I will give way to the hon. Gentleman if he wishes to make a brief point.

Mr. Adley: I am sure that many people will agree entirely with what the right hon. Gentleman has been saying, and I know from my business experience that it is true. Does he agree that the BAA is really disqualified from giving a rational opinion? It does not own any airports between Scotland and south-east England. The BAA simply wants to boost its area of responsibility, and it cannot be said to be a dispassionate witness.

Mr. Morris: The hon. Gentleman well reflects the strength of feeling that exists on both sides of the House about the orgy of propaganda to which we have been subjected over the years by the BAA.

As I was saying, to regard people from other parts of the country as south-east passengers adds insult to the inconvenience that they suffer. Yet an essential part of the case for Stansted is built on the delusion that they are from the south-east.

NOERC has recently examined data from a highly impartial source which shows that, if the places of residence for United Kingdom residents and the places where foreign visitors spend the greatest number of nights is taken into account, the proportion of airport passengers using London's airports who originate from the south-east —or are tourists going to the south-east—is reduced from 80 per cent., which is the figure BAA constantly uses, to only 71 per cent. This reduction means that the regional share has been underestimated by nearly 50 per cent. This is but one of the fundamental errors which flaws the inquiry inspector's strategy.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North) rose——

Mr. Morris: I should like to give way but, in deference to the Chair, I feel that I should proceed.

The inspector's forecasts for the 1990s could have to be reduced by up to 6 million passengers due to the single discrepancy to which I have referred. In any event, we, among others, see his forecasts as far too high because of the unduly optimistic economic assumptions he makes. In this respect, they resemble, both in their optimism and probable inaccuracy, every previous forecast of demand which has been made.

The Secretary of State is welcome to examine our research, an opportunity which I earnestly urge him to take before he determines the inspector's report. To calm his nerves, perhaps I should disclose that the impartial source from which it derives is his own Department of Transport.

Other myths have been put about by the BAA. Sir Norman Payne's description of Stansted as an "oasis of opportunity in a desert of decline" is now notorious. In response, I will simply say that, compared with the inner city areas of Manchester, Liverpool and our other great cities in the north, with their male unemployment rates in many localities of over 50 per cent., the Herts-Essex area is nirvana.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North) rose——

Mr. Morris: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman, but I must get on.

The BAA's far-fetched story that the NOERC solution represents a real threat to Britain's earning potential may be clever propaganda, but portrays no understanding of current realities. It is a remarkable fact that there are now more direct regional services to Amsterdam than there are regional services to London. All we seek to do is ensure that more passengers use their local airports instead of foreign airports and, by so doing, generate a benefit for the nation as a whole.

Mr. Gale: Allegations have been made against the BAA, an organisation for which I hold no brief whatever. I understand that the BAA wishes, as I do, to see the regional airports developed, and I appreciate the concern which the right hon. Gentleman and others express. However, will the right hon. Gentleman say — I understand that he received this information in answer to a parliamentary question—how many available routes there are already to Manchester that have not been taken up?

Mr. Morris: I do not intend to be drawn into an argument about the BAA. I have indicated my view and will proceed with my argument, which I hope will help to inform the hon. Gentleman in full detail of the northern case.

There would be no net loss to the nation if some of the millions of inward tourists—and 62 per cent. of all nights spent in the UK by overseas visitors are spent outside London — arrived in Scotland, Wales, Manchester, Birmingham or other centres, instead of 94 per cent. of them having to pass through the south-east and creating unnecessary congestion at and around London's airports.

Mr. Graham Eyre's dismissive attitude to those whose opinions differ from his own clearly stems from the fact that the questions he asked of himself were fundamentally different from those posed by others, notably by the North of England Regional Consortium. He has sought to forecast need and recommends the provision of capacity so far into the future that he is accused of taking evidence from Gypsy Rose Lee. Yet I suspect that Gypsy Rose herself would have been speechless at his powers of prophecy, as she could have told him that there is no practical means of forecasting demand beyond the mid-1990s. To follow the inspector's line would have meant the implementation of what he calls "four-runway" monsters at Maplin, Cublington or, indeed, Stansted, over 10 years ago.

Of course, it is not for a planning inquiry to decide major issues of airports policy. That is ultimately a task for this House, and we must introduce some practical realism into the debate about Stansted in our deliberations today. It would plainly be ridiculous, at this juncture, to commit expenditure well into the 21st century.

Enormous sums of money are involved and it is clearly only prudent to make the best use of scarce existing resources by planning within a reasonable timescale. It is also plainly right that we must first achieve the aims of the 1978 White Paper on airports policy—a policy which successive Governments have strongly endorsed—and in particular the role it envisaged for our regional airports.

Since so many of my constituents work at Manchester international airport, perhaps I may be allowed to make a few comments about Manchester in the hope that Members with an interest in other regional airports will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and speak of the effect of this debate on their constituencies.

Manchester international serves a catchment area of 20 million people, about 40 per cent. of the UK's population. As Britain's third airport, it was designated a category "A" international gateway in 1978. As the House well knows, it has maintained and built upon this status and, in 1984, was the UK's fastest growing airport. We had an increase in the number of passengers to more than 6 million.

The airport has a crucial employment role, not just in south Manchester, but for the north-west as a whole. It provides direct employment for 5,500 people, including the employees of airlines and support services. A further 15,000 people are employed indirectly throughout the region.

Manchester's continued success is crucial to the region's future, in the same way as growth at Newcastle, Leeds-Bradford, Birmingham, Cardiff, the East Midlands and other regional airports is important to the future prosperity of their regions. All of those airports have experienced steady growth in the deregulated inclusive tour and charter sectors. The position is not, however, so rosy in the scheduled sector. In Manchester's case, with the exception of the Qantas service to Australia, and the planned services to New York and Hong Kong, there are as yet no intercontinental scheduled services. This must be bad for industry and commerce in the north-west. The Civil Aviation Authority's own 1983 survey of passenger traffic provides evidence that direct services could be viably operated from Manchester to many other intercontinental destinations including Chicago, Los Angeles, Miami, Toronto, Johannesburg, Saudi Arabia, the Gulf states and Singapore. Such services would bring substantial benefits to northern consumers and business men by improving trade links and generating much needed jobs.

Yet foreign airlines have been stopped from opening up intercontinental routes into Manchester. I know that some of my parliamentary colleagues will want to discuss this very disturbing result of the current licensing system, and I shall not go further on that point except to say that it is totally scandalous that Singapore Airlines has been refused permission to fly into Manchester.

Stansted poses a massive threat to the further development of all our regional airports. For it to operate viably, as Mr. Graham Eyre himself acknowledged, there would have to be licensing policies that effectively forced airlines to fly there. This is, of course, a policy that is likely to meet with considerable resistance from the airlines. Stansted is currently marketed as a low-cost airport with exceptionally low landing fees in order to attract business. It is operating at a loss and, in effect, is subsidised by the other British Airports Authority's airports at Heathrow and Gatwick. The regional airports, such as Manchester, which have to be individually profitable, cannot compete on equal terms. Even now they are the victims of totally unfair competition. I point out to the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), in particular, that this explains much of the animus shown by right hon. and hon. Members representing the regions when they discuss the outpourings of the British Airports Authority.

The regional airports must be developed to satisfy regionally generated demand for air services. This cannot possibly be achieved if a heavily subsidised Stansted airport is allowed massively to expand. By positively encouraging the regional airports, we can benefit not only the regions outside the south-east; capacity would also be released at both Heathrow and Gatwick. The opportunity is now clearly available to us to make better use of the nation's resources. It is an opportunity that must not be missed.

I urge every hon. Member who shares my view to join me in the Division Lobby tonight.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. More than 50 hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye in this debate. I am afraid that some of them will be disappointed unless speeches are briefer.

5.42 pm

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): I shall do my best to heed that warning, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but you will understand that my constituency is at the centre of these matters because Stansted airport is wholly within its boundaries.

I thank the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), not only for the support he has given generally to a cause in which he and I believe, but for the measured and moderate way in which he has put his case. It would be churlish if I did not acknowledge the debt we owe to Mr. Graham Eyre for the monumental work he has undertaken. Although we shall dive into his studies and find bits that we like and bits we do not like, we cannot detract from the application he has shown. It is a remarkable achievement.

I realise that this debate could be a dreary recital of well-stated positions, which does not inform Ministers or help them in their efforts to listen to the views of hon. Members and make up their minds, or help those hon. Members who are still trying to discover the best truth to emerge from all this. Naturally, my hon. Friends will understand that I must defend my constituency position, but I hope that I shall make as constructive a speech as I can.

I acknowledge immediately that there is more than one opinion in my constituency. Some people would accept development of Stansted in varying degrees, but it could be said that there is almost overwhelming agreement in my constituency about limited expansion at Stansted, provided a reasonable limit can be set. I hope that the House will not be misled by the document that has been circulated—not to me but to others—by the British Airports Authority giving the results of a MORI poll, showing that the proportion in favour of some expansion is nearly 3:1. The authority had to extend its net some 30 miles from my constituency to obtain such a result. I acknowledge, however, that there is support for expansion at Stansted, even from some of the most vociferous opponents of the full-scale development that they fear threatens them.

I hope that I do not sound too pompous by offering a quotation from Edmund Burke which I hope will animate our discussions. In 1775 he said:

> "Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests; which interest each must maintain, as an agent and advocate, against other agents and advocates; but parliament is a deliberative assembly of one nation, with one interest, that of the whole; where, not local purposes, not local prejudices ought to guide, but the general good, resulting from the general reason of the whole."

In the end, the House must operate in that spirit, and I certainly do not intend to speak now or influence colleagues later in a manner that departs unduly from that spirit.

The fairness argument comes up time and again. There is a deep sense of injustice in my constituency about the singular tale of Stansted over the years. My constituents are concerned that this matter has come up repeatedly. I say to my right hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins)—I am sure that he speaks for exactly the same basic causes as I do when he talks of his constituents' feelings and those of others—that we are all in the same boat because our constituents rely on the various promises that have been given over the years. To say that some promises are more recent than others does not destroy the validity of the point that people have relied on Governments in the past and have not been able to place much trust in them as a result of what has happened. If we cannot allow the past to bind the future, the only advice I can give to the Government is that the slate must be wiped clean. The Government must make their decisions in the light of the position as they see it now and on the best information available.

Mr. Eyre said that he felt that the proposition put before him regarding Stansted was very different from the other propositions. I suggest that the proposition at the heart of this matter is whether north-west Essex is a suitable place for a major airport, with the number of passengers rising to 25 million per annum. It is immaterial whether it has one, two, three or four runways. The basic question is whether it is the right place.

I shall deal with the fundamentalist argument. There seems to be a widely received truth that air transportation is good, and we cannot have too much of it. I want to enter a cautionary word so that we do not lose all sense of proportion and give to Government now and in the future a licence to unroll a carpet of concrete wherever the insatiable appetite for air transport takes them. Colin Buchanan, in his pamphlet published this week, gives us some sound advice—"keep a sense of proportion". I do not want to tread too far down that path. I recognise that people—my constituents among them—will want to travel, and I do not believe that they should be unduly denied the opportunity. We should value the important contribution that tourism can make. I am not one of those who will argue that the British civil air transport industry must be hampered in order to benefit foreign aviation industries. I accept those aims, but not at any price. I recognise that Mr. Eyre believed that the expansion should not occur at any price. It is a matter of judgment and balance as to what one thinks are the reasonable confines for expansion.

My hon. Friends will recognise that no speech of mine on this subject would be complete without a kindly reference to the "Big Brother" of the airport business—the British Airports Authority. The British Airports Authority is far less than its name implies but has far more influence than its territorial extent merits. That point was well made by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley). In the development of airports policy, I cannot help feeling that there has been far too close a relationship between officials of Government Departments and the BAA. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Mr. Eyre analyses very sharply how the wheels have been allowed to grind to make Stansted, time and again, appear the only option. With the BAA constituted as it is, no truly national policy can emerge.

The BAA boasts—the boast was echoed by my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale)—that it has a great interest in the success of the regional airports. In making that boast, the BAA has all the credibility of the wolf inviting the third little pig to come to the fair. Throughout the whole business, it has shown a ruthless and sometimes unsavoury determination to get its own way.

I cite once again the MORI poll circulated by the BAA in a press release. It is headed:

> "Most Stansted Residents Support Airport Expansion".

Stansted Mountfitchet is a village with a population of 6,000 or 7,000. The poll was taken within a 30-mile radius of that village. That is typical of the deception practised by the BAA throughout the campaign. I hope that no hon. Member will be deceived by it.

Mr. Hayes: Has not the BAA gone so far as to buy 1,100 acres of land in the Stansted area at vastly inflated prices?

Mr. Haselhurst: I confirm what my hon. Friend says. That fact, too, has given rise to suspicion that the Government's decision will be prejudiced, even though we have been given assurances in the past that such factors will not affect the issue.

I believe that the inspector was less than fair to the regional argument. I have a decent northern pedigree, not only as a born Yorkshireman but as someone who had the honour to represent a parliamentary seat in the Greater Manchester area a few years ago. I do not believe that people should be forced to use regional airports. Mr. Eyre effectively exploded that view. However, it is reasonable to satisfy the regional demand that naturally arises in the regions. The right hon. Member for Wythenshawe produced some good figures on that point, and I know from experience that too many people have to travel to the south-east to fly to their destination.

The population argument is compelling. We are invited to believe that 17 million people in the south-east will fuel the expansion of aviation for ever. However, there are 37 million people in the north as a whole. There must be a great tendency towards growth in the regions, and it should be satisfied there.

We must adopt a more positive stance on future tourism from other countries, and ensure that the benefits of tourism in terms of jobs are spread more evenly throughout the country. That, too, would help airports policy. Mr. Eyre said:

"If tourism brings overall benefits and if its demands are to be met, then more effort will be needed to exploit the potential of other areas of the UK."

He also said that he had little doubt that more could be done in that respect. A well-directed tourist policy could considerably ease our problems in the south-east. The regional argument has been under-played so far. I hope that the Government will recognise that more can be done than paying lip service to our regional airports.

There is also the question of urbanisation. The inspector recognised that it is very much a question of judgment. It is hard to predict how many people will want to move into an area because of a degree of expansion at the airport. I take the commonsense point of view that if 25,000 jobs are to be created by the expansion of Stansted to a capacity of 15 million passengers per annum, and if there are only 2,300 unemployed people in the constituency of Saffron Walden, it is likely that there will be a great deal of migration.

Mr. Eyre seems to believe that the capacity could be increased to 15 million, or perhaps 25 million, with only small effects on the environment of the area, but that if capacity is increased to 25 million and one catastrophe will follow. I suspect that it would be a matter of degree, and that catastrophe would manifest itself much earlier than Mr. Eyre was prepared to conclude.

Mr. Eyre produced forecasts and timetables. The House has every ground for being wary of forecasts on which we are invited to make decisions. We should consider past efforts. For 1985, the Roskill commission said that we would need to be handling 84 million passengers per annum in the London area airports. The CAA forecast of 1973 was also for 84 million. The Maplin review suggested 58 million to 76 million. The 1978 White Paper on airports policy suggested 51 million to 64 million. In 1979 the advisory committee forecast 55 million to 61 million. The 1981 Gatwick inquiry forecast 55 million to 61 million. What is the reality? It is about 45 million during this year.

I remember the chairman of the BAA assuring us within the Palace of Westminster that unless his policies were adopted the London airports system would be saturated by 1987. We now know that the Stansted terminal on which he had set his heart will not be ready until 1991, and that the saturation point will have not been reached by then. It is interesting that there has been a slippage of years that almost matches the passage of time since the inquiry began. I believe that Mr. Eyre's figure of 89 million by the year 2000 should be treated with great reserve.

Forgetting, for a moment, the complex factors involved in any such projection, let us ask ourselves whether it is credible to imagine that numbers in London will double by the year 2000. That is what we are expected to believe. The inspector showed clear preference for the development of Heathrow. He said in chapter 39 that:

"the application site forms part of an area which is more suitable for airport development than any other location in the south east and the whole of the United Kingdom."

He turns to Stansted because of the timetable. On the question of the availability of a terminal 5, there is evidence from the Thames water authority that the inspector's estimate of 1996 at the earliest could be improved upon and that it is by no means certain that the Perry Oaks sludge works would have to be physically replaced anywhere.

The idea is that Stansted will take up the shortfall. I do not believe that, in order to take up the shortfall and carry us through to the year 2000 and beyond, we need to give the BAA the green light to build a Texas-scale facility at Stansted. Stansted would be prepared to play its part as a regional airport and to ensure that the disaster of saturation, were it to threaten within that time, would not occur.

I am obliged to say things about Heathrow that will not find unanimous support amongst my colleagues. I cannot help that. To some extent, I fear that I cannot avoid a head-on collision with some of my colleagues. I understand the interests that they represent. I know that the complaints made by the people living near Heathrow are generically the same as those of the people living around Stansted. I accept that more people live around Heathrow. It is still a moot environmental point whether it is better to utilise an existing facility than to start a wholly new one.

Mr. Eyre concluded that the fifth terminal would have no discernible effect on the noise climate, and the Government did not attempt to challenge that point.

Mr. Jessel: Nonsense.

Mr. Haselhurst: The essential difference between the two cases is that, in any case, Heathrow will remain the major airport within the London system. The question is whether it is to be a decent and worthwhile airport. It may be asked whether Stansted is not also there already. Stansted occupies 900 acres. To make it the operational airport that it wants, the BAA is looking for almost twice as many acres on top—just for starters. That is the scale of what it is trying to do in north-west Essex.

Perhaps I should deal with the Schiphol argument, as it will no doubt rear its head again today. I do not want traffic going off to Schiphol but if interlining is the key, the choice must be Heathrow. I cannot envisage people taking a bus ride round the M25 believing that that is more convenient than going to Schiphol. If they went to Schiphol because London were, by chance, full, why should they not go to Manchester? Why should we not set out to ensure that we have another gateway airport which can do a good job for the British aviation industry?

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): Is my hon. Friend aware that there is already massive interlining from the northern region to Schiphol, Frankfurt and Charles de Gaulle because there are so few direct schedule services from Manchester because of the lack of expansion in direct services overseas that we have been allowed?

Mr. Haselhurst: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He has helped to underline my case. Bearing in mind the inspector's recommendations for what could be done to improve Heathrow and surrounding areas, it makes more sense to spend money on improving access, organisation and the environment at Heathrow before spending large sums of money in the Essex countryside.

The report offers too grand a design for too long a term. Mr. Eyre claims that his plan will cope with need into the early decades of the next century. That goes beyond what we can reasonably be expected to decide. History suggests that planning capability too far ahead is fraught with considerable dangers. Are there not technological developments that could render the basis of our decisions irrelevant? I noticed in the press at the weekend that there is a possibility of a train based on magnetic levitation which could reduce the journey time from Edinburgh to London to one hour and the journey from Birmingham to London to 20 minutes. If, in the next 40 years, such a project becomes reality, it will have a revolutionary effect on aircraft movements in Britain.

We cannot know the future in another sense — a matter on which I reacted strongly to Mr. Eyre's report. He said that Stansted should go ahead on the basis of his recommendation only if the Government give an unequivocal declaration of intent that there will never be a second runway. There was hollow laughter in my constituency about unequivocal declarations of intent. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne will share in that laughter because we have all had our unequivocal declarations. Why would Mr. Eyre have been sitting on his inquiry if the declarations of the past had had any validity?

We must try to find a sensible plan. I commend a plan with components that include a fifth terminal at Heathrow, a commitment to the regions, the possibility of Luton making more of a contribution than has hitherto been considered and a role for Stansted. I am not saying that Stansted should bear no part of the expansion in meeting the need of the south-east, but I believe that Stansted within its existing boundaries can do all that is required of it. If it is put on its feet and, perhaps, separated from the BAA, local people will feel that they have more control. That would also enable the Government to say that they are going for genuinely incremental growth to bridge any shortfall that might arise. That is what John Nott said when he began the operation in 1979.

The Government should satisfy need according to national priorities with regard to environment and expenditure. They should make Heathrow the best airport in the world for its users and neighbours and recognise the widely held view that north-west Essex is not the best possible place for an airport-led industrial growth centre on the scale that Mr. Eyre proposes. In choosing a package of this general description — I do not want to be too particular about details — the Government might find that they would give some agony to everyone but that the benefits and disbenefits could be distributed according to a sensible order of national priorities.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): The hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) has made a strong and brave speech, in which he sets out the case against the full development of Stansted. I agree with a great deal of what he said.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) made some pertinent remarks about airline policy. I agree with her that decisions on airport policy are interlinked with what we are about to do about our airlines. We have not debated that issue, but should have done. What will be the future of the independents? Will we encourage British Caledonian to grow? What will be the future of British Midland Airways and others?

If Stansted is to succeed as Mr. Eyre wants it to succeed, one of our independent airlines will have to establish a substantial base there. I do not see that happening at the moment. At the beginning of his summary, Mr. Eyre refers to strong public cynicism and the fact that there will never be consensus on airports policy. That is only too obviously confirmed by our mail and by the speches that have been made so far. No doubt there are many more similar speeches to be made. Mr. Eyre is right to say that there is a need for decisive action. With our national finances in disarray, we cannot afford to waste this opportunity of new investment in a vital wealth-creating sector of the economy.

I staked out my party's stance on Second Reading of the ill-fated Civil Aviation Bill. I have no regrets about how I cast my vote then or subsequently in Committee, because it was manifest nonsense to put that measure on the statute book before considering the implications of the report fully. Liberals have always favoured much greater emphasis on the development of regional airports, but neither the Government nor their predecessors have given as much encouragement as they should to such development. I regret having to criticise Mr. Eyre, because this is a fine report, but he treats the contribution that regional airports can make with insufficient thought.

With the privatisation of BAA still in the wings, and the abolition of the metropolitan county councils, the future ownership of fine airports such as Manchester, Birmingham and Prestwick is still not known. Moreover, applications for licences to use Manchester from Asian airlines such as Singapore Airlines have recently been refused. I am convinced that Manchester, possibly Birmingham, perhaps even Prestwick and one or two others can make a far more positive contribution to civil aviation policy than they are allowed to make at present.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): Birmingham airport is in my constituency. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that constituents who live 100 yd away from the taxiway would be extremely disadvantaged and most unhappy about the extra noise that would result from any major increase in traffic? Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that traffic should be redirected from London to Birmingham?

Mr. Ross: I find that a strange intervention, as I have recently been to Birmingham. The airport has recently spent £60 million on development and lengthened the runway. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that it does not want to encourage more use of the airport, that seems to be a terrible waste of money. Birmingham airport has the great advantage of rail links and a bus interchange and the National Exhibition Centre on its doorstep. If it is not policy to encourage people to fly in from the continent and America to use those facilities, I am surprised.

I welcome British Airways' renewed interest in Manchester, because when it was merged with BEA it let Manchester down. It is now proposing to reintroduce transatlantic flights this spring and intends to fly to the far east next year. That is much to be welcomed, but Manchester will need many more national and international links if it is to develop as a hub and spoke airport. Such development is essential to its future well-being.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) spoke with great knowledge about Manchester airport. I shall not pursue his arguments, as I am nothing like as well qualified as he is to speak about Manchester. However, I hope that some of British Airways' promised financial help to the independents will encourage at least one of them to base itself at Manchester. We have only to go to Atlanta in the United States to see what United Airlines and Eastern Airways have done for that airport. An airline must invest heavily in Manchester if a hub and spoke system, which is desperately needed, is to be created. That would take some weight off London.

British Airways will naturally always want to base its principal operations at Heathrow. If Prestwick and Birmingham can attract more international and local flights, they should be actively encouraged to do so. Prestwick could easily be connected to British Rail. That might be its saviour. I am sorry that the gentleman who wishes to run cheap flights across the Atlantic has not yet received his licence. I cannot criticise the reason for that, which I gather is that the financial arrangements are not yet satisfactory. Nevertheless, if a People Express-type operation could use Prestwick, it could save that fine airport. It is essential that Manchester should have a direct link to the west coast main line as soon as possible. That should be an early commitment on behalf of the Government. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe will agree with that.

When dealing with Heathrow, the report clearly shows that there will be an increase above the 275,000 ATMs, if present trends continue. That is not an excessive limitation. The figure could rise to 300,000. The report further states that the figure will decrease again with the introduction of larger aircraft. In the consultation document which the Government issued last year it was repeated that the 275,000 limit, which the Government accepted six years ago, would be reviewed in the light of progress and the introduction of quieter aircraft. Those developments are now upon us and there does not seem to be a total commitment on the Government's part not to go above the 275,000 limit.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Will the hon. Gentleman say whether he is opposed to the 275,000 limit? If so, is he not opposing the Government's wish to control aircraft noise by that limitation?

Mr. Ross: The hon. Gentleman has already issued a press release in his constituency blaming me for the defeat of the Civil Aviation Bill. I am not opposed to going slightly above the 275,000 limit. I shall come to the reason why shortly. We have not done enough about noise and traffic congestion. That must be rectified if Heathrow is to retain its dominance, which it will and must do.

Restrictions on ATMs at Heathrow, as the hon. Gentleman knows, hit the very people whom we wish to encourage, that is, the independent airlines, which were going to be forced out of Heathrow. That is the reason why we must go slightly above that figure. All the evidence shows that that is not unacceptable.

Extra finance for insulation aids is essential. The Secretary of State should take the opportunity to see what the Japanese have done at Osaka and Norita. They have spent vast sums on dealing with environmental problems. People who live near those airports are far more satisfied than are citizens in the United Kingdom who live near airports because so much more has been done for them.

Mr. Eyre says that the Noise Advisory Council should be resuscitated, and that is a good idea. It is also extremely important that new connections are built as rapidly as possible both for public transport and to the motorways. I agree with the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) that British Rail must be brought to the airfield as quickly as possible. He mentioned a link line between the southern and western regions. That would open up the whole country to public transport and to the public using Heathrow. That would greatly relieve traffic jams. We could even link the airfield to the Channel tunnel.

There should be a total ban on night movements except in emergencies. The Secretary of State should take that recommendation on board—it appears in chapter 58. Mr. Eyre makes a host of recommendations about noise, which the Government should accept. Money must be spent to lessen the misery of people living near airports. That can be done.

As Mr. Eyre said, the sewage works at Perry Oaks should have been moved long ago. That action should be taken now, whether or not it is decided to develop T5. The Thames water authority should be instructed to find an alternative site, if it needs one. Heathrow needs room to breathe and that action would keep our options open while we see how accurate the current forecasts are on traffic movements. As the hon. Member for Saffron Walden said, they have been fairly inaccurate in the past.

In 1979 I said that a limit of 15 million ATMs might be acceptable for Stansted. I have since changed my mind. Since then there has been substantial investment in many regional airports especially in Manchester and Birmingham. I also believe that the cost in terms of loss of amenities and high-class agricultural land is too great. Moreover, Stansted could turn out to be a monstrous white elephant. One only has to think of Newark, which was a white elephant for a long time.

As a recent leader in The Times stated, "Stansted can wait". We should let it develop naturally to the 4 million mark and then assess the position. If the demand is there we shall have to take action, but at the moment I do not believe that it is and, therefore, Stansted should be left alone to see what it can do for itself.

Following the report, the Secretary of State should give priority first to ensuring the future well-being of the independent airlines, on which so much of the future depends. We must not let British Airways totally dominate the scene. We should take steps now to improve the facilities at Heathrow before we talk of further expansion.

Mr. Jessel: The hon. Gentleman said that he was in favour of improving facilities at Heathrow. Will he make it clear to the House whether or not he favours having a fifth terminal at Heathrow?

Mr. Ross: It would be a great mistake to make a commitment which I or a successor might regret in future. I shall not follow the path of previous ministerial mistakes. I am certainly not committing my party to T5 now, nor in the foreseeable future. I would encourage Manchester and any other regional airports that fancy their chances. I would continue to make improvements at Gatwick to press on with Stolport, and to make better provision for business executives at Farnborough or Blackbushe. Above all, I would take urgent action to improve our public transport links to our airports, with particular emphasis on rail, which should be utilised to a greater extent than it has been. I have given a commitment and I believe to be an honest one.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst). The House will appreciate the great sincerity of his speech and the skilful and dignified way in which he dealt with a position that must be extremely difficult for him. I respect and acknowledge many of his points.

I declare a constituency interest. Gatwick airport is in my constituency, as is the head office of the British Airports Authority, British Caledonian, British Airways, Dan Air and many other operations. I am therefore surrounded by a good deal of conflicting advice, which is why my remarks this evening are entirely my own conclusions.

Three important points make the basics of this matter. First, air transport is a thriving and growing industry in Britain. Recent growth has been rapid, and substantial further growth is predicted. The industry has a remarkable record in employment and in the creation of jobs. It has a wonderful record on the earnings of foreign currency and on bringing to Britain enormous numbers of foreign visitors, who have materially benefited our balance of trade. For the industry to continue this excellent record and, in particular, for it to continue to create a substantial number of jobs in future there must be an adequate airport capacity throughout the United Kingdom, especially in the south-east. The inspector has clearly identified when existing airport resources will be exhausted even if the arbitrary limit on air transport movements at Heathrow is relaxed.

Secondly, some views suggest that the development of airports in the midlands, the north and Scotland can replace the development of further facilities in the south-east of England. Airports away from the south-east are all developing strongly, and good luck to them, not just because there is a political will from this House and from the public corporations and others for them to develop, but because there is a strong demand for air transport which is being met by the development policies of those airports.

All the projections are that the growth of both scheduled and charter services at airports away from the south-east will continue. It will be necessary for those airports to be developed and I strongly support the principle. But in no way should that further development reduce the requirements in the south-east. Both can, must and should be met equally.

Thirdly, and most importantly, in the discussions to date there has been little reference to the interests of the customer. It has been a fundamental feature of Government policy that more attention should be paid to the needs of the customer in all sectors of our commercial life. The inspector has considered in depth the needs of the customer and he has found that those needs are best met by the provision of substantially more airport capacity for London and the south-east.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the customers who travel from the north of England, Scotland and Wales who at the moment have to travel to the south of England will not be served by the expansion of Stansted but would be better served by the expansion of the regional airport system?

Mr. Soames: I hoped that I had made it clear that I am greatly in favour of the expansion of the regional airports.

The inspector has considered the needs of the customer. If we want those customers to use British airlines and British airports, there is no option but to provide for airport capacity in the area of the country to which they wish to fly. That, I am afraid, remains largely the London area. If that is not done, the customer will elect to overfly to another capital such as Paris or Amsterdam.

Any decision which does not favour a development of airport capacity in the south-east over the next 15 years will be a decision which ignores the interests of the customers and the opportunities for the air transport industry to create jobs and to earn more foreign currency. Indeed, I have here a letter from the chairman of Dan Air which makes it plain that unless his company is able to develop in the south-east it will not be open to him to assist in the development of the regional airports in the north. In what way could such a decision be consistent with any Government policy objective?

Let me now deal with the facts and figures about the British aviation industry. In 1983 the United Kingdom civil aviation industry earned a profit from the rest of the world of nearly £500 million. Over 100,000 people are directly employed in civil aviation in the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom's civil airlines fly more passenger miles on international routes than any other country's airlines save those of the United States. The United Kingdom total is nearly twice that of France, our nearest European competitor.

In 1983 £18,000 million worth of foreign trade was handled at Gatwick and Heathrow alone—15 per cent. of the total value of the United Kingdom's world trade. The best estimates are that, of the £4·25 billion that tourists brought to Britain last year, £3 billion was spent by 60 per cent. of the tourists who entered the United Kingdom through Gatwick and Heathrow.

I in no way decry the role of Manchester or any of the other regional airports, but by anyone's standards the industry is a formidable contributor to national prosperity. It is an industry in which, apart from the United States, we indisputably lead the world. For us not to face the disagreeable, tough and difficult decisions that lie ahead in a sensible manner would be to throw away an enormous national advantage.

The permissions already granted at Gatwick and Heathrow take those airports almost to saturation point and the limited development of Stansted—as recommended by the inspector and by the 1978 White Paper of the Government of which the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) was a member — is the most sensible, practical and easy course to adopt.

The Secretary of State will be aware of the views of the West Sussex county council on these matters, with which I entirely concur.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): Does my hon. Friend appreciate that a number of his hon. Friends from west Sussex are here to support him tonight and would wish to be associated with precisely what he has said?

Mr. Soames: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I had seen that I was much sustained by my hon. Friends from west Sussex.

Successive Governments have not faced up to the need to establish and sustain an airports policy. There have been attempts to determine policies in the past but resolve has always wavered when decisions to implement them have been sought. Perhaps over-zealous forecasting of future requirements has provided arguable grounds for procrastination and delay. That situation does, most emphatically, not now prevail.

The absence of decisions in the past has foreclosed many options, particularly the possibility of a new green field location, and the inspector's report has now picked a difficult and tortuous way through the options that remain open—better ultimate use of Stansted and more use of Heathrow. The inspector is right to suggest that that can make the necessary contribution within the required time scale and the proper aviation context.

If support for international aviation and the protection of Britain and London's position at the centre is to be sustained, as it should be, there is no alternative but to develop the strength of the London system where that is practical. The risks of not doing so are that international traffic will be lost, not to Manchester or Birmingham—sadly—but to Schiphol, Frankfurt or Paris.

Manchester and other regional airports already exist and have had opportunities to develop services. But that has not come about through any fault of their own but because the air transport industry cannot be persuaded in terms of the realities of life that those airports are part of the London system. I can assure the House that many years passed, as many hon. Members will know, before Gatwick was able to acquire real status as an international airport for that very reason.

The inspector's recommendation for Stansted is the only sensible one that can be made if capacity for the early 1990s is to be met.

Mr. Adley rose——

Mr. Soames: May I, please, press on?

The inspector is right to seek firm assurances to limit Stansted's capacity to a single runway comparable with Gatwick. That reduces significantly some of the powerful arguments against a larger, more developed Stansted. The runway is already there. A motorway passes close by and the railway line is not too far distant. A new terminal and supporting developments such as servicing, cargo facilities, car parking and other airport-related facilities will obviously be needed. But the land consumed by those will be modest compared with the original proposals for a fully developed two-runway airport.

A second terminal may be necessary in the distant future, but if the Heathrow proposal is accepted and becomes operational in the 1990s that will be a long way off. The urban development, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden spoke, to support a Stansted expansion will also be correspondingly modest. Unemployment within the labour markets in the travel-to-work area and improved productivity suggest that the demand for new housing and the supporting infrastructure will be less than objectors have forecast. The only room for manoeuvre in the short term is now at Stansted. The resolve to proceed should not be compromised by wishful thinking that Manchester or Birmingham will do instead, because I am afraid they will not. Many will argue that the investment needed to develop Stansted, and Heathrow later, should not be made in the affluent south-east and that it would help to remedy economic imbalance if it were to be made in other regions. I have sympathy with the idea behind that expression, but I do not believe that airport development is footloose in that way. If it is not made in the London system, it will not be made at all.

I now draw the attention of the House to the inspector's summary of overall conclusions in which he deals with the lessons from and the consequences of the past.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): My hon. Friend has talked about additional capacity in the south-east. Is it not a fact that the second terminal at Gatwick will increase capacity there by about 50 per cent.? Will my hon. Friend say something about the fact that the second terminal is slap bang across where a second runway could have been built?

Mr. Soames: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me such a tremendous opportunity to say how grateful I was that the second terminal was located right where a second runway would have gone, because it forecloses the possibility of any development along those lines.

As I was saying, in the summary of overall conclusions the inspector said:

> "The history and development of airports policy on the part of administration after administration of whatever political colour has been characterised by ad hoc expediency, unacceptable and ill-judged procedures, ineptness, vacillation, uncertainty and ill-advised and precipitate judgments. Hopes of a wide sector of the regional population have been frequently raised and dashed. A strong public cynicism has inexorably grown. Political decisions in this field are no longer trusted."

Regardless of the very real and understandable concerns, the Government should accept the recommendations of the report. It has been an exhaustive, extensive and excursive inquiry, and the national interest, which should be paramount in this matter, dictates that the Government should accept the inspector's report, in which they should be sustained by the overwhelming majority of the House.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I can well understand the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) expressing a point of view that is tailored to his constituency. It is a valid point of view, considering the interests in his constituency, but it was obvious that it was not shared by all of his colleagues. When it comes to the vote, I hope many of them will join us in the Lobby because it is vital that we get away from the concept that when we debate air tranport we talk only about the south-east of England. It goes far wider. The trouble has been that the concept of air transport in the past has related only to the south-east. If someone is coming to this country by air, it has been very difficult to come in any other way than through the south-east.

A case should be made in the House for the development of the regional airports, and I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) for putting that case. That view is shared by many Conservative Members. If the proposals outlined in the report go ahead, they will lead to a widening of the north-south divide—a divide that is far too wide already. The north gets a poor share of the national cake. Unemployment is far higher in the north than in the south. Because of the Government's economic policy there has been an overall decline in industry, but that decline has been far more rapid in the north than in the south. Service industries are more developed in the south than in the north. The same occurs in the Health Service and in education.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced recently that aid to the regions will be cut. That will make the position far worse. If the development of Stansted goes ahead it will add to the burden that we have to bear in the north. I do not believe that it is possible to plan air transport to the year 2020. That is far too far ahead. It is reasonable to look only as far as the 1990s or the year 2000. The Eyre report has tried to look too far ahead. Therefore, hasty conclusions have been drawn in regard to Stansted. The inspector was trying to fill a gap to the 1990s but his recommendation is an expensive way to fill that gap. The cost would be £1,500 million to £2,000 million. That is money that should go to the regions.

We have to get away from the idea that the only way people can come here is to fly to London and then travel to the regions. A case should be made for the hub and spoke approach of using Manchester airport. Of the people who come in via London, 30 per cent. do not want to do so. They should be allowed to fly to the regions. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe said that only 38 per cent. stay in London while the rest go elsewhere.

I represent a constituency, Warrington, North, with one of the most successful new towns, and a very successful science park. If we are to attract related industries, they want to be able to transport their goods all over the world. Therefore, they want good communications, which means airport facilities.

Airport facilities are also necessary for tourism. Chester is an important tourist centre in the north-west. If we are to attract tourists, regional airports, particularly Manchester, should be developed.

Mr. Bill Walker: I am fascinated by what the hon. Gentleman has been saying. I ask him to accept that I am not an enemy. Can he suggest how airlines can be persuaded to take up the licences that already exist but are not used for services in and out of Manchester? What positive suggestions can he make to encourage airlines to develop services? There is not a shortage of terminal facilities or gateways but the airlines are not going there. What does the hon. Member suggest?

Mr. Hoyle: That is a fair point, but airlines have been prevented from going to Manchester as a matter of policy. Manchester has been excluded as a gateway to the United Kingdom for United States airlines because a bilateral agreement between Britain and the United States discourages them even from considering operating scheduled services from Manchester. Other foreign airlines wishing to use Manchester have been refused licences by the Government unless a British carrier gains something in return. That is one of the problems that Manchester has faced. We all know that Singapore International Airlines wishes to fly from Manchester, but at present it is unable to do so.

We want to develop intercontinental services. British Airways has recently announced a gratifying expansion of services from Manchester. There will be flights to New York in April, to Hong Kong in the autumn, to Munich, Malta and Geneva this summer and to Athens, Madrid, Oporto and Lisbon in 1986. Those are welcome signs for the future, but if Stansted goes ahead that welcome growth will be very much less. Even worse, not only will Manchester and other regional airports fail to develop fully but I fear that Speke airport in Liverpool may be forced to close. That would be a tragedy for Merseyside, with the loss of 500 direct jobs and many more indirect job losses. All airports generate jobs. Manchester accounts for 5,000 direct jobs and probably 15,000 indirect jobs. Here I must disclose an interest because 10 per cent. of the direct jobs are in Cheshire. Expansion is therefore vital to my area.

Manchester is at the centre of a region with 20 million people — 40 per cent. of the total United Kingdom population — whereas the south-east contains only one third of the population. There is no immutable rule that all major airport facilities should be in the south-east. If we are to attract employment as well as tourism to the regions we must do all that we can to ensure expansion of airport facilities. If Stansted goes ahead that development will be cut back and instead of getting away from overlocation of facilities in the south-east we shall underpin the existing system and further impoverish the regions. We do not want that to happen. We want the regional airports to expand. The success of Manchester shows that this could be achieved, with feeder services from the other regions. I do not share the pessimistic view that if Stansted does not go ahead the benefit will go to the continent.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): Not every hon. Member can speak in every debate, but he will appreciate that the case being made by the hon. Gentleman is of as much concern to people in my constituency as it is to those in his. The extension of Ringway airport and investment in those facilities and the jobs that they support in our area are thus equally important to both of us although we are on different sides of the House.

Mr. Hoyle: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for that intervention. We both have thick files of correspondence from companies in our constituencies pressing for the expansion of Ringway airport. It is no use spending public money on developing an attractive new town such as Warrington if the aim is then defeated because the airport is not expanded as the industries so successfully attracted to the area desire. Warrington has become one of the most successful new towns and a most attractive place to live, but businesses coming in regard the expansion of scheduled services and cargo facilities at the airport as vital to success in the future. They are glad that the new cargo terminal is going ahead, but the scheduled services are equally vital.

I have noted the number of interventions from Conservative Members to rebut the argument that the south-east is the answer to all our problems. I fear that if Stansted goes ahead it will not even be ready in the 1990s as the inspector has suggested. It may also prove to be a white elephant, involving vast and unnecessary expense. In looking to the year 2020 the inspector has looked much too far ahead. We cannot foresee what will happen by then, but if we go ahead with regional development we shall begin to see what further developments are necessary. The inspector suggests that Stansted will make a huge leap, catering for 15 million and eventually 25 million passengers per year, but we do not know whether airlines will go there. Charges will be low because the BAA is subsidising them, but we do not know whether that will be sufficient incentive. The Government will have to provide further inducements, but I fear that after all the disturbance and expense the traffic will not materialise. We know that there is demand for additional traffic in the regions. We know that the regions will respond, as the success of Manchester shows.

I was pleased to hear the Secretary of State say that he intended to listen to the arguments. I hope that everyone will listen. Even better, I hope that Conservative Members will express their disquiet in action by voting with us today. The Government will then appreciate fully the extent of the opposition to the Stansted proposal among Members on both sides of the House. The question crosses party lines and it cannot be decided on a party political basis. We must reach a decision based on what is best for the national interest. It cannot be good to widen the north-south divide in this way. The divide is already widening. One way to redress the balance is to put more money into the regions.

If we do not put more money into regional airport developments we shall be cutting off an arm that is vital to the regions, especially the north, in attracting new industry if there is an upturn in the economy. Without that development, we shall be competing with both hands tied behind our back. I hope that in the Division today the whole House will show that the answer lies not in Stansted but in developing the regional airport system.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): The average length of speech so far has been 23 minutes. I hope to be rather quicker than that.

Mr. Eyre, the inspector, described himself as a "reluctant volunteer" in this exercise, and I think that there is every reason for that. This is clearly a political decision. The method of using the planning inquiry is proving very unsatisfactory.

I give my thanks to the Government for arranging the debate. I have never criticised them, nor do I, for not tabling a substantive motion, but it leaves the House in a difficulty. I hope that somebody is beavering away in my right hon. Friend's Department to find a better way of coming to solutions and bringing these matters before the House in future.

The inspector has deluged us with figures. There is not a lot to be said for trying to quote them all, but one thing must be said. On the inspector's own figures the case for a massive expansion of capacity in the south-east has not in my view been made out if one interprets that massive increase as the necessity to build Stansted to the extent he sets out.

In 1985, to use the inspector's figures, there will be nearly 10 per cent. more capacity than passengers. In 1990, there will be about 4 per cent. more capacity than passengers. I refer to the south-east, using his figures. After 1995, if one accepts terminal 5—and I know that some of my hon. Friends would not — but without Stansted there will be 13 per cent. more capacity than passengers. It is not until 2000, if one accepts the inspector's figures, which most of us do not, that one begins to go over the top. On this basis there would be no urgency for any of us who did not object to the development of the fifth terminal.

Now hold on a minute, says Eyre, "there is a problem between 1993 and 1995; we shall go over the top before the terminal is completed. The shortfall amounts to 25 million passengers, he says, if BAA fully utilises its assets at Heathrow and Gatwick rising to 8·5 million if it does not.

Even if those projections are not overestimated, as I believe that they are, the shortfall is still based on the assumption that Luton does not go up to 5 million, that Stansted does not exceed 2 million and that there will be virtually no growth in the share of the regional airports between 1990 and 1995. None of those three propositions seems to me to be tenable.

If one takes those three possibilities, one observes that there is plenty of opportunity to fill his perceived gap without going into massive investment in Stansted. On the other hand, if we proceed with Stansted, we make proposals for another 15 million passengers at minimum, we have an expenditure of give or take £1 billion and the destruction of a large area of the countryside in order, let us be clear, to relieve the pressure on BAA and tour operators for the need of a little ingenuity and effort between 1993 and 1995.

The inspector's case for Stansted therefore rests in my view not on present needs but on future prospects. He wants to find a solution until 2020. The inspector said:

". . . the London airports system must have a capacity capability which could meet needs as, when and if they arise over a period of the next 30 years or more."

Such a proposition is untenable. If it were applied to any other activity, the people involved would of course applaud it. But it is absurd to suppose that such resources can be diverted as, when and if they may arise over 30 years.

The inspector's report is riddled with his fixation for certainty and the desire to complete the whole issue once and for all. I think that he wants to go down in history as the man who did it. He says:

"The production of a committed strategy now should remove the need for major reappraisals, examinations, studies and inquiries during the next 30 years or more."

Such a conclusion shows that intelligence is no guard against naivete.

My hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) drew attention to the changes that are occurring in technology. If we are considering the period between now and 2020, I am convinced that our children will be on package tours into outer space by then. The only certainty in all this is that the pace of technical change has far outgrown the ability of people to forecast accurately the way in which airport movements will develop.

As to the effect on the north, the inspector, as one might expect, was dismissive of the case for the north. He showed intense irritation. It seemed as though one was disturbing the smooth running of his mathematical model. Many of the points that he dismissed were not so daft as he seemed to imagine. He dismissed 1 per cent. of public expenditure on the airport alone as insignificant. I should like to hear that confirmed by the Secretary of State for the Environment. The inspector dismissed the proposition that profitable nationalised institutions such as BAA should make a contribution to the Exchequer. I look forward to having confirmation of that from the Chancellor. The inspector ignored totally the general economic effects of airport development in the northern region.

More important, the report spells out clearly why Stansted as planned will siphon off the growth from the regional airports. The inspector himself does the job. He is describing not three airports but an airport system. He is talking about a "single category A gateway international airports system."

It is one airport in three places. The object of the exercise is to transfer non-scheduled and other leisure services to Stansted in order to transfer scheduled services from Heathrow to Gatwick. Luton, it is said, will attract leisure services inside and outside the south-eastern area.

The concept of one south-eastern airport sounds fine as a unit until one examines what it means in practice. The British Airports Authority made a profit on its trading concessions last year of £98·8 million. Only Heathrow broke even on traffic costs. Four million pounds went to Stansted. We are told by Mr. Payne that that subsidy is to continue.

British Airways sent all Members of Parliament a position paper which says:

"As an inducement to prospective airlines/users, Stansted charges would remain lower than those at Heathrow or Gatwick. Considering Gatwick expansion as a discrete investment, the level of income generated would be unlikely to be sufficient to provide an adequate return on capital employed. In such circumstances, Stansted would rely on a cross-subsidy from Heathrow/Gatwick."

At present that £4 million works out at £11 per passenger. Applied to Manchester, it means that the airport would be getting the equivalent of £66 million subsidy a year. I am not asking for a subsidy—we do not want one—but I am making clear the size of the operation already taking place at Stansted. Tour operators at Stansted will be paying £1,079 in landing fees. In Manchester the figure is £3,995. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) asked why Manchester is so dear. In fact, Manchester is the cheapest outside London. The reason why London is cheap is that if one multiplies that £11 by the 450 passengers in a jumbo one comes pretty close to the subsidy affecting Stansted.

It is clear that whatever my right hon. Friend decides to do we must be certain that Stansted is maintained as a discrete operation, relying upon its own operations to make its own profits. I wonder whether, if that condition is imposed, the British Airports Authority will be quite so keen to take it on.

Today we are confronted with many scares. One of them is that we are trying to compel people to go north. There is a certain irony in that because for years people in the north have been trundling down to Luton to pick up their tours. Some of us did not take kindly to the CAA which is reported as saying

"Short of compelling people in London and the South East to travel by road and rail to the Midlands and North in order to catch flights . . . "

We have been doing that for 10 or 15 years, so that that is a bit thick.

We are not seeking compulsion. If the imbalance in subsidy between Stansted and the regional airports were put right the ability of those airports to compete, particularly in the leisure trade, would be much sharpened and there would be a considerable movement in the airlines' own choice about where they sought to go.

The second limitation on the development of the airports is licensing. Reference has been made to unused licences. There is a penumbra about negotiations which never quite come to the surface. The Ministry will say "We have not had an application." The reason is that people will not spend nine months preparing an application if they know that it will be turned down. There is a lot of wink and nod in this business. Some licences which were dropped have been taken up again.

Specific and important changes have to be made. For example, we cannot fly into Manchester from the United States if we do not use BA. We are covered by the Bermuda 2 agreement. That applies to freight as well as passengers. I referred to an example the other day because it staggered me. The largest American freight airline is Flying Tigers. Four times a week that airline flies between Brussels and New York. About 70 per cent. of the freight comes from the north of England. It goes by truck and boat to Brussels and is flown in an aircraft which passes over Manchester airport.

I know that my right hon. Friend will do his best to bring about changes in Bermuda 2, but he may not be so keen about some other matters. Many licences have been opposed by British Airways in the past. It is a matter of assessing whether the development of the airports is as important, more important or less important than British Airways' profits.

Let us take the classic case of Singapore Airlines. Opening up the route between Singapore and Manchester would mean some loss of money to British Airways. Our estimate is about £2 million revenue, which means that we are talking about a much lower sum in terms of profit. One must set against that the fact that our business men have to take an extra day off, and other factors. These matters have to be decided with a fresh mind. We have to look at them from the point of view of the people who use the regional airports. If we do that, we shall begin to see a different ball game. We should consider better the tourist trade and improved communications by rail and accelerate the links with the main rail lines. We should make a better effort to ensure that the 29 per cent. of people who begin their journey in the regions are accommodated in the regions.

My right hon. Friend is a worldly-wise man. I think that he and I share a scepticism about many of the propositions put before us which parade as idealism but which are merely vested interests dressed up. However, I urge him, just occasionally, to recognise that for some issues scepticism is a bad guide. Opposition to the Eyre report is one such issue.

There is a solution in which practicality, realistic planning and vision walk hand in hand. In coming to that conclusion, I want to leave my right hon. Friend with this thought. I want him to understand clearly that the sense of division in the country is not drummed up for the occasion. It burns in the minds of people of all politics, and of none. It is not a passing fashion. One can feel it; one can taste it. It is in the very pulse of the north. The remedy does not lie in huge sums of money — though they may be important — nor in yet more statistical analyses. The remedy lies in commitment and, above all, in imagination.

The Eyre report is the product of an unimaginative, legal and bureaucratic tradition that the Government set out to challenge. It is clever, polite, arrogant, logical—and wrong. It is concerned with established guidelines for policy and not with establishing a new national policy.

Despite the speech of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), which I found offensive and silly, I am asking all my right hon. and hon. Friends who feel that the massive expansion at Stansted should not take place to vote with Opposition Members for the Adjournment of the House.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I remind the House that the 10 minute limit on speeches is now in operation. I appeal for co-operation. If time is nearly running out, I shall try to assist hon. Members with some sign language.

7.7 pm

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): I am grateful for being given the chance to follow the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester), who made two observations which have thrown my speech somewhat. He began by condemning the Eyre report. The hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) has the full report with her. I am sure that she will pass it round to any hon. Members who wish to read it. I have only the summary. Chapter 10 on page 28 bears out what the hon. Member for Withington said. Paragraph 7.7 of the conclusion states:

"Regional airports should not"—

note the words—

"and cannot make so large a contribution to satisfying future demand as to remove or substantially reduce the need for further capacity in the south-east."

We know the inspector's view right from the start—he is totally prejudiced.

Hon. Members of my age group in the Chamber today will remember that when the silent films gave way to the talkies the Indian always used to say to the cowboy "White man speak with forked tongue." Likewise speaks the chairman of the British Airports Authority. He knows my view. He tells us in the north that he has no objection to regional airports. One must ask what he has done to assist the regions. The answer is, precisely nothing. When the Civil Aviation Bill was going through the House I said that it was the "Civil Aviation (Norman Payne) Bill". He has left his mark on the report.

Mr. Gale: Of course he was heard. He gave evidence to the inquiry—so did NOERC.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Of course he was heard, but this is supposed to be a neutral report. The hon. Gentleman should not be excessively influenced by one person or one organisation. The north-west and the north have been ignored. The views of the people of Manchester are not unknown. We believe that we deserve a share. I agree totally with the recommendation in the Eyre report that Heathrow should be expanded. I believe that the figure of 275,000 movements per annum was plucked out of the air.

When I last spoke on this issue, I referred to the time, 45 years ago, when I was a navigator. When we returned to base we were stacked at various levels, normally at 500 ft., and wondered whether our fuel would run out. The stacking caused noise problems in the area. This is happening above places like Midhurst. It is no laughing matter if one lives at Midhurst. However, there have been substantial advances in technology since then. To put my point in perspective, I should mention that at the end of the war I was using some of the most advanced radar equipment in the world. When I now enter a cockpit, I am staggered by what can be done.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): The hon. Gentleman says that he agrees with the Eyre recommendation about Heathrow. The hon. Gentleman also mentioned noise. Does he not think that it was a little presumptive of Eyre to recommend that there should be a curfew, not only at Heathrow, but at Gatwick, when his inquiry did not consider the problem of noise? No evidence on noise was taken. Surely, therefore, the number of movements into and out of Heathrow is pre-empted if a stipulation is imposed that there should be a curfew. Because of the technological advances to which the hon. Gentleman referred, surely it is time for the curfew to be a thing of the past.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Traffic-handling methods will be substantially improved. Aircraft will stay on course and will be controlled from perhaps 2,000 miles away. These methods will result in economic cruising and low speed safe flying. As for the hub and spoke concept, aircraft like the Super 748, the ATP and the 146 will be extremely quiet. They are mainly hub and spoke aircraft. Therefore, their operational performance will improve. This bears out the point made by the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin).

There will be similar advantages with long-haul flights. The Airbus is a much quieter aircraft. Those of us who used to try to sleep at the end of a grass runway with a couple of Merlin engines going over every two minutes sympathise with those who live near Heathrow. However, the noise level at Heathrow will steadily decrease, particularly by 1986, when the Trident will be phased out. The BAC111s will be able to fly only if they are fitted with hush kits. The new generation of aircraft will be quieter. We shall move to about 330,000 movements per annum at Heathrow, with less noise being generated. So the figure plucked out of the air of 275,000 movements per annum is no longer sacrosanct. Therefore, I support the creation of a fifth London terminal and an increase in the number of landings at Heathrow.

However, I cry, "Halt, hold, enough" about Stansted. I want there to be positive discrimination in the interests of the regions. The British Airports Authority practises discrimination over its pricing policy at Stansted and Luton. The local authority at Luton has complained bitterly that, while Stansted was and is being subsidised by Heathrow and Gatwick for handling predominantly charter flights, Luton, which is engaged in the same business, is being undercut on account of cross-subsidisation by the British Airports Authority. It seems that Eyre is a very expensive proposition if it is related to what is said by the BAA. We are told that Stansted will be a super charter airport. Although it may take some scheduled flights, it will be used mainly by charter aircraft. That is unfair.

I deal next with the north-west and the north, a deprived area that needs to be supported. Questions have been asked about why certain routes have not been taken up. Predominantly, it is because they are unattractive routes. It is as simple as that. Let us not make a mystery out of something that is simple. I hope that the projected flights by British Airways from Manchester to the United States and from Manchester to Hong Kong are a great success. This region needs to be supported. This project demonstrates what can be done with scheduled flights. If flights were attracted to the north, the load factor in the south-east would be relieved. Instead of traffic being diverted from Heathrow to Schiphol, it will be diverted from Heathrow to Manchester. There will be positive discrimination in favour of the north-west.

My only regret is that Ministers will not be present for the vote tonight.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): I am grateful for the opportunity to follow the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones). I cannot support all that the hon. Member said. Nevertheless, I respect his tremendous experience and his views concerning regional airports. I shall confine my remarks to the reasons why I believe that a fifth terminal should not be constructed at Heathrow. I do not intend to deal with other issues. However, the Government must reach a conclusion on Stansted, Gatwick and the provincial airports. They must make up their mind about how to approach the matter and at the same time satisfy both the major and the smaller airlines.

Even if we began work tomorrow on a fifth terminal it could not be completed before 1996. That is an important matter. Even if we began work this week upon that terminal it would be too late to meet the immediate demand. Even if work upon the necessary road and rail connections were to begin now, they could not be completed before the year 2000. Even if it were authorised, this would be too late.

My constituency is one of the worst affected by noise. I have fought consistently to reduce the noise, by pressing for a limit on the number of flights and by urging the development of quieter aircraft. Such planes will result in some reduction of the noise. The noise level under the Heathrow flight path is not only almost unendurable during the day, but is unacceptable at weekends. I do not accept that the noise can be reduced in the immediate future, whether or not quieter aircraft are introduced.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State mentioned the Roskill commission, the third terminal, the number of flights being limited to 275,000 a year, the fourth terminal and so on. I thought that the fifth terminal had been buried without trace. Unfortunately, it was brought back to life by a planning application by Uttlesford District Council.

I object to the fifth terminal because it will lead to increased noise, traffic congestion and the removal of the Perry Oaks sewage station. There is also considerable opposition from local councils. Between 500,000 and 1 million people already suffer the almost unendurable noise under the flight path to Heathrow. The removal of the sewage plant might not take as long as was first thought, but it would still delay the building of a fifth terminal. Buckinghamshire, Berkshire and Surrey county councils and others oppose the building of a fifth terminal. I received a letter today from Berkshire county council setting out its objections.

One of the most difficult problems posed by a fifth terminal would be road congestion. Cromwell road is the most congested part of London apart from Hyde Park corner. The extension of the Piccadilly line was welcome, but I am told that it carries only 8 per cent. of the Heathrow traffic. Whatever we do, we cannot improve the road network. The Cromwell road and Talgarth road areas are so built up that it would be impossible to widen those roads. Even if they were widened, they could still not take all the traffic. If a fifth terminal is built, traffic will be nose to tail from central London to 10 miles outside the city. Even if the rail link were completed and the Piccadilly line were extended further, people would still choose to use the roads, which would result in enormous traffic congestion.

The Government have given numerous promises that a fifth terminal would not be built. Sir John Nott said:

"we do not favour a fifth terminal, and that is also the view of the inspector." — [Official Report, 21 February 1980; Vol. 979, c. 694.]

On 3 November 1980, in column 411, my right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said in answer to a question that the Government's view remained the same as was stated in the House on 17 December 1979. On 23 July 1981, in column 193, in answer to a question put by me my hon. Friend the then Under-Secretary of State for Trade confirmed the Government's views again and, on 3 March 1982, I intervened repeating the Government's pledges. Pledges were also given on 22 February 1984 in column 948, on 21 November 1984 in column 301 and on 20 December 1984 in column 567. The Government have given unequivocal pledges that they will not construct a fifth air terminal.

Apart from increases in noise levels, practical difficulties will be caused by the building of a new terminal. Much more important, though, are the pledges given by the Government. The circumstances have not altered and I trust that the Government will honour those pledges.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is always generous in giving way, but he was not able to give way to me today when I wanted to ask him a question. The form of our debate was inevitable because of the legal complications, but a vote in the House will be of no significance, because it could be interpreted outside as a vote for or against the fifth terminal and for or against the development of Stansted. The whole thing is mixed up. If hon. Members vote to reject the inspector's report, are they rejecting the fifth terminal? Are they rejecting the development of Stansted? Are they rejecting regional airports policy? The truth is that they will be rejecting the lot.

Surely the object of the debate is to give the Government the opportunity of listening to those of us who have constituency and national interests at heart and to form a judgment on our views.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): My hon. Friend says that any vote in the House could be interpreted in any way, but I hope that no vote will be interpreted as opening the way to a reconsideration of a green field site.

Dr. Glyn: I agree with my hon. Friend. A vote in the House would be meaningless because the public and the press could interpret it as meaning whatever they wanted it to mean.

The Government gave a pledge and I rely on them to make sure that it is honoured.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in the debate and to follow the excellent contributions that have already been made.

The debate is important, and the Secretary of State said that he would listen carefully to what was said. I hope that he will also take careful note of what is said. Ministers will not be voting at the end of the debate, and it is therefore important that as many Conservative Members as possible vote to show the strength of the House's feeling on this issue.

I strongly support the case put by the NOERC, and I oppose the major development of Stansted. I support a national airports policy, with more development of regional airports. That will best meet the needs of the nation in the years ahead.

The financial involvement in Stansted would be £450 million for the airport and associated developments, £160 million for a rail link and between £500 million and £1 billion for infrastructure, depending on the ultimate potential of the airport. That investment will be made at the expense of other parts of the country. It will not be additional public expenditure, and the other parts of the country will have to pay for that major investment in the south. That is a major factor.

Airports attract jobs, and I am aware of the developments that took place because of the foresight of the former Manchester city council, and later of the Greater Manchester and city of Manchester councils, which co-operated with each other. I have that awareness because at one stage I lived close to Manchester airport. The councils have always been prepared to develop the airport in advance of demands to meet the needs of those in the area. Job opportunities are not confined to Manchester airport. Developments within the airport have a ripple effect in the area generally.

Unemployment in the north is far worse than in the south. In the south as a whole there is unemployment of between 6 and 9 per cent., and in the Stansted area there is a very low rate of unemployment. It would be wrong to create more job opportunities in an area where opportunities are already better than elsewhere instead of taking the development to the north. Job opportunities for white collar and service industry employees in my constituency are minimal as it is heavily over-dependent on manufacturing industries. It is over-dependent also on factories and other industrial buildings which were erected before 1914, which have long since seen their better days. It is important that development money should be put into the regions.

There are about 20 million people living in the area around Manchester airport, and if more services were available from the airport they would be used. By concentrating on Manchester airport, I do not underestimate the importance of developing other regional airports. I am emphasising the importance of Manchester because I am well aware of its importance in constituency terms. If those living in the Manchester area want to take a flight from Manchester airport for their holidays, it is necessary for them to make an early booking with the travel companies. That is imperative if they want a flight direct from Manchester. Two years ago I tried to get a flight to Bulgaria from Manchester and was unable to do so. Ultimately, I had to accept a flight from Gatwick.

Bringing one's wife and children down from Manchester to London so as to fly from Gatwick can involve considerable additional cost. Those who do so will opt to fly, to travel by train or to use their car. There is extra expense, and sometimes great inconvenience. Those who use their car are left wondering in what state they will find the car when they return from their fortnight's holiday.

I am glad that the Minister for Housing and Construction is on the Government Front Bench because I am aware that he received a copy of a letter which appeared in the Daily Telegraph a few weeks ago on housing development. The letter which was sent to him was signed by Mr. Alf Norris and Mr. Patton, the chairman and secretary of the National Housing and Town Planning Council for the North West Regional Executive Committee. The letter is directed to the housing development that would have to take place at Stansted. This would happen at the expense of housing in other areas.

The letter reads:

"During the past few years housing programmes have borne the major part of public expenditure cuts and the incidence of identified homelessness has increased. Against such a background many local housing authorities will view the recommended development of Stansted with concern and dismay. In his report Mr. Graham Eyre, QC estimates that a projected capacity of 15 million passengers a year would require the construction of some 10,000 new homes and if capacity were boosted to 25 million passengers some 17,000 new homes might be required. The evidence presented to the inquiry by the Department of the Environment made it clear that development in and around Stansted should be facilitated by a reallocation or re-distribution of resources and the Government could not be committed to provide new additional capital investment."

If that is taken literally, it means that the Government will deprive other areas to pay for development at Stansted. At the same time as paying for that development, they will not get the type of air service that they require in the region. I am sure that the argument on housing could be advanced to cover hospitals, schools and many other items of infrastructure.

It is clear that financial and infrastructure developments, and future Government capital investment would have greater emphasis on the south if the Stansted development were to go ahead. It is believed in the north that there is currently a two-nation divide. If the Government decide to go ahead with the Stansted development, the divide will become even wider. That will strengthen the belief of many that the Government intend to make Britain a two-nation state.

It is no good issuing licences and then saying that they are not taken up if they do not include destinations to which people wish to travel. It is obviously important that passengers should be able to fly direct to America from Manchester. Many industrialists in my constituency have emphasised the importance of communications. They speak of the need to improve the motorways and the railway system and stress that there should be much better direct air connections to the continent and the United States.

The argument that I am presenting is supported fully by Lancashire county council, which believes firmly in the proposals of the North of England Regional Consortium. Those proposals are supported in turn by the North East Lancashire development association.

I presume that within the past couple of days most hon. Members have received the book entitled "Deadlock at Stansted: The Way Out" by Sir Colin Buchanan. We all know of Sir Colin's reputation on road transport. I am sure we are all aware that he served on the commission which considered the third London airport in 1968-70. Sir Colin's conclusions are important. The book states:

"Complicated and intertwined and to some extent unassessable though the issues in this controversy may be, they nevertheless seem amenable to a commonsense judgement. It cannot be said that a proven case exists for a third London airport; the London airports system as postulated by the Inspector seems designed to continue a heavy draw-in of traffic from the regions to the disbenefit of regional travellers; to give the regional airports greater scope would make sense in relation to the spread of the population and would aid economic recovery; and finally there is the incontrovertible environmental case against the expansion of Stansted expressed by many parties with a strength and conviction which no government could over-ride except by decree little short of brutality.

Everything surely points in one direction, namely to leave the position as it is described in the guide book".

That sums up the case, and I hope that when the Division takes place Conservative Members will support Opposition Members in the Lobby.

7.37 pm

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): It is 12 years since my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), the then Prime Minister, told me to get on with the job of building a third London airport and to have it ready by about 1985. The reason for his instruction was the report to which the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) has referred. It told us that by 1985 to 1990, on all the projections of the British Airports Authority, the Civil Aviation Authority and the other aviation organisations, London would be so clogged with aircraft and passengers that everything would come to a dead stop.

We are now in 1985. We all know that I failed—and that the third London airport was not built. However, London has not come to a dead stop. That leads me to conclude that the Government should be sceptical of all the statistical certainties that are offered to them by experts. Sir Norman Payne has been quoted today as calling Stansted an "oasis of opportunity". Norman Payne, as he was when I was an Under-Secretary of State in the Department of the Environment and the responsible Minister, told me that Stansted was the wrong place and that the right decision was Maplin.

Had we gone for Maplin, it would have been the right decision for the nation and the right decision for hon. Members who represent people around Heathrow, Gatwick and Luton because we would have moved the growth of traffic away from these places and put it where it belongs—on a site adjacent to the sea. But for the fact that the Conservatives lost the 1974 election, Maplin would today be in operation. In the event, the Labour party killed it. As a result, we now face the sad fact that we shall require more airport capacity in the south-east by the early 1990s, but we do not have it. So the only question is where is that capacity to be provided.

My view is similar to that of British Airways, whose chairman I admire. I favour increasing the use of Stansted to the capacity that it now has. That could probably reach to between 4 million and 5 million passengers per year, and while that would not be greatly popular in the area such development could be sustained. It could also be done quickly and relatively cheaply, and with the M11 already in place that would be a sensible decision to take.

Secondly, I strongly favour an improvement of our regional airports. But I am not in favour of coercing people. We should go for the development of regional airports, notably Manchester, in line with genuine market demand. I am not sure what that demand is. We heard from the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) about the Bulgarian airline's letting down Manchester. Perhaps it had reasons for doing that. I favour increasing regional airports but only at the rate that proper market demand will bring about.

Neither of those solutions — the development of Stansted and developing the regions—will fill the gap in London. I have therefore come to the reluctant conclusion that the right decision is to get on now with the fifth terminal on the sewage works at Heathrow. I regret to have to say this because I, too, as a Minister gave pledges that we would not increase Heathrow airport nor build at Stansted. But we are today in a new situation. We have to deal with things as they are.

We should, therefore, get on fast with the fifth terminal at Heathrow, and I must tell my hon. Friends, whose feelings, heaven knows, I understand, that this will not be as bad as they fear. Fortunately, there has been a dramatic quietening of aircraft. The noise problem will not be as severe as they suggest.

Unfortunately, our record as a nation in getting on with great and imaginative projects is not good. We did not do the Thames barrier well. We have failed so far with the Channel tunnel. That is why I am concerned over the inspector's depressing conclusion that we could not build a fifth terminal at Heathrow before 1995 or later, that it could take 15 years. That is not acceptable to a modern nation. I appreciate the differences, but we built an airport on the Falklands in about 18 months.

The problem, however, is not the building but the planning. There is the rub. The Minister will find in his Department, if he turns up the records, ample material from the water industry—I had some reponsibility for that, too — to demonstrate that the technology is available rapidly to change the sewerage system at London airport, by flaring and other systems. We do not need, as the inspector suggested, two or three years to test the feasibility of removing the sludge beds. It is feasible. Nor do we need three or four more years to complete the removal of the sewage works to another place. All of that could and should be truncated.

The Government should therefore decide quickly to get on with the fifth terminal and put all their backing behind it. Let them bring before Parliament a special development order. Never mind having further planning inquiries. Let us get on with it now, reflecting on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) that Governments of both parties have lacked the ability to grip exciting, important national projects and carry them through effectively.

What my right hon. Friend wants to hear today is where we stand. I recommend that we should take Stansted to its existing capacity, build up the regional airports as far as possible in accordance with what the market demands and, above all, go now for the fifth terminal at Heathrow. Let us make London the best and most modern airport in the world.

7.45 pm

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Hon. Members will note that I am wearing a Manchester International airport tie. Thus, my allegiance is not in any way hidden. Manchester International is extremely important to my constituency. The only trouble with it is that it is not called Stockport international as it should be because it is only 10 minutes away from Stockport and the main flight path goes directly over my constituency.

Despite the extreme importance of that airport to my constituency, I join other hon. Members—this shows that we are not being dog in the manger over the issue —in recognising the necessity for some expansion in the south-east, although that is contrary to the view of many pressure groups in the south-east. Indeed, to us in the north-west which is short of jobs and suffering great unemployment problems, it seems extraordinary to build a second terminal at Gatwick right in the centre of the place where the second runway should be, all to reduce expansion.

We would give our right arm for that sort of chance around Manchester. We find it equally extraordinary that people in the vicinity of Heathrow should be campaigning against further development, although that would result in a boost to the economy and more jobs. Because we find that extraordinary, we in the north-west are inclined to say, "A curse on your house and to heck with you in the south-east."

However, we have a duty to United Kingdom Ltd. and we recognise the extreme importance to Britain of the aircraft and airline industry. For that reason, and having studied the figures, we accept that there must be some expansion in the south-east. Where is that expansion to take place? The choice seems to be between terminal 5 at Heathrow and an expansion of Stansted, or both.

The Department of Transport has accepted that there is need for expansion, at the most by 15 million passengers, and it is clear that the best place for that expansion is Heathrow. That is where the passengers want to be. At present, Heathrow is the largest and most successful hub airport in Europe. To retain its success, it must expand, otherwise the traffic will go to Schiphol or Paris—not because Stansted has not expanded but because Heathrow has not expanded. That will drive additional transport away from the south-east, and the sooner we recognise that the better.

Anybody who has taken an interest in the airline industry realises the importance of hub airports. Where better to look for proof of that than Atlanta where, with a population of just over 1 million, that city last year catered for 38 million passengers. That happened merely by developing a hub network. If we do not continue to expand our hub network at Heathrow, we shall be failing not just the south-east and the north but the whole nation.

It is nonsense to suggest that scheduled traffic can move to Stansted. It will not move there. People do not want to go there. We have seen what happened when people tried to direct traffic from Heathrow to Gatwick. We remember that Air Canada, Air Portugal and Iberian Airways said, "Over our dead bodies." In fact, they did not go to Gatwick and, in the end, British Airways moved its Iberian routes there and suffered a great loss.

There is absolutely no need for development at Stansted. There is the proposed terminal 5 at Heathrow, the second terminal at Gatwick, now being built, and there is capacity at Luton by catering for 3 million. During the past four years the number of flights into Luton has decreased because of the predatory methods adopted by the British Airports Authority at Stansted and Gatwick. That is what will happen to the rest of the regional airports throughout the midlands and the north of England if this vast airport at Stansted is expanded to take 15 million passengers. It is clear that the only flights to use Stansted will be charter flights, no scheduled flights. That will have dreadful effects on the regions.

Only 7 million or 8 million charter flights use airports in the south-east. From where will the expansion to 15 million passengers come? Assuming that every single charter flight moved from Heathrow and Gatwick to Stansted, there would still be room for another 7 million passengers. Obviously, the extra traffic will come from the regional airports — East Midlands, Leeds-Bradford, Birmingham, Manchester and Luton—and will have a devastating effect on those regions.

Clearly, we must improve the scheduled services from Manchester, and I support what hon. Members representing the north-west have said. I point out to those hon. Members who represent airports in the midlands and north of England the number of charter flights as a percentage of international flights using airports in the regions: East Midlands, 90 per cent.; Leeds—Bradford, 72·7 per cent.; Birmingham, 73·5 per cent.; Manchester, 81·6 per cent.; and Luton, 99·6 per cent. Would not Sir Norman Payne like this 15 million capacity leisure airport at Stansted? What effect would that have on the regions, losing not what they hope to obtain in the future but what they already have?

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): The one mistake that hon. Members have not made in this debate is to argue that this is a party political matter. It is extremely useful that the Ministers will not participate in the vote. It is important to recognise that ministerial pronouncements are not exactly written on tablets of stone, no matter which party the Ministers represent. The atrophying effect of office as shown in a person's mental attitude seems to suggest that some people do not look at the position outside the south as flexibly as one would hope.

I hope that we are arguing for a distribution of airports, which are vital economic necessities covering and servicing not just one part of Britain, of which London is the capital, but the whole of the United Kingdom. It is valuable to point out that we are not talking about a country the size of the United States, where there are thousands of miles between cities. We are talking about a fairly small island in which it is useful to find that economic resources and transport resources, of which airports are the key, are distributed to allow the development of our national assets.

I am not making political points, but it is important to note that there was unemployment of 5 per cent. in the constituency that I represented in 1979. Even with the adjustment of statistics, the rate is now between 20 and 30 per cent. We are talking about Manchester airport, which serves not just Bolton and the north-west, but is an international airport. There are 70,000 unemployed youngsters under 25 and another 20,000 youngsters on various schemes in the north-west. There is long-term unemployment of 100,000 in the same area. In the south there is unemployment of between 6 and 9 per cent., and perhaps around Stansted the rate is much lower—3 per cent. or so.

My argument concerns not simply the fact that the airports produce jobs, but the fact that an airport at Manchester provides the economic gateway to the region. What employer from Japan or elsewhere will establish a factory in a north-west town when he needs to fly to Heathrow and then drive up motorways for three or four hours? The north-west has lost many key manufacturing industries. When and if the economic revival comes, the airport will be the vital link and the lifeline by which we can regenerate economic activity.

Manchester airport is midway between Scotland and the south of England. A great deal of tourist trade can be generated by air communications, and that is vital to the region's economy. In the past, Manchester airport has been actively discriminated against. The long-stay car park at Manchester charges £2·90 a day, while the charge at Stansted is virtually a few pence a day. I am told that, because of the Bermuda agreement, American carriers are not allowed to fly to Manchester airport.

We are asking for what the textile industry has requested under all previous Governments — fair competition. We do not make our request on a party basis — Labour, SDP or Liberal. It seems that SDP and Liberal Members cannot find time to attend the debate. We ask those who have an interest in the north-west region to support its key airport. If a third airport is created, it should be created in an area that will serve not only the north-west but virtually the north of England. We have a right to say to the official minds, "Britain does not stop at Watford."

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Civilisation stops at Watford.

Mr. Young: It depends on the area from which one comes. Judging by the behaviour of some hon. Members, I should not have thought civilisation had even entered the south.

It is necessary to recognise that millions of north-west constituents will depend on Manchester airport, including the communications thereby provided. We need the support of the House — [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentlemen wish to have the Floor, I shall give them the opportunity to do so. It might be useful if they listened to the northern and not simply the southern point. We are talking about the north, and hon. Gentlemen would be courteous if they listened to our point of view.

We should recognise that many hon. Members, from all parties, are talking on behalf of their constituents who will need this link, and we hope that the vote will show the Minister that that link must be provided.

8 pm

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Mr. Young) has spoken with great force about the needs of his town and region. I will take up later the points that he made.

First, however, I should like to remind the House of the population statistics for the areas around Heathrow and Stansted. The Home Office figures, based on the 1981 census, show that within 10 miles of Heathrow there are 1,700,000 people. Within 10 miles of Stansted, there are 115,000 people — only one fourteenth as many. The large number of people living around Heathrow are just as sensitive to the quality of their life and surroundings as anyone else. I include my constituents in Twickenham, Teddington, the Hamptons and Whitton.

The House should not forget that five Members who represent constituencies near Heathrow are either Ministers or Whips, and, by convention, they do not speak on matters affecting other Departments — my hon. Friends the Members for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Hayhoe), for Putney (Mr. Mellor), for Esher (Mr. Mather), for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton) and for Reading, West (Mr. Durant), who is in his place. My hon. Friends have made their views known in their own way, and no one should assume that if there are five fewer speakers from the Heathrow area the people living there are any less well represented.

The large population around Heathrow has been told time and again that it is Conservative Government policy not to build a fifth terminal at Heathrow, and it has believed it. My right hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins) quoted eight instances of statements by Ministers in the present Government to that effect. I can add another. On 4 August 1981, when he was Secretary of State, the Leader of the House wrote to me on this point. He said:

"In his letter to you on 13 November 1980, which was issued as a Press Notice by my Department, Norman Tebbit, the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade, confirmed that the Government's view remained unchanged; and in reply to a Parliamentary Question by Kenneth Carlisle on 13 May 1981, I re-affirmed the Government's view that a fifth terminal at Heathrow should not be provided. I do not think this can leave you in any doubt about the Government's view on this matter."

Those repeated statements of policy have come to be seen as amounting virtually to pledges. There will be a great sense of betrayal in constituencies around Heathrow if a fifth terminal is built. Those who want the pledges abandoned are saying that the opinion of a planning inspector who is no more than an adviser — albeit a distinguished adviser — should carry more weight than the commitment and good name of a Conservative Government.

The previous inspector, Mr. Justice Glidewell, was just as eminent as Mr. Eyre if not more so. He reported on the Heathrow fourth terminal with great distinction and took exactly the opposite view. He said:

"it is in my view essential that, if they decide to permit Terminal Four, the Secretaries of State"— the Secretaries of State for Trade and for the Environment —

"should at the same time reiterate that it is the Government's policy that there will be neither a fifth terminal nor any major expansion at Heathrow".

That view was accepted by the Government. There is no reason whatever why the House should attach more weight to the opinions of Mr. Eyre than to those of Mr. Justice Glidewell.

The traffic aspect is extremely important. With three terminals open at Heathrow, the number of passengers there per year is 28 million or 29 million. When the fourth terminal opens later this year, it is expected that there will be 39 million passengers per year. If a fifth terminal were built, there would be 52 million — nearly double the present figure. That could mean an extra 60,000 or 70,000 passengers passing through Heathrow every day, with all the necessary back-up services. Eighty per cent. of passengers go to Heathrow by road and, however one may fiddle about with railway lines, that proportion is unlikely to drop substantially.

Most hon. Members are familiar with the A4, the Cromwell road, which leads through west London towards Heathrow. That road is already heavily congested, and not only at peak hours. The extra traffic for the fourth and fifth terminals would jam up the Cromwell road. Mr. Eyre had no adequate answer to that problem. The congestion would spread into parallel roads and, eventually, throughout west London.

There are already 750 flights a day through Heathrow. At times, a plane flies over my constituents every 1½ minutes. It is the frequency of the flights that distresses people, not merely the peak loudness of each flight. The assumptions made by the inspector and repeated by various statutory bodies are based on the noise and number index. I was glad to see from a letter that I received only this morning from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport that the noise and number index and the formula for assessing the amount of aircraft noise is under review and that there will be a fresh report on it in April. The new report may render invalid some of the inspector's assumptions about the measurement of aircraft noise.

People in my constituency and neighbouring constituencies will not be content with a continuation of the present level of aircraft noise. They want a substantial and permanent reduction. The burden of aircraft noise must be shared more fairly. It is totally inequitable to pile more and more of a burden—whether the burden is in the form of traffic or of aircraft noise—on the 1·75 million people living around Heathrow in order to protect the far smaller population around Stansted. We should remember that, although I heard what my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) said, three out of four members of that population do not want that protection in any case. Even if we take those living within a 10-mile radius of Stansted rather than a 30-mile radius—

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Jessel: A significant proportion of people within the 10-mile radius do not want protection.

Stansted is not virgin territory. There is a great fat runway two miles long there. That excellent runway is under-used. The excellent motorway connection between the M11 and the M25 and other good roads provides the capacity for a great deal more traffic. All those national assets are being under-used.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: The situation is ludicrous. Neither Heathrow nor Stansted appears to want the extra facility, but Manchester is longing for it.

Mr. Jessel: The nub of the problem is that every year 3 million more people want to fly in and out of south-east England. The figure for this year is 47 million, not 45 million as has been said. The inspector calculated that the figure would rise to 61 million in five years and to 75 million in 10 years. He worked out that by 1990 there would be no more room at Heathrow and Gatwick for any more passengers. He also calculated that there is no way in which the fifth terminal at Heathrow could be opened before 1996.

It is only in the past few days that we have suddenly been told that there will be no need for a new waterworks. If so, why was not that point made during the inquiry? The case remains completely unproven. The inspector found that, because of the need to move the waterworks at Perry Oaks elsewhere, it would take 12 years to construct the fifth terminal at Heathrow. The fifth terminal at Heathrow, therefore, could not do the job in time. He concluded that only Stansted could provide the additional capacity to meet the demands during the early to mid-1990s.

The Manchester argument, about which we have heard a great deal and will no doubt hear a great deal more, sounds all right until we ask what it means. It means that someone who lives in Twickenham, Eastbourne or Finchley who wants to take a holiday in Spain after 1990 will be told "Sorry chum, you cannot go through Heathrow or Gatwick because there is no room for you. To get your holiday in Spain you must go to Manchester". People will not stand for that. The same is true for incoming Americans who want to do their usual Tower of London and Stonehenge trip. Rather than come through Manchester they will go to some other country——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's 10 minutes have come to an end.

8.10 pm

Mr. Graham Bright (Luton, South): This debate is crucial to my constituents. Since 1979, we have had to live with the possibility of Luton airport having to be closed if there is major development at Stansted. That would mean the loss of more than 7,000 jobs and the closure of the second largest business in my constituency. I do not know of any other right hon. or hon. Member who is faced with such a prospect. My sentiments are shared by my hon. Friends the Members for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) and for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel). The prospect is utterly unacceptable to us.

It is ironic that the threat of closure should ever have hung over Luton. The discussion about the siting of London's third airport ignores the fact that Luton is already the third airport in the capital's system. With 2 million passengers a year now, a capacity to take up to 5 million passengers a year, excellent motorway connections and an adjoining railway line to London—it is much closer than Stansted and takes only 30 minutes—Luton airport is perfectly capable of playing a greater role, especially in scheduled services. Indeed, we would welcome the opportunity that a longer runway and parallel taxiways would give us to expand our passenger handling capacity to 10 million—double the present capacity. That would involve taking only 100 acres of land. That is an option which would increase the capacity and the flexibility of the London system and remove pressure for the development of Stansted.

The recent problems of Luton airport have not been confined to the threat of closure. It has faced difficulties because of the existence of heavily subsidised facilities and charges at Stansted which are, of course, designed to attract our charter traffic away. The BAA has used its monopoly at Heathrow and Gatwick to squeeze out competition from Luton. That casts serious doubt on the BAA's claim to be the guardian of the national interest in airport matters, especially when its justification for developing Stansted is supposed to be the need to meet international competition. If it is not prepared to meet competition fairly at home, the claim is bogus.

For that reason, I am not prepared to go the whole way with the inspector, Mr. Eyre, at the recent planning inquiry in blaming successive Governments for the difficult problems that we now face. Any Government must take into consideration the views of their supporters, the environmental lobby, transport interests and many other factors.

Mr. Eyre has overlooked the pressure that a major public sector monopoly, the BAA, can bring to bear on policymakers in the long term by its insistence on the need to cater for passenger growth. It has an overwhelming interest in buttressing its own position. Hence the unremitting pressure since 1965 for the development of Stansted, the difficulty in developing a coherent strategy for regional airports and the BAA's efforts to take over Luton and the major regional airports in the 1970s and, now, to preserve its monopoly. Until it is broken up and its component parts are sold to the private sector within an appropriate regulatory scheme, such conflicts will have to be resolved politically rather than settled in the market.

I do not believe that either the BAA or the inspector has made out a convincing case for the instant development of Stansted. According to Mr. Eyre's figures, he expects 61 million passengers to pass through London's airports each year by 1990, but his assessment of the passenger capacities of the existing planned and committed London airports system for that year is 63·5 million passengers. That might well be an underestimate as Heathrow, with a capacity of 38 million passengers a year, Gatwick, with a capacity of 25 million passengers a year, and Luton and Stansted combined, with a capacity of 9 million passengers a year — with the expansion of Luton it would obviously be greater—there would be an overall capacity of 72 million passengers a year. We shall have the capacity to handle the anticipated level of passenger traffic in 1990 irrespective of whether we decide to develop Stansted now. It is entirely wrong to suggest that Stansted is the only choice that will meet the demands of the 1990s in time.

The public inquiry has reinforced the argument for the development of a fifth terminal at Heathrow. The Perry Oaks site is clearly more suitable for airport development than any other location in the south-east and, indeed, the whole of the United Kingdom. The inspector believes that it is better from an operational point of view than terminal 4 and its development would prevent the imposition of the costs of split-site operations in our domestic airlines. British Airways says that its costs would rise by one fifth if Stansted were developed. There would also be a chance of relieving pressure on the central terminal area and the main access roads and tunnels into the airport. As heathrow is the hub of our international air services network, and as the development of the airport to full potential offers major operational savings to the airlines, a fifth terminal is the logical solution for the south-east.

Growth in the south-east, whether at Heathrow, Gatwick or Luton, is not the entire answer. Regional airports such as Manchester and others in Scotland have reached, or are reaching, critical stages in the development of their services. They have catchment areas and unutilised capacity sufficient to handle far greater numbers of passengers. The existence of the BAA in its current form must not be an obstacle to their development. It will be no service to Britain to reinforce the BAA's grip on our airport policies by promoting the growth of Stansted. Luton is ready, able and willing to play its part, with a fifth terminal at Heathrow, in coping with passenger growth in the south-east for the foreseeable future. It makes sense to expand our existing airports and to avoid artificial commitments on air traffic movements and terminal development of the disastrous kind that were made in the 1978 White Paper. Moreover, ignoring the potential of our regional airports will not be acceptable any longer.

There is no profit in looking back at the past 20 years of confusion and missed opportunities. Now is the time for new policies and, if possible, a new consensus. Nobody in north-west Essex wants major development at Stansted. However, such expansion is possible at Heathrow, Luton, in the regions and in Scotland. The only body with a real interest in developing Stansted is the BAA. It is that body, and the project that it has conceived, that should disappear in the interests of the whole nation.

8.17 pm

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): I found it rather entertaining to hear the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) trying to shove passengers off from Heathrow to Stansted as there are obviously many people in the south-east of England who want further development at neither Heathrow nor Stansted. In the north, however, we would give our right arm just to have the opportunity to expand regional airports, the survival of which might be put at grave risk if the Government's weight is put behind the Stansted proposal.

When the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) extolled the virtues of Maplin as a third London airport, partly because it was by the sea, I smiled wryly because Liverpool airport is by the sea and has many of the virtues to which he referred. The hon. Gentleman talked about not coercing people to use such an airport. The hon. Member for Twickenham revealed yet again the gap between the imaginations of those who live in the south and those who live in the north when he said that his constituents could not be forced to go to Manchester or other northern airports to go on holiday or travel on business. I have news for him. That is precisely the problem that people who reside in the north of England face.

A person who lives in Liverpool and wishes to go on a summer holiday to a foreign land can fly direct only to Yugoslavia, thanks mainly to the drive of Merseyside county council. If he wishes to go to Spain, he may get a flight from Manchester. But the weight and balance of airport development is tipped towards the south. Those of us who live in the north must drive to Luton or get the train to Heathrow or Gatwick. That is part of the problem of living in the north of England, but many people in the south are unready or unable to recognise it. The expansion of Stansted will endanger the role of Manchester and the complementary airport of Liverpool.

The airport of Liverpool is already threatened by the plans to abolish Merseyside county council. No one has made it clear whether any authority will be capable of assuming that responsibility when the council is abolished. Far from getting a second terminal, Liverpool airport has recently managed to get a grant of £1·9 million—that shows at least some commitment on the part of the Government — towards building a new replacement terminal. We would love to be able to say that we were building a second terminal.

My constituency is in a county which has an average unemployment rate of more than 20 per cent. One third of the 150,000 unemployed have been without a job for well over a year, and often for well over two years. Therefore, we would welcome another terminal. However, we cannot even get a duty-free shop at Liverpool airport because of the arbitrary qualifying quota of 100,000 international passengers laid down by the Government. Yet many passengers who travel from Liverpool airport are international passengers, who must take an internal flight from Liverpool to Heathrow or Gatwick to pick up an international flight.

Many decisions are taken by the Government and their advisers whose roots are in the south. Not everyone needs or desires to start a journey from London airport. Airports such as Liverpool could handle a greater volume of traffic. Liverpool airport has one of the most up-to-date runways in the country, which has even taken Concorde. The drive of Merseyside county council has led to the development of a new control tower, modern fire-fighting facilities and the beginnings of the development of a new replacement terminal. Flights go out and come in over the river, which is a safe route. Liverpool airport is more often fog-free than most airports in the United Kingdom, and is an ideal diversionary airport for Manchester, Gatwick and Heathrow.

Manchester airport is connected to an excellent motorway system, which includes the M56, M53, M57, M62 and M6. It is an ideal site for development, providing the Government create the balance more in favour of the distressed parts of the United Kingdom, that is, the north-west.

I plead with the Government to consider the position carefully and to examine what is happening in the House tonight. The only reason why the Government have not called a three-line Whip tonight is that they realise they they are not satisfying the House with their proposals to expand Stansted and Heathrow, which totally ignore the needs of the north-west and the northern regions.

If the Conservative party wants to confirm the view of many people that it is fast becoming the south of England nationalist party, it should continue with its present trends. If it wants to expand and ensure that areas such as Merseyside get their fair due, it should consider Manchester and Liverpool airports. There is no use talking about regional policy while cutting regional aid. In Merseyside the six local authorities have suffered a cut of £176 million since 1979. That cannot be allowed to continue.

The Government can show faith with people in the north-west by not supporting further development in the London area. They should see to it that Manchester gets its fair rewards. They should consider the disadvantages that at present accrue to Manchester, and consider regional complementary airports such as Liverpool. Such a move would introduce much investment and economic activity in that deprived area.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): The hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) made a staunch and eloquent defence of the interests of his constituents, as I would expect. I do not doubt the fervour with which he and other hon. Members have put the case for the expansion of regional airports to serve the economic interests of their areas.

The demands of those regions are persuasive, and the environmental and economic interests of the hon. Members who represent seats most closely affected by prospective development in the south-east are understandable. Although I cannot claim to have as direct a constituency interest as them, I hope to display more objectivity and less emotion.

I, like all my right hon. and hon. Friends, have read the report with care. I am bound to declare my credentials at the beginning, which are that I broadly support the recommendations of the Eyre report. I hope that my views and those of other hon. Members present in the Chamber will be taken fully into account by Ministers.

When the subject was first raised about 20 years ago, there were projections for air transport growth which have not been fully realised. Nevertheless, there have been great opportunity costs from not making the essential decision at that time about the development of a third London airport. It is ironic that since Sir Peter Masefield first espoused the case for a third London airport at Stansted we have gone full circle via Wing and Maplin back to Stansted, and now face the same decision 20 years later.

Did we serve the national interest by failing to grasp the nettle, prickly though it was, during those years? Has not the time come to make a clear and final decision? There must be no more prevarication. The people, regions, towns and communities involved are entitled to expect a clear and final decision. That decision should be the one set out in the Eyre report.

Too often we assess the future capital cost of such a decision, but fail to take account of the cost incurred through failing to take a decision earlier. A heavy responsiblity rests with a succession of Ministers with responsibility for trade and aviation, who have not served the country well by failing to make a decision on this highly sensitive, political, judgmental issue. Nevertheless, such a decision can now be made and it should be for a major expansion of Stansted airport.

There has been far too much talk this afternoon about the alternative advantages of meeting, by a minimalist approach, the least possible forecast movements of air transport. There has been insufficient desire to satisfy fairly empirically verifiable and objective judgments as to what passenger transport demands will be in the south-east over the next 15 to 20 years.

It is self-evident, from careful reading of the report, that there is no alternative to the development of Stansted. Much as one might like to see the demand-led expansion of some regional airports, the hard fact is that while certain improvemens can be made, and some new routes can and should be opened—I hope that will happen—consumer demand, both internationally and domestically, will remain predominantly in the south-east.

Mr. Churchill rose——

Mr. Nelson: Like others, I have waited to make my speech. I have a limited time to make my points and I wish to conclude my remarks.

From my reading of the report, such a demand will be prevalent. It behoves the Government to respond and the recommendations in the report, in particular for the expansion of Stansted, will in my view satisfy this.

However, I link with that the importance that I place on the need not to make any concessions or to fudge judgments in responding to the report. In their eventual response to the inspector's report, the Government will be heavily tempted to try to satisfy, for political and other motives, all the fair points of view which have been represented. I shall judge the Government's response by the extent to which they genuinely take the opportunity to do objectively what they consider is in the national interest, and not to dilute an essential decision which should be made for the future.

Although Heathrow, Gatwick and other areas have been developed in the past, they have been developed too slowly and in such a manner as already to lose a substantial amount of business and traffic to elsewhere in the world. No one can assess the value and extent of business that we have already lost to Paris, Amsterdam and elsewhere in terms of passenger movements, freight and the associated business. However, I believe that the cost to Britain has been enormous. That is the cost of failing to make decisions 20 years ago and in the intervening period.

We must have hope for the future. We must not proceed on the most pessimistic assumptions about economic growth and the attractions of Britain both for business and tourism. We should proceed on the basis that we will make new facilities work and that they will attract new business to Britain through Stansted and elsewhere. Therefore, not only should there be a firm Government resolution and decision in favour of the Eyre report, but it must not be watered down.

There will inevitably be behind-the-scene bids for a Government response to suggest a phasing of any increase at Stansted, for a limit on the number of passengers who can be dealt with and for an absolute guarantee that the capacity will not increase beyond a given level in the foreseeable future. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will resist these overtures to the extent that they have taken note of my remarks, although I recognise that it is a matter of judgment. I believe that I have made my point. I want the report to be implemented and I want no watering down of its recommendations.

I am not on my own. I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) said earlier. Much of what I have said in support of Stansted rests on the efficacy of the rail link with London and it is essential that that is not intermittent but is a direct through link.

With those remarks, I hope that I have left no doubt in my right hon. and hon. Friends' minds as to my views on the issue.

8.33 pm

Sir Walter Clegg (Wyre): I cannot agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson). It is particularly galling to those of us from the north to find that when we are forced to take flights from Heathrow or Gatwick we are supposed to be starting our flights from the south-east and are south-east originated. We are nothing of the sort. We are forced there by a set of circumstances.

One of the penances of debating in the House of Commons is to hear speaker after speaker making one's points infinitely better. Many powerful voices have spoken for the north of England tonight. In particular, I want to take up one or two of the threads which my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) pursued.

First, my hon. Friend talked about the feeling in the north. He said that it was something tangible, something that could be touched. I can back him up on that. The north has a chip on its shoulder, and I do not like that. At one time it was a nice sporting chip—one will have a better chance of playing for England if one plays at Lords than at Old Trafford or Headingley. But it has become worse than that.

As the circumstances have changed between the south and the north, I have become worried about the south-north feeling that is developing. I want to see it stopped. That is why we have heard that the North of England Regional Consortium covers all the old rivalries within the north and stretches from the Irish sea to the North sea, from the Solway to the Mersey, and from the Humber to the Tyne. All have united in opposing the development of Stansted for the reasons which have been cogently given in the House tonight by those supporting the North of England Regional Consortium.

We sometimes misunderstand why there is the concentration of flights in the south-east. It is partly historical and partly due to the fact that the airlines have found it easier because of the cross-subsidisation of the southern airports which is not available in the north and which makes our landing charges higher.

I read something in the inspector's report which I found rather strange. He said:

"Governments can do little to influence the entrenched pattern of air services which is inevitably governed by market forces."

It is nonsense to say that the Government cannot change that pattern. It is ludicrous that the market is referred to there as a free market when one thinks of the International Air Transport Association, the Bermuda 2 arrangement, the licensing restrictions and the communications between Government and Government.

My fear—it is shared by many of my hon. Friends in the north—is that the present position will be frozen into the system because expenditure on Stansted will make those airlines which operate from it wish it to work, and the wish will be father to the thought.

We do not want to play dog in the manger with the south of England. If it needs expansion for its own purposes, so be it, but I am implacably opposed to a major development at Stansted. My feet will take me into the appropriate Lobby tonight, and I shall not be alone.

8.38 pm

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): Unlike hon. Members who have spoken in the debate, I must confess that I am not an authority on airports. I have been impressed by the breadth of knowledge that has been expressed in the debate.

However, as a representative of an inner city area, I am an authority on deprivation. As a former member of the Manchester city council, although, regrettably, never on the airport committee, I am extremely proud of that airport. The alderman who cut the first sod of grass at Manchester airport had to have police protection against a volatile crowd who did not want the airport. There has been criticism in years gone by because of the imposition on the rates. But what a difference today! Today that airport is the dual jewel of the north: it makes contributions to the rates and a marvellous contribution to the region.

I was dismayed at the beginning of the debate when I listened to the south-east lobby. We have heard the Watford gap mentality coming through once or twice. The North of England Regional Consortium has been criticised for its role. Some of the arguments have put forward the old divide and rule idea of separating Manchester from the other regions. The consortium does not want a "beggar thy neighbour" mentality. We have regard for unemployment in the south-east. Arguments have been thrown at us about job creation. The 50 per cent. male unemployment rate in one part of my constituency should be compared with the level of unemployment in the south-east. In Greater Manchester about 70,000 of the under-25s are unemployed; 100,000 have been unemployed for over six months. That is deprivation.

The consortium has pointed out that comparative statistics on unemployment are well known and need not be rehearsed. There is a substantial difference between the unemployment rates in Scotland, Wales, the north and the midlands and those prevailing in the south-east. The creation of further jobs in rural Essex and Hertfordshire will have no immediate beneficial effect on unemployment in other parts, including the south-east. The proposal to create a further 25,000 jobs in that area, where unemployment averages 6 and 9 per cent., is not a priority. Indeed, it is inconsistent with the Government's location decisions on such developments as the Nissan car factory, which, for a variety of reasons, was routed to the north-east. In regard to the disparity between the north and the south-east, average earnings are lower in Greater Manchester. The inner cities are at a disadvantage.

Objections are coming not just from Manchester. At the inaugural meeting of the North of England Regional Consortium three years ago there were people from all over the country, and there was support across the political spectrum, just as we have heard in this debate from the hon. Members for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) and for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst). Local authorities and the tourist trade supported the chamber of commerce. They realised that the spin-off effect, if Stansted should be developed, would be to the disadvantage of the northern regions.

The consortium asks legitimate questions about resources. What effect will the reallocation of resources have on the capital expenditure plans for local authorities at a time of dwindling capital allocations? Who will fund the 17,000 new houses and all the infrastructure that will be required? Will it be the Manchesters, the Liverpools, the Sheffields or the Newcastles? The consortium points out that even inner areas of London will not be immune. So we have decaying urban areas badly in need of revitalisation which will be subsidising new towns in the south-east. The regional dimension has not been taken into consideration in the report. The question about priorities has never been put. Justification cannot be made for expenditure well in excess of £1 billion in the south-east at a time of cutback in public sector financing which will affect the north.

The inquiry has dwelt only on the development of airport facilities and has missed out completely the importance of the air transport industry. There are two important elements. Without question there is a need for wider consideration of the development of the air transport industry in the United Kingdom. Secondly, the decision taken ultimately by the Secretary of State must take account of the regional dimension. The spread of aid for the regions is very thin. Many regions are in dire need of revitalisation. This is an opportunity that should not be missed. This is only one aspect of regional policy.

There are further broader issues concerning major capital investment. In his evidence to the Stansted inquiry the leader of West Yorkshire metropolitan county council indicated that regional policy must take account of regional conditions, which are so bad that no national investment decisions should be taken without first considering the regional dimension. Therefore, it is not just a Manchester versus Stansted argument. Attention must be drawn to the neglect of the midlands, the north and Scotland. If Stansted is developed, if a fifth terminal is built at Heathrow, and if there is a Channel tunnel, this island will eventually sink, as has been forecast, because of the imbalance of being weighted down by the south-east of England. There is a case for regional airports. Finance invested in the regional airports would act as a catalyst to revitalise and reinvigorate areas with tremendous human resources. To neglect them further would be a catastrophe.

At the Stansted inquiry, and throughout its case since, the consortium has argued that there is no need in purely air transport terms for a further major development in the south-east of England to meet south-eastern air transport needs. All the analyses show that an excessively high percentage of regional air travellers are currently forced to use airports in the south-east. If those travellers could be reallocated to services from local regional airports, expansion could take place in the regions and not in London.

The consortium has also argued that the effects of the reallocation would be to bring substantial economic and employment benefits to the regions. Such benefits are more than justified by the widening disparities in employment opportunity and social and economic conditions as between the south-eastern region and the remainder of the country. That is not to say that the consortium has ever failed to acknowledge equally dire problems which exist on a localised basis in parts of the Greater London conurbation, but merely to observe that in quantitative terms the scale of the problem elsewhere is greater. Like most of my hon. Friends, I appeal to as many as possible Conservative Members to support our campaign by joining us in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I am genuinely sorry for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. He has as disparate a portfolio as the craggy-visaged, iron-watchchained Alderman Foodbotham, chairman of the Bradford tramways and fine arts committee in the old days, about which Peter Simple writes so eloquently. One day he is on the buses; the next day he is proposing a Bill to deal with London regional transport; the next day it is those confounded airports again. I am only glad that at least we have given him some respite from the Civil Aviation Bill. I am sure he is glad that we have, particularly if he studies the inspector's report. I hope that at the end of the debate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or the Minister of State will state clearly the Government's intentions with regard to that legislation. The unanimous verdict of all informed parties is that the artificial statutory limit of 275,000 air transport movements per year at Heathrow is totally unjustified. Moreover, taken annually, the 275,000 ATM limit will be exceeded this summer even before the fourth terminal comes into operation in the autumn. I hope that this matter can be laid to rest today.

Secondly, I hope that the Government will listen to the very wise words of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths), formerly a Minister responsible for these matters. In a powerful and succinct speech he emphasised that Heathrow is a major national asset. The inspector, too, made that point. There is no airport with a comparable range of international services anywhere in Europe and we would be foolish indeed not to maximise its potential. As Mr. Eyre pointed out, however, to do so we need—and have needed for many years—a fifth terminal on the Perry Oaks site. I hope that at the very least my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction will approve that planning application.

We are all conscious of the pressures in the western part of London. A necessary prerequisite for such a development is the construction of a motorway spur from the M25 to the fifth terminal, proper railway links to Feltham and Iver, an extension of the underground system to the fifth terminal and improvements to the M4 and the A4, as well as the trunking of the Hayes bypass to which my hon. Friend for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) will no doubt allude if he is fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Many people are worried about the potential noise impact of such an increase in capacity at Heathrow, but we should not be too alarmed. The inspector sets out good figures to prove the point, as do British Airways, and they explain that the introduction of new noise regulations at the begining of next year for British-registered aircraft and at the begining of 1987 for most foreign-registered aircraft will mean that the noise nuisance, which is such a worry to many local residents, will diminish, even if the passenger throughput at Heathrow is dramatically expanded.

Mr. Jessel : Does my hon. Friend appreciate that it is not just the peak loudness of each flight but the frequency and number of flights—already 750 per day—which distresses so many people? I might also point out that the runways go east and west whereas my hon. Friend's constituency is to the north of Heathrow——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Gentleman has had his 10 minutes and he is now trying to nick someone else's.

Mr. Wilkinson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not think that intervention was really worthy of my hon. Friend. I have always supported full use of Heathrow, just as I supported the full use of regional airports when I represented the constituency of Bradford, West. I still support the expansion of regional airports. The expansion of Heathrow should be seen as part of an overall strategy. It has not been made sufficiently clear in the debate that the future of many regional airports is directly tied up with the future of Heathrow. The feeder services which run from the regional airports into Heathrow to interline with international services are vital to the survival of many of the regional airports. I think that the inspector is broadly right when he says that there is only marginal potential for alleviation of demand through the expansion of regional airports. That is not to say that the regional airport expansion should not take place. There is a manifest case for it on grounds of regional development and equity, on economic grounds and on air transport grounds, but we should not delude ourselves that it will make all that much difference.

For all those reasons, I believe that from about 1995 we shall need a further expansion of the fifth terminal across the western perimeter road to the ground now covered with market gardens. I believe that is the most sensible strategy. Forecasts must always allow a margin for error. The inspector has made very generous allowance for error. His projection is way above the mean between the lowest and highest estimates of future demand. The CAA's own figures in document CAP 502 show that up to 1995, even with the present confines of Stansted, the additional demand that the inspector envisages for the south-east airports can be met. If Luton airport is developed up to 10 million passengers per year, as my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) suggests, and if Heathrow is used to the full with a fifth terminal and 53 million passengers per year, it will be possible to meet the demand planning value given by the inspector for the year 2000 with Stansted handling only 5 million passengers per year.

Before we unnecessarily despoil the most beautiful countryside around Stansted I hope that we shall do everything possible to maximise the use of Heathrow. It is not beyond the wit of man to provide alternative sewerage facilities to those at the Perry Oaks site. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds was absolutely right about that. I believe that such an overall strategy could provide the basis for a consensus on which the Government, the Opposition and the country could unite. It is for this reason that I put it to the House. For this same reason, too, I am pleased that we are not making it a party matter in the Division Lobby. I believe that we should express the view that, with future demand projections so uncertain, it would be quite wrong to commit ourselves, in effect, to putting a Gatwick, with 15 million passengers per year, or, by the mid-1990s, the virtual equivalent of today's Heathrow, in the exquisite and unspoilt countryside of Essex. My hon. Friends and I believe that would be wrong and we shall seek to express the view in the Division today.

8.58 pm

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): The Secretary of State, in opening the debate, referred to the extreme delicacy of his position, a phrase which one can well appreciate from one who finds himself poised so awkwardly on the horns of a dilemma.

The House is invited tonight to give its verdict on the inspector's proposal for a massive expansion of Stansted and for a huge investment of resources in the south-east of England. Such a development in my belief is undesirable and unnecessary, and would represent a most un-cost-effective use of national resources.

The inspector betrays his own south-east bias in the concern which he expresses about the possibility that, were there to be major expansion of regional facilities, people from the south-east might conceivably have to go to Manchester to take an aeroplane, yet he takes little account of the plight with which so many northerners have been confronted and remain confronted and, if the inspector has his choice, will for ever more be confronted: that they have no choice when they want to go abroad but to interline via Heathrow or one of the European transit points.

Although Manchester is the greatest city in the United Kingdom outside the capital, there are no more than 20 foreign destinations to which one can fly direct from Manchester. On some of those flights there are restricted traffic rights and many of them are scheduled only one day a week.

What we in the north are battling against is the concept so admirably displayed by the latest British Caledonian advertisement which, for the benefit of those hon. Members who do not travel regularly through Manchester airport, I read:

"Manchester—London—one stop—the world".

It is to this precisely that we in the north object. Why do we have to go via London in order to get to the world? Although I have the greatest respect for Sir Adam Thompson and for his admirable airline, which I use regularly, the advertisement epitomises the problem with which we in the north-west are confronted, that we have to travel via London or one of the European Community countries to get anywhere.

This is an outdated syndrome which has been dead and buried for 15 years in the United States. There was a time—people have forgotten it—when one could not get anywhere in the United States without going via what used to be called Idlewild, now JFK. Anybody with any sense travelling now to a destination on the west coast, the south or the mid-west will go many miles out of his way to avoid the horrors of JFK and the eastern seaboard airfields.

Exactly the same attitude has developed among northerners who, although we recognise that at present we are forced to interline, will interline more regularly via foreign airports—Schiphol, Zurich, Charles de Gaulle—in order specifically to avoid Heathrow airport.

The huge numbers of passengers from the north have no choice at present. I was intrigued that the BAA should have let the cat out of the bag in its earlier propaganda for the debate which took place in the House before Christmas. It proudly paraded the fact that no less than 80 per cent. of the passengers coming through the London area airports wish to do business in London or the south-east. However, the flip side of that coin is that no less than 20 per cent. of passengers have no wish to go anywhere near the London area airports. The latest figures for 1984 show that the figures on which the inspector based his report are entirely outdated. At present it is not 20 per cent. who do not want to go near London area airports but 29 per cent., an increase of 45 per cent. on the figure on which the inspector based his decision.

Nearly 15 million travellers from the regions who have no wish to pass through London have to do so. That is the equivalent of the entire throughput of Gatwick airport. It is estimated that that 15 million will have increased to 25 million by the end of the decade. In consequence, the London area airports are unnecessarily congested. This in turn leads to demands and fatuous proposals such as we have had from the distinguished inspector, the only effect of which will be to aggravate the situation whereby northerners are unable to travel from their local airports and more and more people are encouraged to go through London. The extent to which people are interlining via other terminals might not be readily appreciated in London.

We have heard the suggestion that if we restrict growth at Stansted people will use other European airports. Many northerners are doing precisely that. Business men wanting to fly to Hong Kong from Manchester will go to Copenhagen, Amsterdam, Dublin or Paris to avoid Heathrow.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Is it not hopeful that in the autumn people will be given the opportunity to fly direct to Hong Kong from Manchester with British Airways?

Mr. Churchill: Yes. I warmly welcome that. It is long overdue. At present people are more likely to use Swissair and travel via Zurich which gets them to Hong Kong two hours sooner than flying British Airways via Heathrow.

I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) that, far from there not being the demand in the north-east or the north-west, in 1981—thanks to Sir Freddie Laker—no fewer than 11 DC10s a week flew between Manchester and the United States. Three flew to Los Angeles, four to Miami and four to New York city. Today there are no such flights.

I am delighted that British Airways is planning a three-times-a-week service as from the autumn this year. We shall then be served about one quarter as well as we were by Sir Freddie Laker's airline before he was done down.

I have three suggestions for my right hon. Friend. Will the Government develop positive policies to the maximum to ensure that regional demand is satisfied? That must mean a major expansion of Manchester and other regional airports, and abandoning plans for major developments at Stansted. Secondly, will my right hon. Friend give the BAA its marching orders? Will he make it clear to it that the predatory pricing in which it is indulging at Stansted by subsidies from Heathrow and Gatwick is unacceptable? As an example I cite the cost of landing a jumbo jet at three airports. At Heathrow the cost is £4,930, at Manchester £3,908 and at Stansted £1,071—barely one quarter of the economic charge that has to be made in Manchester. As a direct consequence Manchester has lost at least one regular far east freight flight. It has now gone to Stansted. The massive volume of freight which goes by road to London is ludicrous. Some goes on roll-on/roll-off ferries to Amsterdam and elsewhere. But half the freight delivered to Manchester airport is sent by road to Heathrow for onward transmission.

Finally, I suggest to my right hon. Friend that he ought to reconsider the Bermuda 2 agreement and adopt a liberal policy towards foreign airlines. If need be, he should take British Airways and British Caledonian by the scruff of the neck and make it clear to them that their dog-in-the-manger attitude towards those who are seeking traffic rights out of Manchester and the regional airports must change. Those hon. Members who represent Manchester constituencies and constituencies elsewhere in the north of England will not accept what is believed to be an undesirable, unnecessary diversion of resources to a misconceived project in the south-east.

We demand that the Government should take full account of the case for Manchester. Until Manchester becomes the second international gateway of this country, I could not support any major development at Stansted.

9.12 pm

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): Stansted has been an issue for many years. However, it is only during the last three or four years that it has come to a head. There is a strong belief, which cuts right across party lines, that the Stansted proposals will not benefit Britain in any way. We are referring not just to an airport but to the infrastructure that would be needed. Very considerable investment would be involved. Roads, sewers, rail services, houses, and schools would have to be provided, and they would cost many hundreds of millions of pounds. We believe that massive expenditure of this kind ought to be invested somewhere other than in the south, as is consistently the case. This should take place, not just because of the expenditure that would be involved, but because of massive unemployment in the north. In the Stansted area, unemployment stands at about 9 per cent., yet in the north-east and the north-west of England unemployment stands at over 40 per cent. Because of this massive unemployment, money ought to be invested in the north.

Ministers have attempted on previous occasions to convince hon. Members that there is no alternative to Stansted: that if Stansted is not developed the traffic will go to Schiphol. It is not a convincing argument. Hon. Members of all parties have been critical of the theory that people would rather cross the English channel, involving additional expense, and travel to Schiphol than go to an airport in the north of England. I represent a Manchester constituency but this is not a Manchester issue. Hon. Members who represent northern constituencies recognise the very great importance of investing in Manchester airport.

This campaign has continued for three years. It can be said unstintingly that hon. Members of all parties readily recognise that if Britain has very limited resources at least some of its investment ought to be directed towards the north. Manchester is a most successful airport. We ought to pay tribute to the pioneers of the past who had the foresight in a new venture to invest in the early 1930s. The airport is now highly successful and operates at a profit. We are not asking for a handout. We want common justice; the Government's resources should be spent in a different area and not always in the southern counties.

Non-political bodies strongly support Manchester's case. Chambers of trade and chambers of commerce—hard-headed business men—recognise the advantages for Britain of redirecting money to the north. They urge strongly that money should be invested in Manchester airport. We are not considering only the future of Manchester airport. The European Community recognises that some of this country's gravest problems occur in the northern areas. The Community would have sympathy with those who press that investment should be directed to the north. No Government can ignore the problem of the regions. Yorkshire, Newcastle, Greater Manchester and Liverpool face serious economic difficulties.

The Government continually say that they want to expand the service industries because they have the potential to create wealth and jobs. What better investment could there be than money to attract business to the north, which would help tourism, the hotel trade and the catering and food industries? The north has many cultural attractions which would be interesting to foreign visitors. Too often, tourists fly into London and never visit any other part of the country. London is always complaining that it is becoming overused and overheated because of the strain put on its resources.

The north has some of the finest countryside in the world, yet it is underused. It is a resource that costs nothing and it is there for the taking for tourists who fly into the north. I do not make a case for Manchester alone. People who flew into Manchester would not necessarily stay in the city. They would go to other nearby areas. The Lake District, for example, is one of the most beautiful areas in the world.

People in the north often feel great resentment when their area does not get its share of investment. The Government could do something positive and invest money in the north. I shall be supporting the north when I vote tonight.

9.18 pm

Mr. Patrick Ground (Feltham and Heston): I have both a constituency and a personal interest in the debate. My constituency is immediately to the east of Heathrow, under the flight path, and my personal interest is that for six months I appeared at the airport inquiries representing the Greater London council—one of the comparatively few ventures in which the GLC supported declared Government policy.

A strand that has been picked up in many speeches is the case presented by the North of England Regional Consortium. There was a great deal of evidence given at the inquiries, which occupied the time of the inspector for about four years and about 250-odd working days at the inquiries. The evidence was examined in considerable detail by an inspector who declared himself to be basically sympathetic to the case being advanced. I must remind those who have relied upon the evidence that it was rejected by the inspector, who rejected also the criticisms of Government policy that were involved in the evidence. The inspector did not hesitate on many occasions to criticise Governments of both political colours. At page 28 of chapter 10 of the summary the inspector states:

> "Development of further services out of regional airports has not been hindered by any action or inaction on the part of Government which, in so far as it can influence the situation, is actively seeking to encourage the introduction of more services at airports in the regions."

That is a clear finding by the inspector that it is not Government action or inaction that has brought about the present position in respect of regional airports. He says that the solution lies principally in the hands of the air transport industry to recognise when demand appears in sufficient amounts at the airports. It is not that capacity which is lacking — indeed, many regional airports already have excess capacity. What is lacking is the perception of adequate demand on the part of the air transport industry.

One of the matters that has somewhat surprised me about the debate is the little amount of emphasis that has been placed upon runway capacity, which is one of the most important considerations for the Government in choosing between Stansted and a fifth terminal at Heathrow. At Heathrow, irrespective of whether the Government adhere to their intention to impose a limit on the number of air transport movements, the airport is now operating close to its capacity.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burtonwood) rose——

Mr. Ground: Approximately 275,000 air transport movements will take place at the airport this year.

Mr. Hayes rose——

Mr. Ground: The maximum capacity at present for practical purposes is between 300,000 and 305,000 air transport movements.

Mr. Bill Walker rose——

Mr. Ground: Therefore, there is a maximum, for practical purposes, of another 25,000 or 30,000 air transport movements with the present runway capacity. On the other hand, at Stansted—the figures that I have given are confirmed by the British Airports Authority——

Mr. Walker rose——

Mr. Ground: —and they are close to the figures put out by the Civil Aviation Authority. Members may have their own calculations and no doubt anyone who is interested in the airport has his own calculation of runway capacity. The 1982 figures tell us that at Stansted, with the existing runway, there were about 5,000 air transport movements. The finding of the inspector was that the capacity of the existing runway, with the development proposed of 15 million, would result in a capacity of no fewer than 165,000 movements.

In other words, there is that potential increase with the existing runway of 160,000 air transport movements. That must be a major consideration when contemplating an investment of several hundred million pounds, and the Government must have that important consideration in mind when making up their mind on the report.

Mr. Churchill: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that the CAA's estimate is for 330,000 air transport movements capacity at Heathrow airport?

Mr. Ground: That figure was in the report this summer. The BAA estimate is for between 300,000 and 305,000. But even if my hon. Friend is right to refer to a capacity of 330,000, the extra runway capacity beyond the current use is limited. It is an additional 55,000 movements, which compares unfavourably with the additional capacity available at Stansted.

It is all very well for my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) to refer to special orders to remove the Perry Oaks works, but not many hon. Members would be enthusiastic about the prospect of Perry Oaks being located in their constituencies. Indeed, it would be a draconian step to allow a sewage works on the scale of Perry Oaks, one of the largest in the country, to be relocated in the green belt, in an hon. Member's constituency, without a public inquiry and the normal safeguards.

If hon. Members think it is difficult to find a site for an airport, they will know that it is equally difficult to find a site that is acceptable for a sludge works on this scale. Any hon. Member not aware of that would soon discover it if the proposal affected his area. There was more than a week's evidence on that issue at the inquiry and, having heard it all, I believe that the inspector's estimate—that it would not be completed until the mid-1990s—could be optimistic.

I regard it as fantastic for my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St Edmunds, after all the evidence has been given, to come forward with a quick solution. The fact that the project will take so long is plainly an important factor in the Secretary of State's eventual decision.

Two recommendations in the report involve a clear departure from Government promises—the proposal to abandon the 275,000 movement limit and the recommendation of the eventual construction of the fifth terminal —though I will not go in detail over the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins) and others who referred to Government promises about both those matters. The Government would commit a major breach of faith if they acccepted either of these recommendations.

A fundamental point behind the inspector's recommendations is the fact that there is a need to maximise existing investment at Heathrow. I remind the Government that the last and largest investment at Heathrow—the construction of terminal 4 — occurred in the full knowledge that there would be a 275,000 limit and that, on completion, no fifth terminal would be permitted. That was the basis on which that major investment occurred. I suggest that those who are responsible cannot in fairness now complain of the need to maximise their investment or previous investment further.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will my hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Ground: I must continue, because of the time.

The belief that people living under the flight path could not distinguish between 275,000 movements and 300,000 or more movements is one basis of the inspector's decision. Last week I told a meeting of my constituents that the inspector thought that they could not tell the difference between the 275,000 and 300,000 movements, and they were incredulous. They said, "Where does the inspector live?" When I said that he lived in Sussex, they thought that explained everything.

I assure the Government that the people living around Heathrow are extremely sensitive to changes in the method of operation of the airport and in the number of movements. I entirely support the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel). Further restrictions on night movement and a rail link would be welcomed, but one must emphasise for the people concerned the great importance of the effect of the number of movements. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham that the number of movements is one of the greatest irritants and nuisances to the people living around the airport and under the flight path.

The Government's promise to limit the number of movements and to restrict further development at Heathrow matters greatly to the people living around Heathrow who have relied upon that promise. I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to follow a course of sensible investment by applying the criteria of runway capacity, to which I have referred, by looking at the practicalities of the matter in terms of timing and by respecting the Government's clear unequivocal pledges.

Mr. Cecil Franks (Barrow and Furness): This debate is on one of those rare issues which, though controversial, cut right across party political loyalties. I congratulate the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on the way in which he presented the case not just for Manchester international airport but for the north. His speech was as good and balanced as the speech of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) was bad and unbalanced. To make a partisan political speech on a cross-party issue was an act of crass political ineptitude. The hon. Lady did her case and our case no service.

I declare an interest in this matter. I am one of three hon. Members — certainly the only Conservative Member—who have been members of the Manchester international airport committee. During the years before I became a Member I had the privilege of watching the growth of that airport and the pride of people in the north in that growth. That growth occurred not because of any Government direction or of any assistance from the British Airports Authority, British Airways or the Civil Aviation Authority — all of whom sought to thwart the development — but because of natural market forces. That reason should delight the hearts of Conservative Members.

One voice not yet heard in the debate is the voice of the consumer. The BAA pontificates about future demand and tells us where the consumer will want to go. British Airways pontificates about where, in its opinion, the consumer wants to go. However, we have evidence of what consumers themselves want. Some consumers want to fly direct to London—to Heathrow. The solution is simple — build a fifth terminal. Many consumers, equally, want to fly to Manchester. That is evidenced by the growth of Manchester international airport. The solution again is simple—allow the airport to develop naturally. Some consumers may wish to fly to Stansted: so be it; allow Stansted to develop naturally. Why should Conservative hon. Members, of all people, be asked to deny natural market forces? That defies the logic upon which we were elected.

I am one of a fairly rare breed of politician. I am a Conservative Member from the north. A rarer politician is the Labour Member from the south. I say that, not to score some dubious or spurious point over Opposition Members, but to emphasise the fact that there is a north-south divide which grows wider and wider. The political and economic division of our country is something of which we in this House should feel ashamed.

We constantly hear, from some hon. Members on these Benches, reference to the philosophy of one nation. If we believe in that philosophy, it is time that we started to practise it. I often look with envy at my colleagues from Scotland and consider how much time they are given in which to fight for their case. I do not begrudge them that time. I look with equal envy upon my colleagues from Wales who can further their causes in a similar manner. All too often, in the early hours of the morning, I look with great annoyance and equal envy at those from Northern Ireland who are able to occupy the time of the House for hour after hour. The real Cinderella of the House is the north of England. Hon. Members representing the north lose out time and time again in the opportunities afforded us to present our case.

The solution to the problems of the airline industry in Great Britain is obvious. We propose to deregulate the bus industry. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for promoting that policy. We deregulate this and deregulate that, but we neglect to deregulate fares, routes and licences in the airline industry.

The international airline passenger traffic is organised in a cosy cartel between national Governments and national airlines. The arrangement is just as much opposed to the interests of the consumer as is the rigging of oil prices by the member countries of OPEC. If we condemn OPEC for operating a cartel against the interests of the consumer, we should be just as vociferous in our criticism of the national airlines, which, to an equal extent, operate against the interests of the consumer. None is more guilty of that than British Airways. Its record is disgraceful.

About four weeks ago, I was abroad with a member of the Government. We travelled on a charter flight from Gatwick to Zurich and the return ticket cost £59·50. Because of urgent Government business, he had to fly back early on a scheduled flight. For a single ticket on a scheduled flight from Zurich to Gatwick he was charged £180. When that Minister complained to me, I could do no more than remind him that he is the Minister responsible for privatisation. Perhaps he will now practise what he preaches.

The House has been given many statistics, and I should like to give two more. One illustrates Manchester airport's natural growth in spite of the obstacles. There were 100 per cent. more charter flight passengers last year than five years ago. For the same period, there was only a 2 per cent. growth in the number of passengers on scheduled flights. Those statistics invite the question: why? The answer is obvious. Charter flights are unfettered by regulations while scheduled flights are at the whim of the CAA. It is virtually impossible for a scheduled airline to fly to Manchester, as is evidenced by British Airways' opposition to Singapore Airlines. United States airlines have met similar opposition because they are not part of the Bermuda agreement.

I give the second statistic to refute the spurious argument that everyone who flies to the United Kingdom wants to go to London. There is no evidence to substantiate that view. According to the British Tourist Board, 2·5 million United States citizens flew to London last year. One third of that number then visited the north. Why could they not fly to the north in the first place? I have not yet heard a sensible answer to that question except that there are vested interests determined not to be broken although that might be in the interests of consumers and the north.

At 12 midnight I shall go into the Division Lobby to register my opposition to the inspector's report. If the Government believe in the free market, let there be a free market and a free vote in the House when we have to make a decision.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): The hon. and learned Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) was worried on two counts: first, that there are too many flights into Heathrow, and, secondly, that there is a problem associated with getting rid of the sewage works. May I inform him that the people of Greater Manchester are only too willing to have the extra flights but do not want the sewage works. The trouble is that the deal usually works out so that people in the north of England get the sewage works and others get the flights. We want a much better deal.

The hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Franks) might believe firmly in free market forces, but his choice of Manchester airport as an example was unfortunate. He should know from his service on Manchester city council that it was the enterprise of that council and, more recently, the Greater Manchester council that did much to develop the airport. Almost all hon. Members who have spoken in favour of the north-west argued that we need more assistance from the Government if that airport is to develop and become more successful. The case for the north-west has been forcefully presented to the House, and I hope that the Minister will take note of it. I slightly regret the fact that there has not been as much emphasis in favour of pump-priming and development in other regions, such as the north-east, Yorkshire and Scotland.

Developments at Manchester airport have done a great deal to increase job opportunities both in services provided at the airport and in firms, which realise that by setting up offices and service depots in the Greater Manchester area they have access to the whole of western Europe. In my constituency several firms are now able to serve the whole of western Europe from a base in Tameside or Stockport. Such places are probably as efficient as any others in the United Kingdom and, probably, in Europe. I hope that the Government will do all they can to encourage that development.

[Mr. Andrew F. Bennett]

The time spent at an airport is extremely important for firms which are sending out service engineers or spare parts. The speed with which people and equipment can be handled through Manchester airport is impressive. One cannot begin to compare the speed of arriving at Manchester airport, hiring a car and reaching the motorway with the problems at Heathrow. It is much faster via Manchester.

The hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) said that there was no sense in encouraging people to fly from Manchester to Heathrow and then to a European destination, and that the sensible thing was to make it possible for them to fly directly from Manchester to an increasing number of European destinations. The slowness of progress through Heathrow means that most regular travellers to Europe from Manchester prefer to change anywhere but at Heathrow. Therefore, it is in our interests to give people the opportunity to fly directly to their destinations rather than to interline somewhere else in Europe.

Heathrow will not be able to meet the needs of travellers to interline at Heathrow. The more terminals, the longer one will spend moving from one to another. Regular travellers find the time spent moving round an airport particularly frustrating. There are now sufficient people in the north-west who want to fly direct to European destinations. The Government should give every encouragement to getting direct flights from Manchester to those destinations. They should not insist that people take the shuttle to Heathrow.

One of the major problems for Manchester airport is that many people do not appreciate how easy it is to reach it. It annoys me when I wait at the airport to hear people expressing surprise about how easy it was to reach the airport. From most of the northern part of Britain it is easier to reach Manchester than Heathrow. It is sad that so many people still assume that Heathrow is easier to reach than Manchester.

A rail link into Manchester airport would break that psychological barrier and improve communications further. As the railway is within two miles of the airport, it is scandulous that the Government have provided money to develop rail links and improve communications to all the southern airports but not for the rail link to Manchester airport. I say firmly to the Minister that if he wants to convince people in the north of England that he believes in Manchester airport he must make sure that money is available for the rail link.

I have a slight fear that British Rail's heart is not fully in that rail link because it still sees itself in competition with the airlines for travel to London. Certainly the most recent British Rail advertising campaign is an attack on the shuttle service. That is shortsighted of British Rail. If it were to encourage the link by putting up the money or getting the Government to do so, more people would want to use the railway into Manchester and it would gain more passengers than it would lose to the shuttle service.

I hope that the Minister will listen to the voices that have been raised in the House today arguing that money should be spent in the regions rather than in the south-east. In particular, the Government should put up the money quickly for the rail link into Manchester airport.

9.50 pm

Mr. John Whitfield (Dewsbury): We have heard many interesting speeches tonight, many of them expressing sectional interests of one sort or another, but my heart bled when I heard my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) complaining about the likely effects on the quality of life of his constituents of the establishment of a fifth terminal at London airport.

Twickenham has the jobs and the money that the airport provides. The people there are lucky enough to live in the M4 corridor, which is often referred to as the golden triangle of the nation. They have the convenience of a major airport on their doorstep. I understand that the value of houses in Barnes and Richmond is as high as anywhere in London. Yet my hon. Friend comes to the House and says that we must worry about the quality of life of his constituents.

My hon. Friend's constituents are a little naive if, living on the borders of the world's No. 1 international airport, they think that that airport will not be jealous of that position and seek to maintain it. I hope that I may be forgiven for saying that they are also somewhat naive if they believe the solemn and binding undertakings of politicians.

I had intended to say quite a bit this evening about the British Airports Authority, but scorn has been poured on its head from both sides of the House and it ill-behoves me to add to it. However, let me urge on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State a point relating to the cross-subsidisation which is practised between Heathrow and Stansted. My right hon. Friend will soon be urging upon the House legislation on buses, which I for one completely support. We shall hear many arguments from the Government Benches about the evils of cross-subsidisation. I see no reason why the same principle should not apply in the aircraft industry as in the bus industry.

Until my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Franks) spoke in his forthright manner, little had been said about tourism. There are many tourists in London. If we are to worry about the qualities of life, one should remember that those qualities are considerably eroded for at least nine months of the year in London. The number of tourists in the city and around about, particularly in the city of Westminster, amount to a public nuisance. The hotels are full and the theatres are packed, often with philistines who do not know the difference between a good play and a bad one. We have already heard that one third of the people who are forced to fly to the south-east have no desire to visit it. If we have to suffer the blue rinse route—I know that there are currency and other advantages to be obtained from it—there is no reason why it should not start at Manchester rather than at Stansted or Heathrow.

The regional tourist boards are well equipped to cope with any number of tourists. My own regional tourist board, Yorkshire and Humberside, has produced a magnificent brochure, which I have just read. It has almost persuaded me to take my holidays in Yorkshire, which I have not done for a long time. If it has that effect on me, surely it could lure tourists from the North American continent to the north of England. Surely they could be persuaded to visit York minster just as easily as they could be persuaded to visit Westminster; the Castle museum in York is just as much of an attraction as the British museum and the Humber bridge as Tower bridge. Many American tourists have already done London once. Statistics show that they are spending less and less time in London.

I am surprised that so little reference has been made in the debate to the position paper which British Airways issued on 15 January. It is clear from appendices A and B of that document that British Airways itself has many reservations about Stansted. I shall not waste the time of the House by reading quotations from that paper, but I urge my right hon. Friend to study it, if he has not already done so. It is clear from the document that British Airways, our major flag carrier, is reluctant to use Stansted and believes that if the regional airports, Heathrow and Gatwick, were properly utilised, the need for Stansted would be at the very least a buffer, a contingency to fall back on.

As always, it is the convenience of the indigenous air traveller which seems to be the last consideration in matters such as this. I was interested to hear my right hon. Friend say when opening the debate that airports and air travel should serve the public. I urge him to remember that it is the public who live in this country who are to be served. The principal objective of the British Airports Authority should not simply be to launder the international air traffic which passes through London airport. That must be a secondary consideration.

My right hon. Friend should not turn his back on the north. He should resist the self-interested representations of the institutions of the airline industry. Any further concentration of charter air travel in the south-east will be extremely divisive. There is no overwhelming evidence of a need to develop Stansted. The airlines themselves are reluctant to go there. Regional airports can and should take up any excess demand. The fact that Mr. Graham Eyre, about whom many kind things have been said today, says in a rather pompous manner that the regional airports should not help out with the problem in the south-east is abominable. It shows the southern bias of the man, and we have heard that he lives in Sussex. [HON. MEMBERS: "Disgraceful".] It is not disgraceful.

I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to think very carefully before committing large amounts of unproductive Government expenditure to developing Stansted. If following my advice and the advice of so many other hon. Members means that Mr. Graham Eyre occasionally has to travel to Manchester to take an international flight, so much the better—it may broaden the man's mind.

9.59 pm

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Having been straining at the leash for some time, I am grateful for being released from the starting gate——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Motion in the name of the Prime Minister for the Adjournment of the House may be proceeded with, though opposed, until Twelve o'clock. — [Mr. Sainsbury.]

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Thompson: I wish to support my hon. Friends the Members for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) and for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) and the many others who have spoken so ably against any significant expansion of Stansted airport. My views on this are coloured by three factors, which do not include my recent experience as a member of the Standing Committee on the Civil Aviation Bill. My boyhood was spent in north Essex, my early career was spent in the north of England, where I also stood as a parliamentary candidate, and I now represent a more northern and remote part of East Anglia.

My experience as a boy in Essex can be summed up very briefly. I was brought up in an area that includes not just Stansted but Thaxted and Finchingfield, which is regarded as the most beautiful village in Essex. It is quite wrong that anyone should ever have considered a major expansion of Stansted airport, because the case against such a development in that area is extremely strong on environmental grounds alone. It is amazing that the matter should have been under debate for so long. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said today that we must make a decision very quickly. Labour Ministers said the same in 1965. Why has no decision been taken in 20 years? It is because Stansted is the wrong place for such an expansion and the wrong place for a third London airport.

I also have strong links with the north of England and am glad to support the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Franks) and of Opposition Members, including the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), who rightly pointed out the real and increasing divide between north and south. They should recognise, however, that this serious problem results from wrong decisions by Labour Governments as well as more recent decisions which they seek to criticise. Any opportunity consistent with the Government's economic strategy, which I support, to redress that imbalance between north and south must be grasped eagerly.

I have not tangled very deeply with the inspector's report, but I note that he refers to the North of England Regional Consortium as a leap of faith, but it is clear from the report that any decision to expand Stansted would be an even greater and more suspect leap of faith, especially in view of the environmental implications and the urgent need for improved communications in the area to make such a development possible at all.

Once a week I travel up the Whitechapel road, the M11 and—I hesitate to mention this again in the presence of the Secretary of State for Transport — the A11 to Norfolk. I am being given signals to get off the subject quickly. Those of us who drive up the Whitechapel road, through Leytonstone and up the M11, realise what foolishness it would be to have a large London airport sitting next door to the M11. As the Member of Parliament for Norwich, North—and I have an interest to declare because Norwich airport is situated in my constituency —I have to consider this matter in any judgment that I may wish to make in a debate.

In fairness, I should point out that in Norfolk there are mixed views on the question of Stansted airport. I know that it is the policy of Norwich city council and of Norfolk county council to oppose in principle any large-scale development of Stansted airport. They wish, rightly, to encourage the development of Norwich airport to serve the needs of the region. In my view, this must mean modest development for Norwich airport with a view to encouraging further business and tourism activity in Norfolk and East Anglia generally. This will surely help to preserve and increase job opportunities not only in my constituency but in neighbouring Norfolk constituencies.

[Mr. Thompson]

To take just one example from my constituency, many people in Norwich are employed by the airline Air U.K. Ltd. I have their interests very much in mind when I come to any judgment in the debate.

I appreciate that the Government and the Secretary of State have in mind the encouragement and development of regional airports such as Norwich. The nub of the case that we are considering surely is that the inspector in his summary says:

"The growth of passenger demand will continue into the foreseeable future. In so far as that demand arises in the south east, it should be met by the provision of additional capacity within the region."

With respect, I regard that as a non sequitur if ever there was one. As an ex-schoolmaster, I know that the demand for entry into Oxford university—or perhaps I should say Cambridge university tonight—is ever-increasing, but it does not follow that everybody will go to that university.

The Stansted question has gone on for far too long. We have all been subjected to an endless flow of statistics, circulars and so on. I believe that we must encourage increased activity and prosperity where there is room and people want it. If we change the rules by defeating the Stansted idea once and for all, the market will adapt and there will be benefit for all the regions.

Today we have a chance to end the pressure for Stansted that has been going on for 30 or more years and the pressure for ever more development in the south-east at the expense of the north. We have the opportunity to end the pressure for any south-east inland airport which will be to the detriment of people who live in these areas. We know, and have heard tonight repeatedly, that the case for Stansted expansion is weak. We know that it is wrong. Let us take this chance to make that clear once and for all.

10.8 pm

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I have great sympathy with the view expressed by the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) and I shall do my best to respond to it briefly because I believe that, especially in his latter remarks, he made an appeal to the House that we should consider carefully.

I believe that any hon. Member who participates in a debate should do his best to listen to the speeches that are made from the Government and Opposition Front Benches at the beginning of the debate. I have followed this rule in almost every debate in the House in which I have participated. It so happens that I did not hear the speeches of my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) or the Minister, for which I apologise. [Interruption]. If hon. Members listened, they would understand why I wish to intervene. I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, would not have called me if I were not entitled to take part. All hon. Members, if they possibly can, should listen to the opening speeches from both sides of the House. I say to Government Members, who apparently are irritated that anyone from the Opposition should speak in such terms, that I have participated in more debates on these matters than—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Foot: We had a debate on Stansted in 1968 or 1969 in which I participated and on which we voted. The Labour Government were proposing to proceed to build an airport at Stansted, although their proposal was tentative. The House was full and the vote was large. There were many differences of opinion and I was dubious about the case put from the Treasury Bench by Anthony Crosland on behalf of the Department of the Environment. As always, he made an extremely powerful case, but a few of us were not convinced by it. I have a strong recollection of the debates in the House on this subject. In that Parliament the Government majority was considerably narrower than it is today and therefore the way in which hon. Members voted was of more decisive consequence.

Not because of the failure of Anthony Crosland to present his case—he always did that well—but because of what I believed to be the de-merits of the case, I was not prepared to support the Labour Government on that occasion. I listened carefully to those who put the case against the extension of the airport at Stansted and I thought that their case was powerful. They have a powerful case today, which is why I intervene now.

I agree with the hon. Member for Norwich, North. I think that it would be valuable for the country as a whole if we could kill off here and now the whole idea of a large extension of Stansted. I shall be happy to vote to achieve that result at the end of our discussions, and I hope that as many hon. Members as possible will help to secure that result. Stan Newens, who knew the area well, would not vote for the Government, who were then supporting the idea of extending Stansted. I took the same view. One of the reasons why even so long ago we were so opposed to the proposition concerned, of what would happen to many towns and villages. If the plan for the expansion of Stansted had been carried through, it would have caused the wrecking of many communities.

Some hon. Members today have put their case strongly and I respect their case. Many towns and villages in Essex and elsewhere will be wrecked if the plan goes ahead. We have to be careful about doing that. I hate to vote for the wreckage of such communities. I only wish that some hon. Members who are so passionate in defending communities around Stansted were equally passionate in defending the communities around Abertillery and Ebbw Vale. Exactly the same kind of community spirit is involved.

I do not suppose that any hon. Member who tries to put the case against the Government's proposals will mock the community spirit of all the towns and villages that are to be found around Stansted. Those people are defending their communities. They cannot bear the idea of their communities being uprooted and wrecked unless it is for an absolutely paramount national purpose. The same community spirit exists in Abertillery, Blaenau, Nantyglo and all the towns and villages that contain mining communities. Perhaps some of those who so strongly defend the rights of the inhabitants of towns and communities in that part of England will also defend the rights of the inhabitants of communities that depend upon the mining industry.

So at least I am consistent. That is why, when the matter was posed some 20 years ago, I found it very difficult to go into the Lobby and say, "Let us vote for it, irrespective of the consequences for all those towns and villages". There is always a difficult and awkward balance to be struck. Some communities have to be uprooted and sacrificed to the national interest, but it ought to be done with the utmost care and reticence. There have been reports by inspectors, it is true, but I have seen inspectors' reports that do not pay very much regard to these important considerations. I do not say that all of those important considerations are neglected. A balance has to be struck. However, if many communities around Stansted would be wrecked by this proposal, we ought to be very careful before we vote for it. I shall not vote for it. Communities around Heathrow could make claims, too, but not quite the same claims.

The reason for the disturbance in the House tonight is the different balance of community representation. If anybody jeered at me at the beginning of my speech for getting up to speak on the matter, I would say to them that I have spoken before on the matter and that I shall always examine the possibilities for preserving communities that are fighting for their rights. Those hon. Members who have spoken on behalf of such communities are doing just that. I do not believe that the hopes and the rights of those communities should be killed off by one vote tonight. That cannot be done. Indeed, so strong is the case against the extension of Stansted that if sufficient Conservative Members were to vote in the Aye Lobby with the Opposition the proposal would be killed off. That would be a good day not only for Stansted but for the House of Commons.

However, I read in the newspapers that the Government propose to deal with the matter in a very different way. A report in today's Financial Times—I am sure that all hon. Members agree that the Financial Times reporter is a most reliable political correspondent who tells the Government exactly what they are up to and what is going on—says:

"The Government has ducked the threat of a Tory revolt and a probable defeat in the establishment of a third London airport at Stansted. It has instructed Ministers and their parliamentary private secretaries not to vote when the issue is debated in the Commons tonight; and has put its back-benchers on a one-line whip—a tacit encouragement to abstain."

To deal with the matter in such a fashion is to demean the House of Commons. The Government must face up to these questions sooner or later. Why do they not face up to them now? Many Opposition Members have for many years conducted a campaign for the north-west in order to sustain the claims of Manchester, and, as we have seen tonight, many Conservative Members have put that case strongly.

The Government submitted to the demands for a debate and underlined its importance by agreeing that we should have an extra two hours so that more hon. Members could participate. For the Government then to say, "We shall make a mockery of the vote" is an insult not only to hon. Members who are interested in the subject but to the House. Adjournment debates are an important instrument for the House. Some of Parliament's most important debates have taken place on Adjournment motions. The Government have no right to say that they will not regard an Adjournment debate as a matter of importance and that Ministers will be told to stay away.

If the newspaper story is not true, I hope that it will be repudiated. The Minister who is to reply may tell us to wait and see how many Ministers vote. We shall count them. If all the Ministers vote—we know how obediently they turn up when they are required to do so—we shall know that the story is not true. However, if Ministers stay away, it will be a shameful treatment of the House by the Government and a special insult to hon. Members who have participated in the debate and pressed the case of their constituents with all the strength that they can.

It seems that some Conservative Members are irritated that I should be speaking in the debate. Apparently, they would rather debate the matter than win the issue. We would rather win the issue. We want to kill off Stansted. I was against it 20 years ago and I am against it now. If Conservative Members wish to assist us in killing off Stansted, they can vote with us, and if we achieve a substantial majority the Government will have to take account of what has been said.

If the Government try to pretend that the vote, which ever way it goes, is of no consequence, they will insult some Conservative Members, infringe the rules of the House and injure our possible ways of proceeding in the future. How can we have Adjournment debates if it is said that it does not matter which way they go?

Perhaps the most important parliamentary debate this century—the overthrow of the Chamberlain Government in 1940 — took place on an Adjournment motion. [Interruption.] I know that some hon. Members want to trivialise the debate and none more so than the Secretary of State for Transport, who will not last very long anyway. Any attempt by the Government to trivialise Adjournment debates will be injurious to the House. I invite all hon. Members who do not want to see the development of Stansted and want to uphold the rights of the House to vote with the official Opposition. That is the way to uphold the rights of the House.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): It is a great pleasure to be called to participate in the debate after the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), who is one of Parliament's great orators. I am sorry to say that on this occasion, as on others, the right hon. Gentleman allowed his emotions to overrun his appraisal of the mood of the House. I have great respect for the right hon. Gentleman and I happen to think that he is one of our distinguished parliamentarians. I am merely making the observation that, not for the first time, he has misjudged the mood of the House.

It is clear that the Eyre report is an important document. I believe that Mr. Graham Eyre has done Parliament and the country a great service by producing it. We have been given the opportunity to debate important and essential issues. There has been imput to the debate from almost every part of the country and I am delighted that I have been given the opportunity to make an imput to it from the most northern constituency that has featured in it.

No one can accuse me of having a direct interest in what is going on at Heathrow other than as a commuter from Scotland at least twice a week. However, I have an interest in aviation which I must declare at the outset. I have an interest in an airline company.

Airline companies respond to the needs of the market within operating restrictions, and it is the regulations that often present the problem. We have heard of the difficulties at Manchester airport, and I have intervened on one or two occasions to elicit some useful information. If we are to talk about free competition and the opportunity for customers to travel, we must examine the opportunities that are available to the airlines to provide a service. Unless the opportunities are open to the airlines, there is no prospect of them using our airports. On the other hand, if there are opportunities for the airlines because the regulations are so framed, we must consider why airlines do not want to operate out of certain airports. The usual reason is that the airlines are not convinced that it will be commercially viable for them to do so.

Observations have been made about charter operations and an attempt has been made to confuse them with scheduled operations. Scheduled flights have to be flown irrepective of whether the aircraft are full, whereas charter operators will not fly unless they have fully booked aircraft. That is the general pattern.

As a regular user of Heathrow airport, I recognise that Heathrow is the jewel in the crown of civil aviation in the United Kingdom. If we do not maximise the use of Heathrow airport, we are being foolish and doing a disservice to many of those who have spoken against development at Heathrow this evening. Unless Heathrow continues to meet the demands of the world's airlines and customers—that calls for giving them adequate facilities when they land because there is no point in having aircraft land there if the terminal facilities are inadequate and do not meet the needs of the customers — it will not prosper. I have believed for a long time that those who argue against the fifth terminal development have not taken on board the needs of the customers, and it is their needs that matter.

It is unfortunate that we have become bogged down in the air traffic movement limit, which I happen to believe is nonsensical. All the airlines would say that it is nonsensical as would the Civil Aviation Authority. There is plenty of scope for additional movements at Heathrow. It is true that at certain hours of the day the airfield is fully utilised, but at other times it is very much under-utilised. The answer lies in the slotting arrangements, which are made by the airlines. It is not known by many who debate these matters that it is the airlines which agree on which slot a particular airline will occupy.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is the view of the airlines and the Heathrow scheduling committee that the airport's capacity is considerably more than 330,000 ATMs—nobody knows exactly—and that we should leave the airlines to come to a decision?

Mr. Walker: I agree. There is no doubt that the airlines and the national air traffic services which are responsible for the safe movement of aircraft agree that there is scope for additional ATMs at Heathrow. Of course, the prime consideration must be safety. That must be the only real consideration. Provided that it is safe to operate within certain limits, the maximum use should be made of Heathrow, the jewel in the crown.

There is scope at Gatwick for further development. It is wrong that we should be using the major runway there for commuter aircraft; there should be a commuter runway at Gatwick. I have been in small aircraft which have been stacked, waiting to come into Gatwick after heavier aircraft have landed, and that has been a frustrating experience. Let us develop Gatwick.

The whole Stansted issue must be considered sensibly and objectively. The runway and facilities are there and the terminal is coping with present demand. Stansted should be allowed to develop and evolve naturally, remembering that a substantial number of airlines want to go there. Hon. Members should note that the demand to use Stansted, particularly for charter operations, is increasing. That particularly applies to airlines from the eastern seaboard of the United States and elsewhere, and that interest should be allowed to develop.

Much has been said about Manchester airport, and I intervened earlier to refer to airlines which had authority to fly there but had not done so. At a given time in airline evolution, the economics may not make it practicable to use a licence to fly to an airport. We have lived through a period of intense difficulty when airlines, like everyone else, have had to face the economic problems resulting from the activities of the OPEC countries in the last 10 years.

As a result, there were times when airlines with licences did not use them because it would have stretched their liquidity to do so. That did not mean that scope did not exist for airlines to operate at those airports; simply that, at that time in their evolution, they did not have the capital to do so.

We are now entering a new era in airline and aviation activity and we should not look at the future in a blinkered way. Manchester airport has a great future and it should be a gateway to the north Atlantic and elsewhere.

It will not come as a surprise to hon. Members when I say that I am a great supporter of Prestwick. However, I shall not spend time tonight on that subject, other than to say that it is already a gateway. Those who ask why it is now coming back into use as a gateway should realise that that is happening because of the changing fortunes of the airlines. Things are improving, and I see opportunities ahead for them.

The Government must not muff this one. Never again must we be in the position of not being able to see a realistic future for the British airline and aviation industry. The Government should make the maximum use of Heathrow and Gatwick and allow Stansted to develop as the demand increases. That could mean an additional 5 million rather than 15 million passengers. Either way, there will be a demand to use Stansted because the runway and facilities are there and the airlines will want to use it.

Those who think that if we do not allow the development of Heathrow, including terminal 5, to take place—the commuter airlines will have access to that major airport — are kidding themselves. Unless we guarantee an increase in movements and increased facilities to meet that increase, airports throughout the country with commuter services going into Heathrow will face problems.

I therefore counsel those who have been discussing the issue from the narrow aspect of their local airports to remember that, whatever happens in the future, Heathrow will continue to be the jewel in the crown and the magnet and that we shall want our commuter aircraft to use that airport.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): One of the great mysteries to me has been the fact that during the past 20 years the most consistent piece of Government policy—no matter which party has been in power—has been the desire to undertake the major expansion of Stansted airport. Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry, for the Environment or for Transport, after collecting their seals, after the kissing of hands ceremony and after leaving Buckingham palace, go back to the great white Lubianka in Marsham street and go through the secret, simple and moving ceremony of being given the documents dealing with a major expansion of Stansted airport.

It is right and proper that there should be passion in this debate from hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) and, if he gets the opportunity, my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley), because they live in the area and have their constituents' interests at heart. I commend my hon. Friends for that. There are, however, many people in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) who have fought against the major expansion of that airport for 21 years. Promises have been made and broken by successive Governments. It is right that Stansted airport's expansion, which seems to behave like some great unslaked vampire, should finally be laid to rest this evening.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths), in a forceful and perceptive speech, made it clear——

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I just want to explain the mystery to the hon. Gentleman. Does he not realise that there are civil servants who have these plans in little cubby holes and, when they find a Minister stupid enough to take them out and make them his own, they are presented to the House of Commons as Government policy?

Mr. Hayes: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but I shall say no more on that matter. I understand what he says.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds rightly said that long-term passenger predictions had been horribly wrong. There is no reason why the figures put forward by the inspector will be wrong as well. It would be foolish to deny that there will be an increase in passenger demand in the next few years, but we should not forget that it would be a grave mistake to expand Stansted airport, to the detriment of the environment and of the people. We are talking about investment in the infrastructure worth about £716 million, about the British Airports Authority spending £1 billion in extending a terminal, and about extending a rail link at a cost of £170 million. All the time our Chancellor and our Government are telling us that we should be particularly worried and careful about the public sector borrowing requirement.

It is about time the Government grasped the nettle of understanding that we must have a consistent and coherent airport strategy and policy that will bring us fairly and squarely into the 21st century and beat off foreign competition. We should accept wholeheartedly the inspector's recommendation to expand terminal 5 immediately. Let it be expanded to take 53 million passengers, but at the same time let Stansted be allowed to expand naturally from 5 million to perhaps 6 million or 7 million passengers.

Ours is the Government of free competition. Where is the free competition at Stansted at the moment? The airport is heavily subsidised, but still loses £4 million a year. We are the party of free competition and market forces. Let us give the north a fair slice of the cake. We have not done so over the years. That is one of the reasons why I shall not vote with the Government this evening.

British Airways has made it clear that a major expansion of Stansted airport would be an economic disaster. The split-site operation would increase BA's operating costs by about 5 per cent. It would add £150 million a year to those operating costs.

Mr. Tim Smith: That is British Airways' problem.

Mr. Hayes: It is the taxpayers' problem, and it will be an even greater problem for the taxpayer because it will be a further shadow cast over the privatisation of the airline.

How will my constituency be affected in terms of jobs? The effect will be devastating. One of my largest electrical employers, who employs several thousand people, made it clear to the public inquiry that it would consider pulling out of the constituency. There would be a net loss of jobs, though we have heard about the mass migration of thousands of people into my constituency. The inspector talked about the urbanisation of Harlow. There are already only 14 acres of development land left. The housing list grows longer every day, yet the inspector talked of the possible substantial urbanisation of Harlow. He said that about 17,000 dwellings would have to be built in the area.

I understand the real fears of those hon. Members who have a constituency interest in terminal 5. However, what does the inspector say about noise? He says:

> "I am wholly satisfied that the development and operation of a fifth terminal would not have a perceptible effect on the noise climate in the Heathrow area. The development would not delay the improvement or rate of improvement in any way that would be discernible to those affected by Heathrow air noise."

The first message that should be brought home to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is one that was made to him forcefully in the CAA debate. The limitation on air traffic movements of 275,000 which the Government intend to impose at Heathrow is nonsense. It will make nonsense of terminal 4, and it will make terminal 5 utterly impossible. I am sure that many of my hon. Friends accept that, with the new microwave techniques, it is possible to have more than the 330 air traffic movements suggested in the CAA's revised figures.

As the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) said in a speech with which I wholeheartedly agreed, we must make it clear to the Government and the country that the House will not be ridden over roughshod. My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction must realise that a number of hon. Members are dissatisfied with the present proposals and that a number of us will not allow our constituencies and our communities to be devastated.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Because of the great importance of Manchester international airport, the Opposition's contribution to the debate has been dominated by my hon. Friends from the north-west of England. However, we do not mean to imply that the debate is about Manchester airport. It is about airport strategy and policy for the country as a whole.

We all accept that—as the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) rightly said — Heathrow will continue to be the centre of the United Kingdom's airports policy. Although we are defending our communities and their interests, we have a common cause with other northern airports such as Newcastle and Leeds-Bradford, Scottish airports such as Prestwick. The hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), he spoke with a clear constituency interest, but that is not incompatible with a national airports policy. We must have such a policy. That is what is so disappointing with the inspector's report. It is not an objective report about a national airports policy but one that is premised and predicated by pressure from the airline establishment, the CAA and the BAA, which have a strong vested interest in the development of Stansted.

The CAA was not designed as anything other than a regulatory body. That it should have chosen, 48 hours before the debate, to weigh in on the side of the inspector's report and Stansted calls into question its future and reputation. The report is premised by acceptance of the orthodoxies of the airline establishment. I pay tribute to the North of England Regional Consortium, which has made information freely available to all hon. Members. It is one of the few groups that has given us the opportunity to examine arguments that run counter to the report, the airline establishment and, it seems, the Secretary of State.

The report does not tackle some basic facts. There is no adequate discussion of the costs of developing Stansted. That should be compared with the Roskill report, which made a detailed examination of the cost structures then available. As to the evidence on which the inspector bases his report, I should like to quote from Colin Buchanan's pamphlet "Deadlock at Stansted". He writes:

> "The result of the Inspector's approach is strikingly illustrated by his own estimates of the future distribution of air travel. By 1995 the passenger through-put in London airports will be twice that of all the other UK airports put together. With a mere 17 million people living in the South East and 37 million elsewhere it sounds like forecasting gone mad".

He is right, because the inspector talks of 75 million movements in the south-east and only 36 million in the rest of the country. He is effectively telling people in the north, Scotland and Wales that they will either be denied the opportunity to travel through airports or will have to go through airports in the south-east. That is ridiculous and an insult to my constituents and those of many other right hon. and hon. Members.

The amount of capital required to develop Stansted is also unacceptable to those of us who do not represent the south-east. Even the minimal estimates of the inspector are for perhaps £500 million. The more realistic estimates of the North of England Regional Consortium reach £1·3 billion. We simply cannot accept so much investment going to the south-east. I do not want to deny the south-east of its share of public investment, but it would not be acceptable for such a massive development to go ahead in one region at a time of public expenditure restraint and directly at the expense of other regions. In Manchester, Liverpool and Glasgow we need investment in housing, schools and the infrastructure. Such cities have housing crises and decaying sewers. They have a manifest need for investment both to create employment and facilities that are decaying. We could not, therefore, accept that investment.

Moreover, such investment would deny other airports their place in the airport structure of the United Kingdom. If Stansted is developed, it will guarantee that Manchester airport cannot be the gateway airport, about which even the Government Front Bench will refer to in glowing terms. Given massive airport development in the south-east, airlines will not allow their aircraft to fly into and out of the north of England.

We were willing to co-operate with British Airways recently about the CAA report. But British Airways has not been a friend to Manchester airport in the past. It has taken a defensive strategy and has known that it is safer to operate from the south-east. It was not prepared to experiment and to move to Manchester, where the commercial gain exists, but at a higher risk.

The north-east has passengers. Our catchment area represents 20 million people. I should be delighted to know what the Minister finds so amusing about the plight of Manchester airport. If he is listening, perhaps he would like to leap to his feet and explain. In the absence of any comment from him, I repeat that Manchester airport has a catchment area of 20 million people. That is as large as that in the south-east. The area deserves the third international airport, but not at the exclusion of developments in Leeds-Bradford, Speke or other regional airports. That would not be the case with the development of Stansted. If Stansted is developed, Manchester and all other regional airports would not have the necessary capital made available to expand.

The issue is important for the north-west, and it unites hon. Members from all regions. Hon. Members representing the south-east recognise the need for an airports policy, which will maintain the supremacy of the south-east as the centre of the air industry. But they recognise, as we do, the importance of allowing people who do not live within an hour of London the opportunity of an airport structure which serves their interests as consumers and in developing the economies of those areas.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): I speak as the authentic voice of Heathrow airport because the entire airport, including terminals 4 and 5, lie within my constituency. The development is vital to the well-being of my constituents because T4 will create about 20,000 jobs. Like my colleagues from the north on both sides of the House, I find it amazing that some of my hon. Friends, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), should be unconcerned about the creation of so many jobs and more concerned about the problems of noise.

As I understand it, all airlines want T5. Travellers coming to London want to arrive at Heathrow. I remind my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State of a comment he made to me when I suggested that some domestic movements could be moved from Heathrow elsewhere. He said:

"When people fly to London, they want to come to Heathrow, not Gatwick or Stansted."

I hope that he will bear that in mind when he comes to make some decisions.

Regional airports have an important part to play in the future of civil aviation. Being in favour of terminal 5 does not mean being opposed to regional expansion. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have rightly made the point about the need for the Government to take into consideration the north and its problems of unemployment and so on. I fully support a scheme that would allow for the expansion of Manchester and other northern airports alongside the development of terminal 5.

A third major airport at Stansted is not wanted. The Government should bear in mind that that strong view has been put forward during the seven hours of this debate. However, a marginal increase in traffic movements would be accepted by those who live in and around the area, but nothing more at this stage.

Terminal 5 is seen as providing the best solution for future additional airport capacity. The inspector saw terminal 5 as providing an opportunity on the best site anywhere in the United Kingdom for airport expansion to modernise and improve Heathrow's facilities. There will also be the increased prosperity throughout the area to which I have referred.

The inspector dealt fully and comprehensively with noise. He dismissed the arguments of the well organised and articulate anti-Heathrow noise lobby. One wonders how many of those people who complain about noise have moved into the area since Heathrow has developed at reduced house prices and now want to maintain the value of their properties. The inspector said that terminal 5 would not make a perceptible difference on either the level of noise or the rate of noise reduction in future. I fully agree with that.

The inspector also said that the 275,000 ATM limit was misconceived and ill-advised, and he produced substantial evidence to justify that view. Approximately 20,000 general ATMs at Heathrow could be moved immediately and I should like to see that happen straight away.

One wonders why the Government tried to introduce the Civil Aviation Bill to bring those movements in. My guess is that it had something to do with civil servants who seem to be controlling civil aviation and its policy developments in Britain. At times Sir Norman Payne could be substituted for the permanent secretary in the Department of Transport and nobody would notice the difference in the work done.

Infrastructure improvements are necessary in the Heathrow area whether or not terminal 5 is built and prior to the coming on line of terminal 4. The inspector supports the view of the Hillingdon borough council that the Hayes bypass should be built. He felt that it had a strategic role to play and should be given trunk road status or 100 per cent. funding from the Department of Transport. He went on to say that the Department's view as to why it should not be a trunk road or 100 per cent. funded was wholly unacceptable and he could not understand the reasoning or the lack of it.

The expansion of the Piccadilly line would make a real contribution to the access to Heathrow, and that was also supported by the inspector. As we have heard, British Rail is developing a junction at Iver station and a link from there to Heathrow is a possibility which could also make some contribution to solving the potential access problems of the airport.

Terminal 5 has the advantage that it could be financed by the airlines and would provide an attractive rate of return if Heathrow were to be privatised. That is also important in the context of the public expenditure aspects of the capital investment. Government capital investment would be modest but long overdue in the successful part of south-east England where public investment has not kept pace with the increase in economic development. The Government must bear that in mind when they make their decision.

I am pleased that the British Airports Authority has suddenly come round to being in favour of terminal 5. If or when terminal 5 comes on line, we must ensure that the dirty hands of the BAA are kept away from it. It created chaos when it organised the operation of terminal 4. The people who want to use terminal 4 have not been consulted about the layout. The concessionaires on the car hire side have been told that they will have small kiosks where only one person will be able to work and where they will not be able to use their computers.

The British Airports Authority is not interested in the problems. When I wrote to my hon. Friend the Minister of State about some of the problems, I am sure that the reply I received was written by civil servants. It defended the British Airports Authority's view and suggested that the authority was doing a damn fine job. It is an appalling organisation and it is about time someone investigated its operation. I understand that the Monopolies and Mergers Commission will be doing so in the not-too-distant future; it is long overdue. There has been very little consultation between it and anyone else about any airport that it controls anywhere.

The development of terminal 5 must be put in train immediately. That means giving all the planning consents necessary to get it off the ground. Regional airports can be expanded along with terminal 5. Neither is mutually exclusive. The south-east does not need a major third airport. The development of terminal 5 calls for infrastructure improvements along the lines I have suggested.

Mr. Malcolm Thornton (Crosby): Those of us who are in favour of regional airport development are delighted because nobody has been against their development. We were delighted to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State say in his opening remarks that it is the Government's desire to bring air travel within the reach of more people. The most effective way of doing so is to bring it within their reach literally by letting us have the option to expand the regional airports.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) referred to those who are opposing regional airports. I do not believe that anybody is. What we are concerned about is that many decisions that have been taken seem to frustrate actively the growth of regional airports. That is what a fundamental part of the debate is about.

There is a chicken and egg situation. We say that there is a demand for the development of regional airports. How can we test the demand if policies seem to work against regional airports going out and capturing the market that they say exists? In its press release of 17 January British Airways said:

> "We are committed to introducing international services from regional airports whenever there is enough customer demand to make them viable. We know from our surveys that Manchester is the main candidate for our second international hub, and now that Government aviation policy has been finalised, we are pressing ahead as fast as possible."

That airline, which has actually tested the market, is saying to the Government, "Give us the opportunities; we will provide the services because we believe that the demand exists." We are asking for a fair deal so that we can test the market for regional development.

I want to refer to the frustration that we have experienced at Liverpool airport. I do not pretend that it can ever be the sort of airport that we hope Manchester airport will become. It will play a complementary role. One of the areas for expansion has to be the charter market. An important part of the package is the duty-free facility. Whenever we have asked Government for a duty-free facility to enable us to market Liverpool, they have moved the goal posts. They said we should have 50,000 passengers; we got 50,000. They upped it to 70,000; we got 70,000. Then they upped it yet again to 100,000. What price the encouragement of regional airports policy? If my right hon. Friend wants to encourage regional airports to expand, the Government must give them the means to test the market and attract customers.

The debate is about more than airport policy; it is about the north-south tilt. It is about the effect of a massive development at Stansted on regional development, on investment and on the commitment of Government resources. It is about the damage that will be done to the chances of the regional economies picking up in what will be a difficult period for us all in attracting investment.

The Government must strike a balance between a viable future policy for airports and airlines and the right economic balance for the regions. I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State not to disregard those two important elements of the equation. We in the north-west and the north will not lightly forgive a Government who make a decision which will make it difficult if not impossible for us to attract the investment which we believe would be diverted if the expansion of Stansted were to go ahead. That message is coming to us loud and clear from chambers of commerce and business men in our areas. I urge my right hon. Friend and his colleagues in the Cabinet to take that message on board. This is perhaps the most important decision that we as north-west Members will be called upon to take in our lifetimes. I urge the Government not to ignore our message.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I am grateful for this opportunity to express the views of the north-east group of Members. I intend to be brief, and I apologise for the fact that other parliamentary duties prevented me from attending the whole debate.

I should first point out an inconsistency in the discussion. Many hon. Members, on both sides, have stressed the need for regional development and the importance of airport facilities in that context. Others have claimed that the expansion of Stansted would demolish the surrounding countryside and interfere with the rural quietness. Frankly, the north-east would welcome some noise in the current silence of industries no longer in use while so many people are on the cobbles, suffering enforced indolence due to lack of investment. We badly need the injection that regional airport development would provide.

Newcastle is not the only important factor. I wish to make a special plea for the Teesside airport, which has a record for all-weather access unequalled by any other airport in the country. When all other airports have been closed, it has been able to take the largest craft. It also has excellent road and rail facilities at its boundary fence, and British Rail, for all the ineptitude of which some people complain, has put on inter-city 125 trains at the drop of a hat to get people to London almost as quickly as they would have got there from Heathrow.

I shall not go into detail now, but I hope that hon. Members will go into the points that I have made. I believe that the whole structure of airport authorities and management in this country is so crazy that it needs to be thoroughly examined and completely reconstituted.

11.9 pm

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): I shall be brief. The hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) is fortunate because he and his hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) have not been present during the debate. Some hon. Members have been present since half past three. It was all very well for the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) to say "Get on with it". We listened to a very boring speech from her at the beginning of the debate which lowered the tone and started the debate in a bad way. If the hon. Lady has something to say, I hope that she will get up and say it.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That will take time out of the debate, will it not?

Sir Fergus Montgomery: The debate revolves round airport policy, and I make no apology for putting the case for the north. Many hon. Members representing northern constituencies have tried desperately hard to make clear to the Government how anxious we are to have further development of the regional airports. The Government must heed the message of the two nations and recognise that, if there is to be a massive investment for a third major airport in the south-east, there will be an almighty explosion in the north of England. We badly need that investment in the north, which we believe will produce jobs and assist the region.

All Members of Parliament have been swamped with circulars in the last few days. I had to laugh at one which I received from a group which said that it would oppose the situation whereby passengers who had an origin or destination in south-east England were forced to fly from a regional airport. That point was taken up by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel).

I get a little sick of the fact that the north of England always seems to be treated as the poor relation. It is the people from the north who have to come down to Heathrow or Gatwick to make flights out of the country.

I disagree with the inspector's estimates of future London demand. Thousands of passengers from the north would be only too delighted if they could make their journeys direct from a northern airport instead of having to travel through London. Many figures and statistics have been given, but, in order to allow some of my hon. Friends to speak, I shall omit them. I cannot help feeling that the forecasts used by the inspector have given a false picture.

I am sorry that the inspector seems to have paid so little attention to the case that was put forward by the North of England Regional Consortium. I hope that my right hon. Friend will pay more attention to its case than was paid by the inspector.

Manchester international airport is a successful airport. It is Britain's third largest airport and already services 40 British and foreign airlines. However, I believe that under successive Governments — Labour and Conservative — the interests of Manchester airport have been subordinated to south-east England. I wonder how much thought has been given to the loss of time by business men who have to fly abroad on business and make the journey from Manchester or the north to Heathrow or Gatwick. How much more convenient and time-saving it would be if they could make their international flights from Manchester airport. If there were more international flights from Manchester it would be a great boon to businessmen in the north, it would improve trade links and it would generate much-needed jobs. Until such time as those services are provided, the northern business man must continue to waste time and money in travelling via London, Amsterdam or Frankfurt.

That brings me to the case of Singapore Airlines, which has already been touched on in the debate. This airline wanted to fly direct three times a week each way between Singapore and Manchester. It was perfectly happy to have straightforward competition with the British airline, which wanted to fly the same route. This was a tremendous opportunity for Manchester airport. Somebody in the Department of Transport refused the application on the grounds that there were not enough potential passengers to justify more flights. That smacks of the old adage of the man in Whitehall knowing best. If Singapore Airlines, which is one of the most efficient airlines in the world, believes that it makes commercial sense to fly from Singapore to Manchester, who is it in the Department of Transport who would argue on that score? I remind my right hon. Friend that when the Glasgow to London monopoly route of British Airways was opened to competition from British Midland, the number of passengers increased by 30 per cent., prices fell and the service improved. That pattern should be encouraged.

I make no secret of the fact that so far as airport policy is concerned I want to know what is in it for Manchester. Every hon. Member will be fighting his own corner for the area that he represents.

I question some of the recommendations of the inspector, for example, that Stansted should be expanded to take 15 million passengers per year by 1990 with a further growth thereafter to 25 million, with no second runway to be allowed. Heathrow's capacity is to be increased from 28 million passengers to 38 million when terminal 4 is completed next year and to 53 million by 1995 with the addition of the fifth terminal. I am still unconvinced that we need three major airports in the southern corner of England. I query whether a boost to the economy of more than £1 billion should be applied to the Stansted area where unemployment is not a major problem. Such an investment would be welcome in the north.

Massive development at Stansted would undermine the regional airports. They have an important part in the economies of the regions. They could play an even more important part by encouraging new industrial investment and the development of tourism. It should never be forgotten that they could have an enormous effect on relieving pressure on the London airports. However, I realise that regional airports would have to face much greater difficulties if they are competing with a massive subsidised airport at Stansted.

There is an answer to my right hon. Friend's dilemma. If he gives regional airports real encouragement they could release capacity at Heathrow and Gatwick and make a large-scale expansion at Stansted unnecessary. It would also make the best use of national airfield resources.

I realise that the purpose of the debate is for Ministers to listen. I beg my right hon. and hon. Friends not to dismiss the case for the north as contemptuously as the inspector did. It makes great sense to utilise to the full the airport capacity that we have, rather than to spend enormous sums on Stansted.

Sir Colin Buchanan has just published a pamphlet, at the end of which he states:

> "To give regional airports greater scope would make sense in relation to the spread of the population and would aid economic recovery."

I hope that that phrase will be heeded when the decision is finally taken.

11.17 pm

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I am opposed to the construction of a fifth terminal at Heathrow because of the damaging effect that it will have on my constituency. It will result in increased noise and affect the roads and the environment.

As the chairman of the South Bucks district council, Mr. Peter Janes, recently said:

> "If Heathrow is expanded it will again be the long suffering population of the Heathrow hinterland who will endure the consequences of more aircraft overhead, more traffic on local roads and major erosion of the green belt."

Aircraft noise is of particular concern to my constituents in Colnbrook, Dorney, Burnham and Taplow. They wish the 275,000 limit on air traffic movements to be imposed and kept. So do I.

The M4 is already overloaded. The M25 will be at capacity when it is opened. Further pressure will be put on local roads and the whole point of the M25, which for my constituents is the relief of local congestion, will be lost.

The green belt in south Bucks is already severely damaged. Only last Monday I had an Adjournment debate on the situation in Iver. I said:

> "Iver is under attack from every quarter". — [Official Report, 21 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 834]

If the fifth terminal is allowed, the Perry Oaks sewage works will have to be moved either to south Iver or to

[Mr. Tim Smith]

Dorney. Both villages are in my constituency and both propositions would be totally unacceptable to my constituents.

Both the M4 and the M25 pass through Iver, and now the Department of Transport wants to build a motorway service area in Iver and British Rail wants to build a park-and-ride there. If the fifth terminal goes ahead, Slough might as well become part of Greater London, along with Iver and Colnbrook. We might as well give up the pretence that it is in a green belt and accept that we are the unwilling victims of urban sprawl.

Each time a motorway has been built, gravel has been extracted locally. Now the inspector suggests that more gravel should be extracted to build a fifth terminal. Therefore, any remaining part of the green belt will become a giant rubbish tip.

When I gave evidence to the inquiry, I dealt in detail with the effect on south Iver and on Dorney. Because of the shortage of time I shall not deal with that again. All I would say is that because it would severely damage the quality of life in south Buckinghamshire I am totally opposed to the inspector's recommendation that a fifth terminal should eventually be built at Heathrow.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): An advertisement in today's copy of The Times from the North of England Regional Consortium begins:

"This is the third time that the British Airports Authority have tried to foist Stansted upon the public. On two previous occasions they have failed. But at the third attempt, and after the expenditure of millions of pounds and even more millions of words, their persistence has brought them a favourable report from the Public Inquiry Inspector."

In this debate we have heard a great deal, much of it disparaging, about the British Airports Authority. If its persistence has borne the truth of the national interest in upon the inspector, then all power to it. If what this advertisement says and really means is that its millions of pounds have bought it the inspector, then that advertisement is scurrilous.

We have heard in this debate a great deal about the north and about Heathrow, but very little about Stansted. There are lies, damned lies, and statistics. Hon. Members do not, of course, use the former, but we have heard a great deal about the latter. I do not believe that many hon. Members are unconvinced of the need for airport expansion in this country, so the question is not "what" but "where".

Hours ago I was asked by the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) what my interest in the matter is. I hold no brief for the British Airports Authority. My constituency is unlikely particularly to benefit, any more than is any other constituency in the country, from an airport at Stansted or anywhere else outside my constituency. I recognise the regional needs of the north and I recognise also the need for the expansion of regional airports, but we are debating a third London airport.

The case against another terminal at Heathrow has been made very forcefully by my right hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins), and by my hon. Friends the Members for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn) and for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) and, will I hope, be made by my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley), who is yet to speak. The nub of that argument is, "Yes, we do need more capacity, but," as my right hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne said, "land somewhere else."

The prime case against Stansted was made by the hon. Member in whose constituency that airfield is situated, my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst), who claimed to be speaking for the general good. My hon. Friend went on to criticise a MORI poll which showed that people in the area would welcome an expansion of that airfield because that poll was conducted within a 30-mile radius. It does not seem to me that 30 miles constitutes "the national good", the subject that we ought to be debating tonight. My hon. Friend went on to say that people have an insatiable appetite for air travel. I would ask hon. Members to consider that both I and my colleagues who sit on the tourism committee seek to attract new visitors to this country and the business and money that they will bring. If there is an insatiable appetite for air travel, and if it is bringing people to this country, that is all to the good.

I come to the case for the north, about which we have heard so much. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), at the beginning of this debate, when many hon. Members who are now chipping in were not present, said that not to locate this new and much needed airfield in the north would be "a crime against the north." I recognise the case for the north. I understand what unemployment means — it is 19 per cent. in my constituency.

However, we are talking, not about regional aid, but about the need for a new airport. I believe that the airport must be situated at Stansted. We have failed in the debate to consider what my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) described as "the interests of the customers" —the visitor and the international airlines. They wish to visit London and the continent. If we ignore that fact, we shall miss out.

If we do not adopt the report, 20,000 jobs will go to Schipol, Frankfurt and Paris. That will be because the House has not seized the opportunity to build the airport that is needed, where it is needed, now.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): In the few minutes that remain, I wish to express with all the vehemence that I can and with all the weight that I can muster the passion felt by my constituents about the airport inquiries and the misery that they suffer from living under the Heathrow flight path.

Noise is the most important consideration for my constituents and for nearly 3 million people who live in the vicinity of Heathrow. I resent the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Whitfield), who said that I should not complain about the quality of life for my constituents in wealthy Richmond. Noise is noise. Whether a person is employed or unemployed, old or young, noise at the levels around Heathrow is unacceptable.

Whatever minor reductions may come from new technology, an increase in aircraft movements would provide a prospect of even greater horror. An unlimited hell is already unbearable for many of my constituents. A small drop of water is harmless, but the constant unremitting repetition of that drop—the Chinese water torture — drives its victims mad in terrifying agony. Heathrow is Richmond's water torture.

In a statement made to Mr. Eyre during his inquiry, and kindly repeated by him in the report, it was said:

"Modern technology has reduced aircraft noise from the totally unacceptable to the merely unbearable."

The report stated:

"Air noise is a modern curse from which the unfortunate inhabitants of the Heathrow area have been required to suffer over a long period."

The report went on:

"The present noise climate in some areas around Heathrow is worse than people should be required to accept."

The inspector said that double glazing might help, but double glazing does not help in Kew gardens or Richmond park or when people are trying to sleep with the windows open on hot summer evenings.

Aircraft noise and the horrendous levels of traffic, both in the air and on the roads in my constituency, are the blights of the area. There is no doubt that the development of a fifth terminal at Heathrow will increase aircraft movements beyond the unacceptable. Indeed, the level is already unacceptable.

British Airways has said that it proposes to increase the number of movements to 400,000 a year by modern technology and by using two parallel runways. The Government's position is what my constituents believe and what I have always told them. I hope that the Government will confirm that Heathrow will not be expanded beyond four terminals, air transport movements at Heathrow will be limited to 275,000 a year, for environmental reasons, Gatwick will remain a single-runway airport, regional airports will be developed to their full potential and that it is in the national interest to provide adequate facilities for future demand for air transport in London and the south-east. As Sir John Nott said, Stansted has chosen itself.

In summary, my constituents and I look for a realistic and viable development at Stansted, encouragement for regional airports as demand is created, an environmental limit at Heathrow, continuing noise reduction orders and, above all, no T5.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): This has been a parliamentary rather than a political occasion. I pay tribute to hon. Members on both sides of the House for the commitment that they have expressed to a regional airports policy.

I regret that time prevents me from listing one by one individual Members and their comments, but I pay tribute to the outstanding speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), which graphically set out the argument. He left no one in any doubt about the justice of his case. I pay tribute also to the speech of the hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst). As we expect on these occasions, he was fluent, coherent and impassioned in some instances, and rightly so. He has demonstrated over the years his determination to protect his constituency from what he sees, understandably enough, as the likely ravages of Stansted.

It has been suggested that, because the debate is being held on a motion for the Adjournment of the House, its importance is not particularly substantial. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) has demonstrated that that is not so. He observed that various important debates have taken place over the years on such a motion. It has been suggested in the newspapers that as the payroll vote, as it is somewhat disrespectfully known —Ministers and their Parliamentary Private Secretaries — has been instructed to stay well away from the Government Lobby this evening, the result of a Division will not matter. It is argued that the Government will have shown that it is not significant by keeping the payroll vote away and thereby downgrading its importance. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent has adequately disposed of that assertion, I hope that the House will reject it.

We have heard individual Members making out a case on behalf of their region or constituency regardless of party affiliation. They can best make out their case, and dispose of the Stansted argument once and for all, by using their votes in a Division. I understand that the Secretary of State claims that he has a quasi judicial role as he and the Minister of State, Department of the Environment is responsible for making the decision. I accept that. But to claim that the same quasi judicial role extends to every Minister stretches constitutional credulity, to say the least. I am sure that it provides a convenient excuse for the Government to explain away tonight's defeat, if defeated they are to be, but that will not make it any less relevant.

The Secretary of State said in opening the debate that the Government felt that this was an unprecedented opportunity for the House to debate a planning matter before a decision had been reached. The House should be suitably grateful for that. Of course, in the circumstances, it is understandable enough that the right hon. Gentleman glossed over the fact that the only reason why we are having the debate is that he has failed twice to get a sittings motion for the Civil Aviation Bill in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but when he tried to explain away yet another disaster for which he had been responsible he said that there would have to be a debate on this issue because of the Committee's failure to approve its sittings motion.

Unless we dispose of this matter this evening, the House can be sure that it will come back to haunt us. In December 1984 there was an article in the London Evening Standard by Mr. Max Hastings in which he left readers in no doubt that the first proposal to build Stansted airport was brought forward in 1967, when the then chairman of the British Airports Authority made it plain that unless Stansted went ahead the prospects of aeroplane landings and take-offs at London's airports would be diabolical to say the least by the mid-1970s. However, Sir Peter's worst fears were not realised in the mid-1970s and there is no sign and no evidence in the mid-1980s that his fears are more realistic 10 years on.

However, I may have some good news for the House. Regardless of what the civil servants dust down in the Department of Transport and the Department of the Environment, the track record of the Secretary of State for Transport suggests that he will be with us on the question of Stansted, for he is a long and consistent opponent of the construction of London's third airport. I do not often get the chance to praise him, but I am delighted to think that I shall be able to praise him on this occasion for what I hope will be his consistency. As a long-standing opponent of London's third airport, I hope that the House can rely on the right hon. Gentleman to make the right decision when the appropriate time comes.

On 13 June 1973 we debated the question of London's third airport when we discussed what was then the Maplin Development Bill. Indeed, one could easily delete

[Mr. Peter Snape]

"Maplin" and insert "Stansted" because the same arguments apply in both cases. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) was the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment at the time. Earlier tonight he said, bravely if cavalierly, "One cannot rely on Ministers' promises." He should know because he was responsible in those days.

When the Maplin Development Bill was being debated, the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) moved new clause 2, which read:

"It shall be the duty of the Civil Aviation Authority, in consultation with the Maplin Development Authority and appropriate Minister, to keep under constant review technical developments of new, quieter aero-engines, short take-off capability or other relevant factors affecting the operations of civil aircraft, and it shall take such action as may be appropriate to delay, vary or desist from the construction of an airport on land to be reclaimed as a result of the passage of this Act."

The hon. Gentleman moved the new clause in such a persuasive manner that the then Conservative Government suffered a dramatic defeat. No fewer than 15 Tory Members bravely demonstrated their principles by going into the Lobby with Labour Members. They thereby defeated the Government and wrote that important new clause into the Maplin Development Bill.

I am glad to remind the House that among those 15 good brave men and true was the present Secretary of State for Transport. As I said, praise for the right hon. Gentleman does not fall easily from my lips, but praise him I shall—it will probably do his career even more damage than he has done to it himself — if he demonstrates that virtue of consistency tonight and reaffirms his bravery of 13 June 1973.

In those days the Conservative party was led by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath). He and the present Secretary of State for Transport were hardly the best of friends, for the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup had had the temerity to fire his right hon. Friend from his then post at the Treasury.

However, there has been no such occurrence under the present Government. Bearing in mind the close relationship that obviously exists between the right hon. Gentleman and the Prime Minister, one can only hope that he adopts that consistency for which I have praised him so as to impress on the Prime Minister the fact that objection to the construction of London's third airport is as great now as it was in 1973, when he made that stand.

Mr. Soames rose——

Mr. Snape: I will not give way. The hon. Gentleman took more than 20 minutes, which is more than I have to wind up the debate. He did not say a great deal, though, to be fair to him, he said it prettily.

No case has been made for London's third airport. The statistical evidence is conflicting, to say the least, and the fact that the BAA has demonstrated its belief in London's third airport should impress nobody. The BAA has been a consistent supporter of the third London airport since the idea was first mooted. That is hardly surprising, because the effect on its finances is like winning the jackpot. No hon. Member needs to be reminded that, if the British Airports Authority is privatised in the Government's passion for privatisation and the third London airport is a going concern, BAA will be even more valuable when it comes on the market.

I agreed with a great deal of the speech by the hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Franks), who spoke with passion and commitment. I know that, as he comes from the Manchester area, he would wish to defend the future of Manchester airport. He said that the free market economy should dictate what happens in these matters, but I point out to the hon. Gentleman that that is not true anywhere else in the world, and there is no reason why it should be true in this country. The hon. Gentleman would leave it to the operators to decide where to fly, but I believe that the prospects of regional airports booming and developing are grim. All around the world it has been necessary for Governments to direct airlines as to which airports they should use. [Interruption.] It is not rubbish. A Right-wing Government in France had to direct French airlines and other airlines to use Charles de Gaulle airport, because when that airport was built all the airlines said that they would not use it. The Japanese Government, who were hardly a Left-wing Government, had to coerce the world's airlines to use the new Marita airport because it was so far from the centre of Tokyo. So market forces will not do the job.

Mr. Franks: It is the consumer who determines the free market.

Mr. Snape: It is not the consumer. Despite my praise for the hon. Gentleman's speech, I have to say that part of his speech was somewhat simplistic. He argues, as we do, that the consumers do not have a choice and are not allowed to dictate the market forces as they affect British regional airports. The arrogance of some hon. Members from the south of England who seem to believe that the only people who wish to buy tickets for international flights are based in and around London has to be heard to be believed. Are there no business men in Manchester or Birmingham who may wish to fly to, for example, the United States?

The Secretary of State—I am afraid that my praise for him is over; we are now back to our normal relationship—who professes a deep and undying belief in private enterprise, has prevented airlines from flying into our regional airports as a deliberate act of policy. Where is the free enterprise and consumer choice in that? This whole argument is riddled with inconsistencies.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Ridleyed.

Mr. Snape: And he is my Whip!

There is a fairly modern and prosperous airport in Birmingham.

I was astonished to hear the silly intervention of the hon. Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills), who, having intervened, headed for the door in mortification. He has not been seen since. I was astonished to hear him say that the capacity at Birmingham airport should not be increased. Despite spending £63 million on a brand new terminal, no more aeroplanes than at present should be allowed to take off and land there, because it would disturb the hon. Gentleman's constituents. I cannot understand an hon. Member who pleads such a case on behalf of his constituents. People living by an airfield should expect aircraft to take off and land. If any hon. Member took that attitude to a railway station, he would be laughed out of the Chamber. However, the hon. Member for Meriden said that, despite all the public expenditure on Birmingham airport, no other aeroplanes should be permitted to take off and land there.

An overwhelming case has been made for the regional airports. Every hon. Member, with the exception of three Conservative Members, has condemned the Government's proposals. For goodness sake, let the House of Commons speak out tonight. Let us kill off once and for all the myth that Stansted is necessary by casting all our votes in the same Division Lobby this evening. Only in that way can we plan the way forward. Only in that way can the country have a sensible aviation policy—a policy that, under successive Governments, it has long lacked.

The Minister for Housing and Construction (Mr. Ian Gow): The debate has lasted for nearly eight hours. It will come as no surprise to the House to learn that not a single member of the Social Democratic party has spoken and that only one Liberal Member has made a contribution. Although, excluding the Front Bench spokesman, 11 Labour Members have made speeches, it is the Tory party that has made the most massive contribution—[Laughter.] Oh yes. There have been 26 —[Interruption.]——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am anxious to hear the rest.

Mr. Gow: I am anxious to hear it myself. No fewer than 26 of my right hon. and hon. Friends have contributed to the debate.

It is not always wise to believe all that one is told, but I am told that the Opposition Whips were deeply concerned about the imbalance between those speaking from this side and those speaking from the Opposition side. They went out into the highways and byways and found the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), who had not even heard my right hon. Friend's opening speech.

No one who has listened to the debate can doubt the importance of the decisions that have to be taken or the strength of feeling in all parts of the House. Today's debate has underlined the wide range of interests that will be affected by those decisions. Although the planning applications relate to Stansted and Heathrow, the whole House accepts that the decisions that will have to be taken will be of deep relevance to the future of airports policy and to every part of the United Kingdom.

My right hon. Friend and I have listened to the debate with the greatest care, but the House will understand that, as my right hon. Friend explained at the beginning, we cannot comment on the arguments that have been deployed. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) acknowledged that fact.

I also remind the House that the procedures under which we are operating were not fashioned by my right hon. Friend or by the present Government. The procedures were laid down by the Labour Government in 1974. Scarcely had the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent got his feet under the desk at the Department of Employment in 1974 when the order was laid on 11 March 1974. It was one of the first measures of the Labour Government. The time for my right hon. Friend and the Government to explain the reasons for our decision and the time to comment on the arguments that have been advanced in the House and elsewhere will be in the later debate that was promised by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House last Thursday and which was reaffirmed by my right hon. Friend today. I cannot prejudge or be seen to be prejudging issues that are before my right hon. Friend and me for decision.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gow: I have little time.

Hon. Members: "Give way."

Mr. Speaker: Order. In fairness to the Minister, his time has been cut.

Mr. Gow: The inspector's report ranged widely. He has expressed conclusions on the present Stansted and Heathrow proposals——

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is rather inappropriate to raise points of order at this stage.

Mr. McWilliam: I must raise this point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister seems to be claiming the protection of the sub judice rule. Could you make it clear to the House that the sub judice rule does not apply to this debate?

Mr. Speaker: The Minister is a lawyer—I am not. I thought that I heard him say that he could not prejudge the issue.

Mr. Snape: He is a divorce lawyer.

Mr. Gow: The inspector has expressed conclusions on the Stansted and Heathrow proposals and on broader and longer-term issues of airport policy. Some hon. Members have paid tribute to the massive work that the inspector and the two assessors have done. I should like to join in paying tribute to them.

It might be helpful for me to explain the matters that are before my right hon. Friend and me and the procedures that we are required to follow. There are two principal matters for determination. The first is an outline planning application dated 25 July 1980 by the British Airports Authority for the expansion of Stansted airport to a capacity of about 15 million passengers a year. The second is an outline planning application dated 18 June 1981 by the Uttlesford district council for the extension of Heathrow airport by the provision of a fifth terminal and associated facilities and works.

Dependent upon the Stansted application are a number of other applications, including an application for planning permission for the carrying out of road works to give improved access to the airport, seven applications for listed building consent, an application for planning permission to re-erect three of the listed buildings on a site at Burton End; and a compulsory purchase order made by the BAA relating to land at Stansted.

The House will remember that, on 3 December 1980, the then Secretary of State for the Environment announced, in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst), that he had called in the British Airports Authority's application for the expansion of Stansted. He announced that he was appointing Mr. Graham Eyre QC to hold a public local inquiry into the proposals. Mr. Eyre was appointed subsequently to hold concurrent inquiries into the other matters to which I have referred.

On 12 February 1981 Mr. Philip Maynard was appointed as assessor to assist the inspector on planning and environmental matters, and on 8 April 1981 Mr. William Woodruff was appointed as assessor to assist on aviation matters. The inquiries opened on 19 September 1981 at Quendon park, near Stansted.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Gow: No, I have little time. The inquiries were adjourned on 28 October 1982. They were resumed on 11 January 1983 at the Crest hotel, Heathrow airport, and were closed after a total of 258 sitting days. The inspector's report was delivered on 28 November 1984, and published on 10 December 1984. It was made clear to the inspector that the inquiries were to be wide-ranging and that the Government intended the fullest opportunity to be given for objectors to express their views on the proposals both about Stansted and Heathrow, and for alternatives to be considered.

During the inquiry the inspector sought and was given the express assurance that he was not precluded from considering matters which ran counter to Government policy. The inspector took full advantage of those assurances and his inquiries were conducted, as his report has been framed, to take account of such matters.

The answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) is that in this case planning applications have been made, have been subject to long inquiries and are now awaiting decisions under the normal procedures laid down in the planning Acts. Despite the suggestion made by my hon. Friend, the question of a special development order cannot arise at this stage.

I remind the House that if my right hon. Friend and I should be disposed to disagree with any recommendation made by the inspector as a result of taking account of new evidence or a new issue of fact not being a matter of Government policy, we are under a statutory duty to inform the parties to the inquiry and to afford them an opportunity of making representations on the new evidence or new issue of fact. Initially it is for Ministers, and ultimately for the courts, to decide whether any material received after the inquiry constitutes new evidence or a new issue of fact that should be referred to the parties for comment. The fact that others may claim that certain material is new evidence or a new issue of fact does not make it so automatically, nor does it follow necessarily that it will influence Ministers' decisions or lead them to agree or disagree with any of the inspector's recommendations.

It is obvious to the House and clear to the Government that it is most desirable that my right hon. Friend and I should reach our decision on these applications as soon as possible, consistent with that thorough examination and consideration of the inspector's report that a matter of such great importance requires.

We shall follow strictly the rules which have been laid down by Parliament provided in the statutory instrument which was approved in 1974. We consider that we have now reached the time when final decisions need to be taken about the future of policy for airports. To every hon. Member who spoke, I say that his contribution will receive proper consideration. My right hon. Friend and I will come back to the House with our decisions at the earliest possible date.

Question put, That this House do now adjourn:—

The House proceeded to a Division—

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West) (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the inevitable defeat of the Government in this Division can you tell the House when the Prime Minister will be going to the Palace to offer her resignation?

Mr. Speaker: I think that that is hypothetical.

Mr. Canavan: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Presumably once the vote is announced the House will adjourn and there will be no further opportunity to raise points of order or for any other Member to speak. It is therefore important that you, as Speaker of the House of Commons, give a ruling as to what will happen as a result of the defeat of the Government. I suggest that following that defeat you should summon the Prime Minister to make a statement as to when she intends to offer her resignation.

Mr. Speaker: All this is hypothetical. None of us knows what will happen. But if the House votes to adjourn that is what we shall do.

Mr. Canavan: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the House votes in favour of the Adjournment, that will be tantamount to a defeat of the Government, but there will presumably be no opportunity to raise points of order after the result is announced.

Mr. Speaker: I can do nothing about that. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Adjournment is in the hands of the House. If the House votes to adjourn, we shall adjourn, and I shall not be here. If the House votes not to adjourn, we shall proceed in the normal way.

Mr. Canavan: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to give notice that if the Government are defeated in the Division I shall seek to raise a point of order afterwards to say that the Prime Minister should go to the Palace and offer her resignation and that there should be a general election.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call upon the Tellers.

The House having divided: Ayes 247, Noes 0.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Television Licence Fee

1. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about the television licence fee; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): Some 200 hon. Members and 900 members of the public have written during the current Session about the level of licence fees. In reaching my decision on the BBC's licence fee application I shall also take account of the review by independent consultants which the BBC has commissioned at my request.

Mr. Canavan: If the Government cannot see their way to abolish the licence fee completely and to fund the BBC from the Treasury, will the Home Secretary at least recognise that thousands of pensioners, who are dependent upon television as a source of information and entertainment, simply cannot afford the £65 fee being demanded by the BBC? Will the Government therefore consider the introduction of a concessionary rate or, better still, a completely free television licence for old age pensioners?

Mr. Brittan: The cost to the Exchequer of a free television licence for pensioners would be £250 million a year. I do not think that I can anticipate doing that. The cost of financing the BBC generally from the Exchequer would be over £700 million, and I do not fancy increasing taxation by that amount.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: Many Conservative Members believe that the BBC should continue to be funded by means of a licence fee rather than by advertising or any other method. However, we are concerned about some aspects of the areas now covered by the BBC. What consideration has been given to the possibility of holding a general inquiry into the role of the BBC in national and local television and radio, while accepting the need for an increase in the licence fee?

Mr. Brittan: I am sure that the debate about the financing of the BBC will continue, but I reaffirm that, as the Prime Minister has made clear, changes in the method of financing will not arise during consideration of the current licence fee.

On the question of inquiries, I should point out that the Annan inquiry took place comparatively recently. My right hon. and hon. Friends will understand that general inquiries into the role of the BBC or of broadcasting as a whole inevitably take a long time.

Mr. Madden: What would be the cost of giving free television licences to pensioner households? Does the Home Secretary agree that, unless there is a substantial reduction in the cost of television licences, especially to elderly people, many will be forced to stop watching television or, like one of my constituents, face a prison sentence for non-payment of the licence fee?

Mr. Brittan: It would cost £160 million to provide free television for households comprising only pensioners. I understand the difficulties facing many pensioners. That is why I should like, once again, to draw attention to licence savings stamps, which are a convenient way by which to pay. There is also a scheme which enables people to pay monthly cash instalments at post offices towards their next licence. That scheme has been introduced recently.

Mr. Yeo: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that most people are more anxious about the quality of the service provided by the BBC than about the price, although that is an important consideration? Does he agree that that policy might seriously be undermined if advertising were to be introduced?

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Brittan: I suspect that people are anxious about quality and cost. As to the impact of advertising on quality, it appears from the response to my hon. Friend's question that opinions differ.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Cannot the Home Secretary for once show a little care and compassion for the more vulnerable and poor members of society? As the television licence fee represents such a high proportion of pensioners' income, and as so many pensioners are housebound, disabled or sick, can the Home Secretary not dredge up a particle of compassion from his cold soul and introduce free television licences for them?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman should recognise that those who have the greatest compassion do not necessarily wear it on their sleeve.

Crime Prevention

2. Mr. Heffer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he intends to take regarding crime prevention as result of the recent survey of crime patterns in Merseyside.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): The report of the survey is being studied by the chief constable and other agencies in Merseyside. The Home Office crime prevention unit is available to assist them with any initiatives they may take.

Mr. Heffer: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the survey clearly shows that the poor people of Merseyside suffer most from crime and that police services in poorer areas are inferior to those in better-off areas? Will he tell his colleagues in the Department of the Environment that the proposed cuts in grants and the suggestion that there should be 700 fewer police officers on Merseyside is nonsense? Does he agree that we need more foot patrols so that people in working-class areas can have a much better service than they are getting at the moment?

Mr. Shaw: I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument. He will be the first to understand that there is no barrier between classes in regard to crime.

There has been a substantial growth in police strength on Merseyside since the Government came to office in 1979. I accept that, on Merseyside, as in other urban areas, the people who are most at risk live in inner urban areas. That is one reason why substantial sums of money are being made available to assist inner urban areas. There is no truth in the suggestion that the Department of the Environment, or any other Department, wants to reduce policing levels on Merseyside.

Mr. Thornton: Does my hon. Friend agree that many of my constituents would be extremely worried if there were any likelihood of the number of Merseyside police being reduced? There are major problems in the city of Liverpool, but my constituents, who live on the outskirts, think that there are insufficient foot patrols in their area and they are worried about the possibility of any cut in the police force.

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend is right to express anxiety about any threat to the numbers of police, but there is no such threat. The strength of the Merseyside police force, at 4,607, remains at a high levels and the establishment has been increased by 156 since 1979.

Mr. Alton: Is the Minister aware that the Merseyside crime survey shows that there are three times more burglaries on Merseyside than anywhere else in the country and that it is very much a burglars' paradise? Will he consider having more neighbourhood police stations, more policemen on the beat, more alarms for elderly people and more effective neighbourhood watch schemes?

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that neighbourhood watch and crime prevention is a matter of great concern to the Home Office and to the chief constable of Merseyside. The MCS, compared with the national pattern, not the pattern for equivalent metropolitan districts, showed that the figure was about one and a half times as great, not three times, as the hon. Gentleman suggested.

Mr. Soley: If the Government go ahead with their plans to abolish the metropolitan county councils, surveys of this type will no longer be possible and, therefore, there will be no such recommendations on which to act. Is not the truth of the matter that the Government have abandoned all financial support for crime prevention schemes almost everywhere in the country?

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman's statement in the last part of his supplementary question is outrageously wrong. The Government play a great part in trying to create conditions in which crime prevention surveys can be undertaken. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Home Office helped to fund the Merseyside crime study. Under the new procedures, policing arrangements will be similar to those which are currently undertaken.

Civil Defence

3. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will encourage local authorities to allow their civil defence volunteers to organise themselves into self-regulating bodies, appointing their own officers and responsible for their own training under proper supervision.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I do not think that such encouragement would be appropriate at present, but the optimum form of local organisation will be kept under review, and changes may be made in the light of the experience and views of local authorities and the advice of the co-ordinator of volunteer effort.

Mr. Thompson: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that it is urgently necessary to provide more help and guidance for training civil service volunteers, with better advice on organisation and administration? Does he further agree that we should encourage our civil service volunteers in the worthwhile public service that they undertake?

Mr. Shaw: I suspect that my hon. Friend is referring to civil defence volunteers, though improved training for civil servants may be an appropriate topic for conversation.

The Government have asked local authorities to take into consideration the role of volunteers in the plans that they should now be making to implement their statutory duties under the 1983 regulations. Increased training for civil defence volunteers will certainly be made available.

Mr. Weetch: Has the Department taken note of the way in which civil defence is organised in other countries? In a nuclear exchange, presumably the United States and the Soviet Union would be seriously at risk from each other. Has the Department made any examination of how civil defence is organised in those countries?

Mr. Shaw: I assure the hon. Gentleman that my department is well aware of the manifold differences in civil defence preparation in many countries; but in particular we look to western Europe for comparability, and we see a great deal of it.

Auld Report

5. Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he now expects to make a further statement on the Auld report.

11. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is yet able to make a statement about the Auld report.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): My right hon. and learned Friend proposes to make a statement in the near future setting out the Government's position.

Mr. Hunt: In the meantime, has my hon. Friend seen the results of the survey commissioned by the National Consumer Council, which show that a substantial majority of our fellow citizens, particularly the younger generation, are in favour of a reform of the Shops Act? May we have an assurance that the Government intend to sweep away the anomalies and absurdities which at present surround our Sunday trading laws?

Mr. Mellor: I cannot at this stage give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks, as these matters are now under very active consideration. Concern about the anomalies in the law led to the appointment of the Auld committee, the report of which we are digesting with care.

Mr. Galley: In view of the considerable job creation potential of the relaxation in the Sunday trading laws and the fact that the majority of the population consider that the current law brings the law in general into disrepute, is my hon. Friend prepared to give the House a further assurance that he will put considerable "umph" behind the legislative programme and give priority to it at a very early stage?

Mr. Mellor: I am glad that my hon. Friend has once again called for "umph". I have commended him before on that phrase. The Government's intentions will be announced very soon. My hon. Friend will not have long to wait for some "umph".

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does the Minister recognise that many in the country would prefer the Government and Parliament to pay attention to the principles of the "Auld Book" rather than the Auld report?

Mr. Mellor: That is too well turned a question for me to make an adequate response to it.

Mr. Pike: Will the Minister give an assurance that in any proposals that are made the Government will not only try to meet the requirements of consumers but will take adequate steps to protect those employees who will have to work on Sundays if there is to be a major extension in that direction?

Mr. Mellor: Yes. The position of the staff is a matter of considerable interest to the Government. The hon. Gentleman will know that a senior official of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers was an assessor for the Auld committee. We shall have regard to the views of workers' representatives before we make our final decision.

Sir Edward Gardner: Does my hon. Friend agree that the law is so asinine that it invites contempt? Does he further agree that a law that is so irrational and silly that it tempts people to break it is dangerous and ought to be removed as soon as possible by sensible reform?

Mr. Mellor: I certainly find it hard to disagree with that description of the law, since I used very similar words in the debate on the Bill proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) in February 1983. Certainly the law has not become any better in those two years.

Immigration Procedures (CRE Report)

6. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to receive the Commission for Racial Equality report on immigration procedures.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): I understand that the Commission for Racial Equality is arranging for publication of the report on 12 February.

Dr. Marek: When the Minister receives the report, will he look carefully at that part of it which deals with the treatment of immigrants at airports and other points of entry? Can he assure the House that in our civilised country all visitors and immigrants will at all times be treated with civility and courtesy by the authorities?

Mr. Waddington: I remind the House that the report has not yet been published, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman, from what I know of the report, that it does not contain criticisms of the conduct of individual immigration officers. What is suggested is that there is something wrong with the system as a whole because there is more pressure to emigrate from one country than from another. I should have thought that that was patently obvious. Plainly, people are more likely to want to get into this country from poverty-striken countries than, for instance, from New Zealand. As a result, it is obvious to everybody that it is more likely that people from Ghana will be refused admission than will people from New Zealand.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the Minister accept that a fundamental principle in the report is that there should be no discrimination on grounds of sex and that those who wish to come to this country to join female fiancées ought to be treated in the same manner as those who wish to join male fiancés?

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that that matter is at present before the European Court and that we shall have to wait and see what the court says. I believe it is well known that if we allow young men to come here as husbands and fiancés who would have been unable to come here under the work permit system, we are really allowing primary immigration, which we are continually telling people we have stopped.

Ms. Clare Short: Does the Minister agree that one of the things that is wrong with the immigration system is that its massive delays deprive people of rights to which in theory and in law they are entitled? Will the Minister apply his mind to this gross inefficiency in his Department?

Mr. Waddington: Obviously we are concerned to ensure that the system of entry clearance operates as efficiently as possible, but the hon. Lady is being very unfair if she is suggesting that in the last few years the position has worsened. In fact, the position has improved. In 1979 the waiting time for entry clearance in Pakistan was 22 months; in 1983 it had dropped to nine and a quarter months. In 1979 the waiting time for entry clearance in Bombay was seven months; in 1983 it had dropped to six months. In 1979 the waiting time in Delhi was 10 months; in 1983 it was seven and a half months. In 1979 the waiting time in Bangladesh was 24 months; in 1983 it had fallen to 20 months.

Mr. Dubs: The Minister will be aware that Parliament has recently decided to make racism by police officers a disciplinary offence. Will he make the same provision for racism by immigration officers?

Mr. Waddington: That is a nonsensical and thoroughly irresponsible question, because the hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that the first rule in the immigration rules enjoins immigration officers to carry out their duties without regard to race.

Coal Industry Dispute

7. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from the chief constables concerned as to what measures the police are taking to deal with intimidation during the miners' dispute.

Mr. Brittan: I have received a number of such reports. Significant police resources have been deployed to deal with the problem of intimidation, and substantial numbers of prosecutions have been brought.

Mr. Forsyth: I am glad that my right hon. and learned Friend will be able to establish the facts of the matter. Is it not an outrage and a disgrace that the European Assembly should have announced its own inquiry into the policing of the dispute, which is aiding and abetting those Opposition Members who have been carrying out their back-stabbing campaign against the police? Will he give an undertaking to the House that he will refuse to co-operate with that inquiry?

Mr. Brittan: The policing of the dispute is outside the competence of the European Assembly, and the Government will make no facilities available for the inquiry.

Mr. Ashley: Is the Home Secretay aware that intimidation should always be condemned, even by the European Assembly, but that to suggest that the police are always right and that miners are always wrong is crucially misleading and is an oversimplification of what is happening in coal areas today?

Mr. Brittan: It would be, but it is not a suggestion that the questioner or anyone else has made.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Has not the burden on our police forces been made much more irksome by the conduct of Her Majesty's Opposition?

Mr. Brittan: They have not helped.

Mr. Barron: When the Home Secretary asks the chief constables for reports, will he also report on the intimidation of members of the NUM by some police officers? I say that because 75 per cent. of the cases in my local magistrates' court that have been brought against pickets from my area are now being dropped because there were no grounds for them going there in the first place.

Mr. Brittan: That does not prove what the hon. Gentleman has said. If the hon. Gentleman has evidence of cases of the kind that he describes, I am sure he will want to pursue them through the complaints procedure, which has been substantially strengthened by the Government under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will my right hon. and learned Friend congratulate the chief constables on making it possible for so many courageous miners to go back to work, realising that there are jobs for them? Will he also ensure that there is no intimidation by the European Assembly in denying the rights of those working miners to go to work?

Mr. Brittan: I can certainly give my hon. Friend the assurance that he last sought. I agree with him that in the past 11 months there has been a major threat to one of the most fundamental civil liberties that we enjoy—the right to go to our workplace. The fact that that threat has not been successful is due in large measure to the courage and success of the police force.

Mr. Mason: Is the Home Secretary aware that I wrote to him on 10 December 1984 asking him to give me an assurance that all those mineworkers who have been arrested and since acquitted should have their photographs and fingerprints erased from the record? The right hon. and learned Gentleman's private secretary sent me an interim reply on 28 December informing me that he was contacting the chief constable of Nottinghamshire and asking for a report. Since then, silence. The Home Secretary is supposed to be in charge. Is he not big enough and has he not the responsibility to assure all those chaps who I described who have been acquitted of all charges that their photographs and fingerprints will be expunged from the record?

Mr. Brittan: I shall look into the point that the right hon. Gentleman makes, and respond to him as quickly as possible.

Mr. Holt: When my right hon. and Learned Friend asks chief constables for a report, will he also ask for a report on a case in Cleveland where an ex-miner, who had been on strike, was to be brought before the Crown court but the judge refused to hear the case on the ground that he would not be able to put together a jury which would not be influenced or intimidated?

Mr. Brittan: I regard that report as a matter of considerable concern.

Mr. Kaufman: Is not the worst intimidation that has taken place during the strike the intimidation of the crime victim and the taxpayer? Is it not a fact that policing the coal strike has cost £200 million and has in addition resulted in a huge increase in crime, as frankly stated by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis? Is it not a fact that the Prime Minister's policy of provocation and confrontation has produced an exacerbation of the worst crime wave on record, and cost taxpayers and ratepayers far more than the Prime Minister ever hoped to save through the butchery of the coal industry?

Mr. Brittan: I do not think that anyone will be impressed by that sort of rhetoric. As the right hon. Gentleman talks about provocation, he should address himself to those who have assembled in hugh numbers to frighten their fellow workmen and prevent them from going to work. If he is genuinely concerned about the cost of the dispute and its impact on crime generally, he should have been at the forefront of those urging the National Union of Mineworkers not to condone or support in any way violence on picket lines or anywhere. He has been singularly absent from any such activity.

Mr. Kaufman rose——

Mr. Mason: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the inadequate nature of the reply by the Home Secretary, I shall raise this matter on the Adjournment at the earliest possible opportunity.

Non-payment of Fines

8. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were serving sentences of under one month for non-payment of fines in each of the last three years for which he has records.

Mr. Mellor: In 1981 about 12,700 persons were received into prison having been committed for less than one month in default of payment of fines, costs or compensation. About 15,200 such persons were received in 1982, and about 14,600 in 1983.

Mr. Freud: Does the Minister agree that custodial sentences for fine defaulters should be used only as a very last resort? Will he look at some of the imaginative community service schemes that are being carried out in other countries, such as Australia, to see whether he can learn something from them?

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman is right. Indeed, we have acted on that advice. Last year a circular was sent out to magistrates' courts reminding them that the use of imprisonment was a last resourt in fine enforcement, and suggesting other ways to improve the position. We are actively investigating the prospect of the use of community service as an alternative to imprisonment for failure to pay fines, and have issued a document for consultation to interested organisations. We shall make a final decision based on their response.

Mr. Spencer: Does my hon. Friend agree that a period of imprisonment in default of payment is an important sanction, which results in payment in the majority of cases?

Mr. Mellor: Yes, Sir. As my hon. and learned Friend is right to say, we are talking about a final way of enforcing payment, which works remarkably well. In 1983, 1·5 million fines were imposed on males, and there were only 22,000 admissions to prison. That is a small proportion. However, we still believe that those admissions to prison are too many and that more effective administration could reduce that number further. That would be in the interests of good management of the prisons.

Deportation Statistics

10. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have been deported or removed during the last 12 months who are parents of British-born children.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mr. Eastham: Does the Minister agree that the media tell us increasingly about parents being separated from their children and sent back to their own countries? May I draw to his attention the case of my constituent, Mr. Kamul Kumar, who has lived in Britain since 1978 and who has been served with a deportation order? He has appealed to the tribunal. He has a three-year-old child, who he will probably never see again if he is deported. Will the Minister have some compassion in such cases?

Mr. Waddington: Many cases are mentioned in the media. Unfortunately, all too often, the reports of those cases are one-sided. I do my best to redress the balance. As to the case mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, he will know perfectly well that no one is deported from Britain without first being able to take his case to appeal and have his case heard by an adjudicator, and often also by the immigration appeals tribunal, which can have regard to all the compassionate circumstances.

Clearly, the existence of children is a relevant factor in deciding whether to exercise discretion in a deportation case, but neither the Government nor their predecessors have allowed people to believe that they can use their children to avoid the consequences of their own behaviour. The spectacle of people threatening the Home Office that if the law is enforced they will leave their children behind is thoroughly unedifying. When such threats are carried out, it is parents who split families, not the Home Office.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will my hon. and learned Friend confirm that many of the parents of British-born children were illegal immigrants when those children were born?

Mr. Waddington: My hon. Friend is right. We often deal with cases of children born to poeple who were illegal immigrants before the British Nationality Act 1981 came into force. The parents say, "I dare you to deport me. If you do, I will leave my child here as a charge on the state". There is nothing honourable in that.

Mr. Janner: Does the Mininster recognise the agonising choice of parents who, if they are returned to their countries, are likely to starve? They must decide whether to leave their children here, where they will at least eat, or to take them home, where they may well die?

Mr. Waddington: The hon. and learned Gentleman poses the dilemma, and that is precisely why we have an appeals system and why our law allows an independent tribunal to consider all the circumstances. I am sure that the hon. and learned Gentleman is not inviting me to tell the House that, in every case where a person is liable to deportation, he should not be deported because of the existence of a child. That would be nonsense, and it was certainly not the policy of the Labour Government.

Licensing Law

13. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Govenment's current policy on the licensing law.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has no immediate plans for legislation on the licensing law. He is, however, keeping the matter under review, and will consider carefully the result of a survey, commissioned by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, into the working of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976.

Mr. Leigh: Does my hon. Friend agree that the experience of Scotland is that the liberalisation of its licensing laws has led to less drunkeness and crime and more employment? Is it not about time that the Government rid England of this resrictive hangover from the first world war, followed Scotland's example, and liberalised the licensing laws?

Mr. Mellor: The Scottish experience is being analysed by the Secretary of State for Scotland. We shall be in a better position to know whether my hon. Friend's confident assertions are correct when we have that evidence.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend agree that the sooner the licensing laws are changed to take account of many of the proposals of the Errol committee, which are over 12 years old, the better?

Mr. Mellor: I regret that I cannot agree entirely with my right hon. and learned Friend. There were a number of proposals of the committee which successive Administrations, including, may I say, some of those of which my right hon. and learned Friend was a member, did not feel able to accept. We are in the same position.

Mr. Lawrence: Is my hon. Friend aware that a change to improve the licensing laws would revolutionise the tourist industry, substantially improve the brewing industry and do a great deal to reduce crime?

Mr. Mellor: All of that depends on the impact that increased opening hours would have on alcohol abuse, because we also have a serious problem of alcohol abuse. What the Government say — and I believe it to be responsible — is that we should await the evidence before we reach a conclusion. We shall not have the evidence until the research by the Secretary of State for Scotland has been completed and published.

Mr. Ryman: I am sure the Minister appreciates that most sensible people would welcome a reform of the licensing laws on the Scottish model. Does he appreciate also that among the most vociferous opponents of such a reform would be the brewers, who are the paymasters of the Tory party today as they have always been?

Mr. Mellor: Not for the first time, I am sorry to say that the hon. Gentleman is wrong. In fact, the Brewers Society is one of the prime proponents of the change. I do not know where that leaves the hon. Gentleman's point, but it is not quite as he made it, I suspect.

Civil Defence

15. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which authorities will be consulted before he reaches a conclusion about the report on the standardisation of training of civil defence volunteers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have formally consulted the Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of District Councils, the London Boroughs Association, and the Greater London council. Copies of the report have also been made available for information to the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives; the County Emergency Planning Officers' Society; and the Association of Civil Defence and Emergency Planning Officers.

Mr. Bowden: Does my hon. Friend not believe that the working party on the standardisation of training for civil defence volunteers should have been given an indication of the number of volunteers who should be trained?

Mr. Shaw: I accept my hon. Friend's point. It is a question of how far local authorities might wish to alter the way in which they perceive the need for training for the volunteer movement. My hon. Friend will be aware that there are about 17,000 members in the volunteer movement and that the distribution of the movement is very different between one area and another.

Mr. Ashton: Why will the Minister not give way to the great demand on the Government Benches to bring back Dad's Army? Is he not aware that Dad's Army was popular and funny and that we would welcome it because it would show what nonsense civil defence is?

Mr. Shaw: I note the hon. Gentleman's robust defence of the position that he would wish to see, which would be that of no preparation whatsoever, so that the maximum number of people, presumably, would be put at risk.

Mr. Nell Thorne: I know how keen my hon. Friend is to ensure that civil defence is provided for the benefit of the population as a whole. Can he say what he would expect by way of training for these volunteers in numbers of hours per year?

Mr. Shaw: This is one of the matters on which we shall be consulting in the light of the working party's report. My hon. Friend will be aware that the college at Easingwold runs courses which so far have a capacity of the order of 700 per year.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is there not an overwhelming case for advice on civil defence to be reviewed radically in the light of recent scientific evidence that any nuclear conflict would probably be followed by a nuclear winter?

Mr. Shaw: Advice at any given time is taken in the light of informed opinion. The hon. Gentleman should be aware that there are differing views about some of the surveys to which he has referred obliquely.

Coal Industry Dispute

16. Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the latest figure for numbers of police hurt in policing the coal mining dispute.

Mr. Brittan: Between 13 March last year and 30 January this year inclusive 1,333 police officers were injured in incidents connected with the policing of the miners' dispute.

Mr. Squire: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that these figures are disgraceful and that in almost any year other than the last one they would have met with universal condemnation by every hon. Member? It is sad they do not now.

Mr. Brittan: They are disgraceful and I believe that they do meet with virtually universal condemnation.

17. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers have been disciplined as a result of actions in relation to the policing of the miners' strike.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information is not yet available centrally. I understand however, that the Police Complaints Board will include in its annual report for 1984 statistics on the number of investigation reports received by it which it has identified as dealing with complaints arising from the policing of the miners' strike and on the outcome of the investigation.

Mrs. Clwyd: Does the Minister agree that while an investigation against a police officer is taking place that officer should not be allowed back on the picket lines, since investigations tend to take months rather than weeks? May we have that assurance?

Mr. Shaw: I understand the hon. Lady's point, but that is a matter for the individual chief constables. I shall consider the matter if the hon. Lady writes to me.

Heroin and Cocaine

18. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what priority the Government give to dealing with the misuse of heroin and cocaine.

Mr. Mellor: The Government continue to give the highest priority to combating the trafficking and misuse of drugs, including heroin and cocaine. The ministerial group on the misuse of drugs is co-ordinating action right across the board to tackle both the supply of, and demand for, these and other dangerous drugs.

Mr. Bellingham: In the light of that helpful reply, does my hon. Friend agree that the present number of customs officers should remain and not be allowed to fall any further?

Mr. Mellor: The number of customs officers dealing with drugs matters has been increased this year. The number of customs officers making specialist investigations into heroin traffic has doubled since 1979. We continue to keep under review the operational numbers of customs officers needed to combat the menace.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 31 January.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Clarke: What explanation, excuse or apology does the Prime Minister have to offer for the appalling increase in unemployment figures announced this morning? Is this what the Foreign Secretary had in mind when, in a speech on Friday, he said that the Tory record on jobs was "second to none"?

The Prime Minister: This month's figures are, of course, disappointing, although there is always a substantial increase in unemployment in January. For example, in 1975 the increase was 118,000 and in 1976, 102,000. These figures emphasise all the more the need to control unit wage costs. Over the year to the second quarter of 1984 our wage costs rose by over 5 per cent. compared with between 2 and 3 per cent. in France and Italy, 0 per cent. in Germany, minus 0·5 per cent. in the United States and minus 5 per cent. in Japan.

Q2. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 31 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Oppenheim: Does my right hon. Friend agree that since many of the problems with which the nation is now grappling were caused by some of the policies followed by some of the Prime Ministers who have been honoured by Oxford university, it might be a vindication of her policies that she has not been so honoured?

The Prime Minister: I understand and appreciate the concern which prompts my hon. Friend to ask that question. I think he will agree that many distinguishing people have been honoured by Oxford and been given honourary degrees. Whether those degrees are offered is wholly a matter for Oxford university and it must remain that way.

Mr. Kinnock: In view of the appalling rise of 150,000 in unemployment over the last year and the remorselessly rising trend, will the Prime Minister tell us at what point she will change her policies and take the wise counsel of the Earl of Stockton and others of her elders and betters?

The Prime Minister: I noted what my noble Friend the Earl of Stockton said in the other place. May I point out that when he was in power there was one part of his policy which I would be absolutely delighted to adopt——

Mr. Winnick: One?

The Prime Minister: Many. I was a member of the same Government — he honoured me in that way. Indeed, my noble Friend was careful to keep the proportion of the national income which was taken by public spending down to 33 per cent. Today it is 42 per cent. The Leader of the Opposition should join me in trying to get the proportion of public expenditure reduced.

Mr. Kinnock: Has the Prime Minister just made a policy statement, or is she going to continue with the vast decrease in public expenditure which has come about under her Government simply and solely because of her insistence on sustaining high unemployment? If she will reduce the levels of unemployment to those of the years when Mr. Harold Macmillan was Prime Minister, we will talk about a reduction in public spending.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend had a low percentage of public spending and a low level of unemployment. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that the difference between then and now in unemployment and spending can in fact account for 10 percentage points he really should study his figures. What he is trying to do is to increase the amount of public spending, which does not help to create an enterprising society. In the meantime, may I point out to him that the number of new jobs is still rising, the number of unemployed school leavers is lower than last year, and I am sure he will be pleased to know that the proportion of population of working age in work is higher than in West Germany, higher than in France, higher than in Italy and equal to that in the United States of America.

Mr. Tracey: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that never in her term of office has she had to cause her car to make a U-turn at Heathrow airport, following the example of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) during the sterling crisis?

The Prime Minister: I am glad to confirm that. That is where the Opposition's policies landed them and that is where their policies would land the country again if ever they were implemented.

Dr. Owen: Now that the Governor of the Bank of England has said that it would have been easier to check the slide in the pound if we had been a member of the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system, will the Prime Minister stop shilly-shallying and join the EMS within the next few days?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, we have always said that we shall join the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS when we believe that the time is appropriate. It is kept under review from time to time, but I must make one thing clear. Joining the EMS would not obviate increases in interest rates, it would not obviate the need for financial discipline and, indeed, it might increase it.

Q3. Mr. Strang asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 31 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Strang: Will the Prime Minister again explain to the House why she is opposed to the resumption of negotiations without preconditions between the National Union of Mineworkers and the National Coal Board? Is it because she is intent on trying to humiliate the executive of the NUM — [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not"?] — no matter how long that prolongs the strike and how much further damage it inflicts on our national economy?

The Prime Minister: I am anxious that, if talks are to be entered into, following seven rounds which have not been successful, they should be successful. The hon. Gentleman talks of humiliation. If the miners have been humiliated, they have been humiliated by the executive, which did not allow them a ballot, by the executive which has prevented them from accepting the best offer since nationalisation, by the executive which has lost them an average of £8,000 per miner and has made their families suffer great privation and some intimidation and violence. That is the humiliation that they have suffered.

Q4. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 31 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Taylor: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the serious concern among those who gave generously to assist Ethiopia that aid ships are being held up by Soviet weapon ships and that free aid food is openly being sold on the black market while starvation continues? Will she and other Western leaders take an initiative to impress upon the Ethiopian Government that the aid must get through to those who need it?

The Prime Minister: We make every effort to ensure that the aid gets through to those who need it and the Hercules are very material in ensuring that. So far as I know, most aid gets through and very little goes on to the black market. A number of ships have been unloaded recently. I understand that on 24 January one Soviet ship unloaded arms at Assab but that this was not to the detriment of the unloading of grain, which takes priority.

Mr. Heffer: Will the Prime Minister take a few minutes out of her time today to re-read the prayer of peace of St. Francis of Assisi, which she read on the steps of No. 10 when she was elected? Will she relate it to her attitude to heating allowances for the old, the position of the unemployed and in particular her vindictive attitude towards the National Union of Mineworkers?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman's question contains its own contradictions. I understand that he is fully behind a strike which attempts to deprive people of power for industry and heat for their houses. His intention and that of others who support the miners' strike is to deprive people of heating in their houses. He attempts to masquerade as their protecter, but he is in fact depriving them of heat.

Q5. Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 31 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Taylor: Will my right hon. Friend comment on the overwhelming vote by which the engineering union has chosen to accept finance for ballots? Would not the Labour party and other trade unions do well to take note of that?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend knows, we passed that legislation to ensure that ordinary members of trade unions would have the right to vote on certain occasions, always for the officers of their unions and sometimes before strikes. It is very good that main, big unions are taking advantage of that legislation, which was passed by this Government.

Q6. Mr. Terry Davis asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 31 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Davis: How many more people must lose their jobs before the Chancellor of the Exchequer loses his?

The Prime Minister: The policy being run by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exhequer is the one that will restore enterprise to this country. If we do not get more businesses and expansion of businesses we shall never have a rising standard of living. My right hon. Friend's policies are the right ones. The Opposition would finish up at the IMF again.

Q7. Mr. Squire asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 31 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Squire: May I remind my right hon. Friend that next Tuesday is the 25th anniversary of her maiden speech, in which she introduced legislation to make council meetings open? May I assure her that many right hon. and hon. Members hope that her campaigning zeal in that area of accountability has in no way been reduced?

The Prime Minister: I am well aware of the significance of my hon. Friend's question. I shall look at the Bill very closely.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: Does the Prime Minister believe that confession is good for the soul? [HON. MEMBERS: "What soul?"] If so, when can we expect a penitent Prime Minister at the Dispatch Box to confess to the nation that her economic policies have been generally a monumental disaster for the whole of the country and a crucifixion for the north-east of England?

The Prime Minister: I note that the hon. Gentleman regards the lowest level of inflation for 16 years and the highest standard of living as something that he does not like. We think it is rather good.

Q9. Ms. Clare Short asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 31 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Ms. Short: Will the Prime Minister admit that everything she promised in 1979 from her economic policies has failed to come about, that the economy has been gravely damaged, that people are suffering from unemployment and that she owes it to the country to change her economic policies?

The Prime Minister: The fact is that, far from those policies not having come about, inflation is at its lowest level, we have the highest standard of living this country has ever known, some 1·7 more million people are owner-occupiers, since 1979 there has been an increase of 20 per cent. in real terms in expenditure on the Health Service, pensioners have received increases in their pensions in excess of the rate of inflation and we have the highest amount of heating allowance that we have ever had. That is good, even if the hon. Lady does not recognise it.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House whether he will state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 4 FEBRUARY—Opposition day (7th Allotted Day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion on the coal mining dispute.

Motion relating to the Immigration Appeals (Procedure) Rules.

TUESDAY 5 FEBRUARY—Remaining stages of the Films Bill, the Shipbuilding Bill and of the Milk (Cessation of Production) Bill.

Proceedings on the Town and Country Planning (Compensation) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 6 FEBRUARY — Motion on the Rate Limitation (Prescribed Maximum) (Precepts) Order.

Remaining stages of the Hong Kong Bill.

THURSDAY 7 FEBRUARY—Motions relating to the Water Authorities (Return on Assets) Orders 1984 and 1985.

Ways and Means resolution relating to the GLC grant to London Regional Transport.

Motion on the London Regional Transport (Levy) Order.

FRIDAY 8 FEBRUARY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 11 FEBRUARY — Private Members motions until seven o'clock. Afterwards, remaining stages of the Social Security Bill.

Mr. Kinnock: The Government have made no arrangements for a debate next week on the public expenditure White Paper, and the delay since its publication last week is starting to become a little suspicious. May we look forward to this important debate in the near future, and certainly long before the Budget?

Although these are early days, there is already evidence of the success of the televising of proceedings in the House of Lords. When will the right hon. Gentleman provide an opportunity to discuss the televising of this House?

On the motions relating to the Water Authorities (Return on Assets) Orders to be debated on Thursday, will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House what the Government will do in view of the fact that a large number of Conservative Members are opposed to the completely unjustifiable rise in water rates in the Thames valley area, and especially in the wake of the extraordinary policy of non-intervention in the Division Lobbies which was established last night?

Mr. Biffen: I recognise the importance of holding a debate on the public expenditure White Paper. I hope that we can agree through the usual channels to hold it in the near future.

On the question of a debate on the televised recording of the proceedings of the House, I should like to share with the right hon. Gentleman the answer I gave to the leader of the Social Democrats. I know that it is difficult for the Leader of the Opposition to share anything with the leader of the Social Democrats. I believe that I have met the point of anxiety.

As to the business on Thursday, the Water Authorities (Return on Assets) Orders will be presented to the House. Their case will be argued convincingly by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction, and doubtless we shall have a thoroughly satisfactory result.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): Will my right hon. Friend take the earliest opportunity to make time for a debate on the bias in the television news media as evidenced by the research of Stirling university which shows that during the first eight months of the miners' dispute threequarters of the time was allocated to comrade Arthur Scargill and his crew and not to the obviously unbiased views of the chairman and board of the National Coal Board?

Mr. Biffen: I have made no provision in Government time for a debate of the type that my hon. Friend requests, but if he uses the utmost ingenuity he will find that there is to be a debate on the media on the Adjournment on Monday next week. He might see what he can do then.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Will the Leader of the House reflect upon the reply that he gave me some weeks ago during business questions about the desirability of a debate on youth, given that the International Year of Youth is now well underway? It is in the interests of the whole House to develop an interest in the political process among young people in this country.

Mr. Biffen: I have already said to one of my hon. Friends that I accepted that it was desirable that we should have a debate upon that topic. I only regret that I cannot give any guarantee as to how soon it will be held.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the business for Thursday goes far wider than water in the Thames valley? If that is not the case, will he please urge his hon. Friend to consider the matter again, as many of us would have the greatest difficulty in supporting the Government.

Mr. Biffen: There is no more convincing advocate than my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction and, therefore, I still travel hopefully about the result.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Ought we not to have an early statement on the Government's reaction to the outcome of last night's debate on the inquiry inspector's report on Stansted and, in particular, on the withering criticisms in one speech after another from the Conservative Benches?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman, who is a fair combatant in these matters, will recognise that my right hon. Friend explained that after the debate he would proceed to carry out his quasi-judicial functions in considering the recommendations of the inspector's report. We must wait for that process to be completed.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend agree that now is the proper time to have a debate on the disgraceful campaign that many of the pharmaceutical companies, and some dentists and doctors, are leading against the admirable sense that is to be brought into the dispensing of medicines? Some of the letters that I have had from my constituents, as have many hon. Members, show that some of those companies are more interested in their profits than in the people whom they are there to help. Has not the time come for such a debate to be held and for that type of disgraceful campaign to be put to rest?

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Biffen: I understand the point made by my hon. Friend, and the reception that it received shows that it goes far wider than himself. The House might like to know that the policy of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services will be the subject of regulations and therefore will be debated in the House.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Why did not the Leader of the House mention my People's Right to Fuel Bill, which is coming up on Wednesday of next week, bearing in mind that over 120,000 households have had their fuel supplies disconnected because they cannot afford to pay their bills? Pensioners in Scotland and the north of England are, in some cases, literally freezing to death because the Department of Health and Social Security is mean and is disqualifying those people from receiving the severe weather allowance. Will the Leader of the House consider my invitation to him to add his name to the list of sponsors of my Bill which is a comprehensive charter to eradicate fuel poverty from this country for ever?

Mr. Biffen: I did not mention the hon. Gentleman for the very good reason that, as he has just demonstrated, no one other than himself can adequately represent his particular strand of view. If invited to join my name to his, I will give the matter serious consideration.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): Is my right hon. Friend aware that a certain confusion has arisen about parliamentary pensions, perhaps because of the change in the basis upon which they are to be paid, and perhaps for some other reason? Will my right hon. Friend contemplate issuing a statement on the matter in the near future to clear up the confusion?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly consider that point.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): How can the Leader of the House hold forth the olive branch of a debate on youth in International Year of Youth at a time when the Secretary of State for Social Services is preparing to deprive 234,000 16 and 17-year-olds of the right to supplementary benefit? How can the Leader of the House express support for a debate on youth while school leavers are being attacked in such a way?

Mr. Biffen: That is a spurious point, and the reason why I shall offer a debate is that it will provide an opportunity for that to be demonstrated.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Before we have the debate suggested by my right hon. Friend as a result of the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark), may we have an even more urgent debate to refute the allegations of the small number of doctors who are debasing their profession and the Hippocratic oath by terrifying the elderly and infirm with wildly inaccurate stories about the Government's proposals for the listing of medicines? If people have cases to fight, is it not more effective and better for them to fight them themselves rather than to use the elderly, the infirm, the defenceless and all the more vulnerable members of society as their proxies?

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Biffen: The reaction in the House demonstrates that my hon. Friend's view is widely shared. I have already explained the point about the regulations. This topic is also listed for the Adjournment debate on 7 February.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the importance of the question of disconnection? In the recent past, the supply of an 83-year-old woman — a chronic invalid — was disconnected under the present arrangements and she was deprived of the right to heat. Is not such a case a sufficient reason for the House to debate the present arrangement and to seek to introduce legislation to stop such inhuman acts?

Mr. Biffen: I do not deny that that is a major issue. The best course that I can take, at least initially, is to refer the hon. Gentleman's point to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): My right hon. Friend will be aware how strenuously and successfully he and his predecessors have resisted the pressure brought to bear on them by hon. Members on both sides of the House, particularly those with young families, to publish a provisional parliamentary timetable for the year. I have in my hand what I am told is a completely accurate provisional timetable extending to the time of the Queen's Speech in November and including the Chancellor's Budget statement. If such information can be made public —and I am told that it is authentic—can it not be made available to hon. Members?

Mr. Biffen: I should very much like to have a copy of the document, especially the Chancellor's Budget statement.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): For the past three weeks the Leader of the House has made sympathetic, though platitudinous, noises about the prospect of a debate about the Housing Benefits Amendment (No. 4) Regulations 1984. Is he aware that the order has only 14 or 15 unexpired days left? May we be assured that if the debate does not take place next week it will be held in the following week?

Mr. Biffen: When the hon. Gentleman has been here a little longer, he will realise that platitudinous statements are the stock-in-trade of the occupant of this post. I will consider what can be done about that point.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Because of the censure motion this afternoon, the important debate on the Royal Air Force will have to be postponed. In view of the significant decisions that have to be taken on the European fighter aircraft and the new basic trainer, can my right hon. Friend assure the House that that debate will be reinstated as soon as possible?

Mr. Biffen: I can give my hon. Friend that undertaking.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Did my right hon. Friend see the horrifying pictures of starvation in Eritrea and Tigré — the rebel areas of Ethiopia — on television last night? The Government have an excellent record on giving aid to Ethiopia, but as that aid is not getting through to areas such as Tigré, although it is urgently needed, could he arrange for my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development to make an early statement on the matter with a view to establishing what can be done?

Mr. Biffen: I shall convey to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development my hon. Friend's request on a matter that touches all parts of the House.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there are to be at least two marches in Leicester on Sunday 3 February? One is effectively in favour of the IRA—it is on "troops out of Northern Ireland"—and the other is by the National Front. I do not know whether my right hon. Friend is aware that there is a problem in that the chief constable cannot get a ban for those marches without applying——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member should ask a question about business for next week.

Mr. Bruinvels: Could my right hon. Friend provide time for the House to amend section 3(2) of the Public Order Act 1936 to allow the chief constable to go directly to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary for an immediate ban to protect the citizens of Leicester?

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry that my hon. Friend was unable to ask my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary that question during Question Time. I shall refer what he said to my right hon. and learned Friend so that he may assess the situation.

BILL PRESENTED

Transport

Mr. Secretary Ridley, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Secretary Sir Keith Joseph, Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. Secretary Jenkin, Mr. Secretary Tebbit, Mr. David Mitchell, and Mr. Michael Spicer, presented a Bill to amend the law relating to road passenger transport; to make provision for the transfer of the operations of the National Bus Company to the private sector; to provide for the reorganisation of passenger transport in the public sector; to provide for local and central government financial support for certain passenger transport services and travel concessions; to make new provision with respect to the constitution, powers and proceedings of the Transport Tribunal; to make provision with respect to grants payable under section 92 of the Finance Act 1965; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 68.]

The Economy

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Leader of the Opposition to move the motion, I should say that today's debate is not one of those in which I am empowered to use my discretion to impose a time limit of 10 minutes on speeches during the early evening. However, it is clear that many right hon. and hon. Members wish to speak and I appeal once again for reasonably short speeches. I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.46 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): I beg to move,

That this House censures Her Majesty's Government for its gross mismanagement of the British economy which has led to the highest real interest rates, the worst manufacturing trade deficit and the highest level of unemployment in the history of Great Britain.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise to the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) for bringing forward the point of order at this stage, but he will appreciate the necessity for doing so. The motion that the right hon. Gentleman has just moved in terms excludes part of the United Kingdom, whether the intention is to inhibit right hon. and hon. Members on this Bench from taking part in the debate, or whether it is that the Labour party does not care about the economy and employment in Northern Ireland. The ruling that I am seeking from you, Mr. Speaker, which I hope you will be able to give, is that the debate may extend generally over the economy of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Speaker: I can give the right hon. Gentleman that assurance.

Mr. Kinnock rose — —[Laughter.] Conservative Members obviously think that the appalling levels of unemployment and destitution in Northern Ireland are a great joke. It is clear that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who has just raised a point of order, perfectly properly and aptly in my view, does not share their view. That might be one of the reasons why he is on these Benches, having left the Conservative party.

In moving the motion that relates, naturally, to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, my party is bringing the Government to account for their complete mismanagement of our country's affairs. It is also holding the Government to account for the way in which their policies have brought us to the turmoil of recent weeks and inflicted on our country the dreadful uncertainty of future months. That recent turmoil and those uncertainties provide only the background to today's censure debate, as the real question that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer must answer today is this: how did their regime turn a modern, industrialised country, with a wealth of energy resources and revenues that are denied to many of our competitors, into the punchbag of the world's currency speculators?

How did they let Britain's affairs get into the state where a wobble in international oil prices or the strength of the dollar could knock our economy sprawling, bring a 40 per cent. increase in interest rates in the period of a fortnight and impose massive extra costs on industries and households in Britain? That question must be answered today.

In asking that question, we are not talking the pound down, for we could not in a whole week —

[Interruption.] I am glad to see the Chancellor in his place. I thought for a moment that the Prime Minister had sacked him.

In asking those questions about how the Government have got us into this state, we are not talking the pound down, for we could not in a whole week of censure debates do a fraction of the damage that is done in the average press briefing by the Prime Minister's press secretary, Mr. Bernard Ingham.

Neither are we in this debate selling Britain short. Our complaint is that we have a Government who are selling Britain out and selling Britain off. We do not delight, as we debate these matters, in the misfortunes that afflict our country because of the actions of this Government. We see too much suffering among our constituents, the people whom we represent, to take any joy in the present condition of our country.

Bad news for Britain is bad news for us all—for all in this House and for all our people throughout the country—but, of course, the news is worse for some than it is for others. It is much worse for the small business that must borrow than it is for the great corporation with massive private assets. The news is much worse for the young home buyer than it is for the property magnate. The news is much worse for those who will lose their living because of speculators and interest rate rises than it is for those who make their living by speculation and from interest rate rises.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire) rose——

Mr. Kinnock: I did not refer to the hon. Gentleman by name, but if the cap fits, I suppose he wants to wear it.

I was talking about people—parasites on our society—who contribute nothing and inflict dreadful harm on our country. Those in that group, those speculators, we are told when it suits the Prime Minister, are the people of enterprise and audacity, the people of the market, the people whom the Prime Minister admires for their boldness, adventure, sense of commitment and risk-taking.

That is what the Prime Minister repeatedly tells us about the enterprise climate that she wants to create. Indeed, she admires them so much that she wants to run the country for their benefit. She wants a land fit for speculators, and that has been the whole tale of the right hon. Lady's policies — [Interruption.] — and her dependence during the last five years on people and institutions of that kind. Or, at least, the right hon. Lady likes those speculators, those pirates, some of the time. When they are making a killing out of buying and selling British Telecom shares, or British Aerospace, Amersham International or Cable and Wireless, they are, in the view of the Prime Minister, to be admired.

Mr. Richard Ryder (Mid-Norfolk) rose——

Mr. Kinnock: But when they turn their sterling gains from that buying and selling into dollar purchases and take their money out of our currency, the Prime Minister starts to agree with us and to think of them as irrational and irresponsible. That is the schizophrenia of the Prime Minister.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is obvious that the right hon. Gentleman is not giving way.

Mr. Kinnock: That, as I was saying, is the schizophrenia of the Prime Minister, which I suppose is something of a euphemism for hypocrisy, although I know that I am not allowed to use that word in the House. All of the resulting confusion because of how the Prime Minister feels about the operations of the market has been manifest in recent weeks. Faced with a fresh attack on the currency by their soulmates in the market, the Government have had to resort to the pathetic process of offering conflicting press briefings—so much so that yesterday the Financial Times was moved to describe their activities as "secretive dithering". This secret dithering over the past few weeks has sent the money market into a spin and lenders and borrowers into a positive whirl. It has even got The Times into a tizzy. Yesterday the paper provided probably the shortest and clearest evidence of the confusion generated by the Government's vacillation and giddiness in past weeks. It had to print the following correction:

> "Mr. Lawson"
> said The Times yesterday
> "said on Monday that it would 'now' be appropriate for sterling to rise against the dollar, and not 'not' as printed yesterday".

If the self-proclaimed "paper of record" cannot get it right and cannot understand it, what chance have others?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): Pathetic!

Mr. Kinnock: That is exactly what the Daily Mail said about the right hon. Gentleman—pathetic.

Mr. Forth: As he develops his theme, will the right hon. Gentleman please tell the House whether he will get to the stage of recommending that we should resort to the International Monetary Fund in the same way as his Government were forced to do because of their mismanagement?

Mr. Kinnock: I shall certainly get to that stage and also to the Government's borrowing record and their financial position. What the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) will discover, and will have to apologise to his constituents for, is that instead of this Government following the recommendation of a former Prime Minister, the Earl of Stockton, to borrow to produce, and instead of using their debts for the purpose of generating wealth in our economy, they have been using their increasing debts for the purpose of paying the bills arising out of slump in our economy. Perhaps the hon. Member could explain that to his constituents. Then they might see that there is a preferable alternative. During recent weeks the record of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been pathetic.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South) rose——

Mr. Kinnock: I shall not give way unless the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir William Clark) is rising to defend the Earl of Stockton.

Sir William Clark: Will the right hon. Gentleman remind the House that in 1979, because of the overseas borrowing of the Labour Government, we owed 22 billion dollars but that this Government have now repaid over half of that debt?

Mr. Kinnock: I shall most definitely and eagerly come to that point. I shall relate to the hon. Member for Croydon, South the precise record of this Government during the last five years and the comparison that can be made with the previous five years. I believe that the hon.

[Mr. Kinnock]

Member will find the exercise very illuminating. Even somebody as innumerate as the hon. Member might be able to understand it. We have against the background of recent weeks and the turmoil and tension set up in our economy called on a few occasions for the sacking of the Chancellor. That would be a fitting fate for a man with his record. Other people's jobs should not depend upon a man who does his own job so badly.

We know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer wants a high growth rate. We know that he wants a low inflation rate and we know that he wants everybody to go busily about their business. But given his record, that is not really on. If I may coin a phrase from the Prime Minister—he has very good taste, but we do not think that he is really up to it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is a particular friend of the Prime Minister. We know that she would not like to sack him. It is a brutal old business for someone with such a gentle spirit. We know that. We also know from her previous record when she has dismissed other members of her Cabinet that she is, in her own words, a "reluctant butcher." So we should ask her to make it easy on herself and on the Chancellor. She need not go through all that brutal old business of sacking. She can call the Chancellor in one fine morning—let us say, tomorrow morning—and simply say, "Nigel dear, I think the time has come for you to grow a beard."

The trouble is—[Interruption.] I am very much in favour of the broadcasting of this House, but it is liable to widespread abuse by Conservative Members. The plan that Conservative Whips have laid down to mutter and murmur throughout the speeches of Opposition Members is so clear as to be pathetic.

Mr. Ryder rose——

Mr. Kinnock: I give way to the junior hon. Member.

Mr. Ryder: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has at last said that the pound has reached its right level. Does the Leader of the Opposition agree?

Mr. Kinnock: The hon. Gentleman — [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] The hon. Member for Croydon, South, who intervened previously, is innumerate and the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder), who has just intervened, obviously has a worse affliction. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) did not say that the pound has reached the right level; he said that it may have reached the right level. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition wishes to continue.

Mr. Kinnock: Then my right hon. Friend went on to say——

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not intolerable that the Leader of the Opposition should be so anxious not to give way that he seeks to wave you back into your Chair?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that we can hear the debate in reasonable silence. I am the first to appreciate that there are strong feelings on both sides of the House, but we should give each other a fair hearing.

Mr. Kinnock: It is worth pointing out that that last intervention was from the elected leader of Conservative Back Benchers—the chairman of the 1922 Committee. It is a direct demonstration of how short they are of arguments or any sensible response.

I was saying that my right hon. Friend had said that the pound may be at the right level but that it was "up to the Government to say what the level should be".

Perhaps later in the debate the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk will address that question to his Front Bench rather than that we should have to wait until we hear from the Prime Minister on "Woman's Hour" to find out the Government's view on the standing of the pound.

If we were to see the departure of the Chancellor, even if the Prime Minister were to resort to that expedient, it would not be enough. What we want is not just a change of personalities in the Government; we want a change of policies in the Government.

Throughout the Chancellor's oscillations between crisis and coma in recent weeks we have been seeing the way in which a harvest of insecurity, instability, interest rate rises and record unemployment rises has been garnered from the seeds that were laid when the Prime Minister first went into 10 Downing street. Her Chancellors have been nurturing those weeds ever since that awful day.

It is not just policies that need changing; it is the whole attitude and approach of the Government to the problems of our nation. That is the truth behind today's conditions.

Faced with that fact, I hope that the Prime Minister will not simply resort to that litany of doctored statistics, half-truths and misrepresentations which has become her stock in trade when she switches to autopilot at Question Time on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons.

I hope that we shall not hear from the right hon. Lady today that we have the highest gross national product ever, as if it were a cause for great historic celebration. Until she achieved power, that was a commonplace occurrence just about every year.

I hope that the right hon. Lady is not going to say that we have the highest investment ever, at least, not without admitting that manufacturing investment is still, in 1985, 30 per cent. lower than in was in 1979.

I hope that the right hon. Lady will not talk about the highest retail sales ever without admitting that that has been achieved by a £70,000 million increase in household debt—a record level in Britain's history—and a 53 per cent. increase in manufactured imports.

We want the whole truth from the Prime Minister this afternoon. We look for that truth, as we look for the answers and descriptions of what the Government are to do in the future to make sure that we do not have a repetition of the farcical turmoil, the secret dithering, that we have seen from the Government in recent weeks.

I hope that this afternoon the Prime Minister will not tell us about her record on borrowing——

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South) rose——

Mr. Kinnock: I am responding to a point raised by two hon. Members and I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman afterwards.

I hope that we shall not hear, as we have heard so often before, about the way in which the Prime Minister has kept control of borrowing. She tells us that she has maintained that control, that she has been a prudent and thrifty housekeeper to the nation's resources over the past five years. But the truth is that, although the Government came to power planning to borrow £30 billion in cash terms, over the past five years they have borrowed £50 billion. If that is not enough from a Government who are supposed to be committed against borrowng, that figure of £50 billion is £10,000 million more than the figure during the five years of the Labour Government, who were supposed to be so profligate and careless of the country's welfare. That is the truth.

Mr. Cormack rose——

Mr. Kinnock: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment.

That is the truth and the Prime Minister should be wise enough to admit it. While she is in the confessional she should also acknowledge that while the Labour Government were undertaking their lower level of borrowing in order, as the Earl of Stockton, whom I have quoted before and will do so again, says——

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): Grasping at a straw.

Mr. Kinnock: Is that what the Earl of Stockton is in the hon. Gentleman's view—a straw? History will not record the hon. Gentleman's view that his past Prime Minister was a straw. It will compare his past Prime Minister with the plastic lady who leads the country now. He was a man of real steel and was prepared to stand up for the country, unlike the right hon. Lady.

The Labour Government borrowed to produce, not to pay the bills of slump, as this Government are doing. Moreover, the Labour Government had smaller oil revenues during their entire five years of office than this Government receive in one month. That is a massive difference between the records of those two Governments.

Today the right hon. Lady should acknowledge all of that and explain what she and her Chancellors have been doing with those massive oil revenues and that massive borrowing. She should also explain what they will do now. She should explain it here in the House, and not on radio and television chat shows. The Government should be telling us here what their policies are. [Interruption.] Conservative Members are extremely sensitive about the way in which the Prime Minister chooses to communicate with them, let alone with the rest of the nation.

As the instability of recent weeks will not be the last scare about oil prices, as it will not be the last worry about Britain's oil production and revenues, and as those events under this Government will cause lurches in the exchange rate, what will the Government do about it next time? Have they started to plan for that eventuality, which is guaranteed under their present policies? Will the Prime Minister give us a repeat performance and communicate over the airwaves? Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer go to a newspaper proprietors' meeting, as he did last night, and say to them, "A storm may have blown up largely because of events beyond these shores and outwith our control, but in due course the storm will blow itself out. Meanwhile, we have battened down the hatches and the ship remains on course."? When Chancellors choose nautical analogies we know that they are extremely close to the rocks. I suppose that the ship in this case is that majestic vessel which last week the Earl of Stockton said was sinking. That is the ship on which the Chancellor appears to be the chief engineer.

Mr. Cormack rose——

Mr. Kinnock: The danger is that the Government will not listen to those in their party or elsewhere who counsel the course of new policies but will listen to the voices that tell them that their problems come from their laxity, softness and lack of toughness, and that they should toughen up their policies. That is the danger for our country. Those voices are coming from the markets.

Mr. Cormack rose——

Mr. Kinnock: If the Government take that advice it will make matters even worse. The Chancellor may say to the market, "You've got us in a spot. Speculation has made us put up interest rates. That's added to our burdens, especially those of debt interest and costs in industry. All right, I undertake not to cut taxes, as I promised last November." The speculators will say, "All right, but that's not enough. It won't do the trick. It won't go far enough for what we want." The Chancellor will say, "All right, we'll reduce our spending targets." "Ah," say the speculators, "You promised to do that before, but you always overshoot." As The Times stated yesterday, that will not convince anyone. Those markets are less interested in targets than in achievements. [Interruption.] The markets then say——

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): If they were Labour Members who were rising, they would be out of here by now.

Mr. Kinnock: My hon. Friend is wrong. If Conservative Members had any answers, they would want to listen to the questions. Their fooling and childish behaviour is entirely due to the absence of any policies, direction or convincing answers.

The Chancellor does not convince the speculators with his undertaking to reduce spending targets, because he has always overshot those targets, and so they look for real cuts in public expenditure. What are real cuts—2 per cent., 3 per cent., or 5 per cent., of public expenditure totals? If a 2 per cent. cut were made, and £3 billion were acquired to reassure the markets and buy confidence in the Chancellor and the Prime Minister, between 250,000 and 500,000 more people would be unemployed. In the short term that might interest the markets, but only until they came to realise that by cutting £3 billion, the Government created so much extra unemployment that they had to spend a further £3 billion on that unemployment.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say to Conservative Members who seek to intervene, that the Leader of the Opposition is not giving way. The more interruptions there are the less opportunity there is for Back Bench Members to participate in the debate.

Mr. Kinnock: I hope that these disruptive tactics get the same coverage as other disruptive tactics have had in the past.

That system of cutting and then having to take the consequences of higher costs is exactly the policy that the Prime Minister and her Government have followed during the past five years. That is what I meant when I told her at Question Time today, that she had been increasing public expenditure, but only through paying the bills of rising unemployment. The Government have cut public expenditure on everything except nuclear weapons, fortress Falklands and unemployment. They have doubled VAT and increased the level of the tax burden from 31 per cent. to 36 per cent. of—[Interruption.]—the gross domestic product. They have given us the highest real interest rates—[Interruption.]

[Mr. Kinnock]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I repeat to both sides of the House that the more interruptions there are —[Interruption.] Will the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) not shout at me from a sedentary position. I say to hon. Members on both sides of the House that if the Leader of the Opposition is not giving way, and clearly he is not giving way, they should not seek to interrupt.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As it is clear that there is a deliberate plot by Conservative Members not to listen to the Leader of the Opposition, will it not make debate quite impossible because there will inevitably be a return at some time if they do not listen and if they keep interrupting the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an important debate. I hope that we can listen to each other with civility and in silence.

Mr. Kinnock: The United Kingdom has record interest rates, record unemployment, the lowest number of housing starts for years and all the problems of poverty and deprivation from five and a half years under the Prime Minister. Yet all that Conservative Members, who were elected to the House to represent their constituents, can do is demonstrate their paucity of argument and intelligence by acting like a bunch of yobbos.

Mr. Cormack rose——

Mr. Kinnock: I hope that the time will never come when Labour Members are so impressed by the broadcasting of proceedings as to show how shamefully badly half of Parliament can react when it is given a chance.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the Leader of the Opposition, speaking with the full weight of a senior ex-Parliamentary Private Secretary, to refuse to give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack)? If he gave way to my hon. Friend, would that not stop the noise?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has not been a Member of the House for very long, but he should know that if the Leader of the Opposition, or any other hon. Member, refuses to give way, the hon. Member concerned must desist.

Mr. Kinnock: Every intervention demonstrates how much further Conservative Members stoop into numskullery.

Under this Government, we have had record interest rates, unemployment and taxation. The Government have undertaken all those policies, but those who operate the Prime Minister's beloved markets insist that they want more. They are unsatiated by the policies of the past five years. They continue to demonstrate their irrationality, irresponsibility, and their complete lack of patriotism.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kinnock: I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman, because at least he did not try to interrupt in such a yobbish way.

Mr. Amery: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. Earlier in his speech he prayed in aid the remarks of Lord Stockton. May I remind him that when Lord Stockton was in office, inflation was about 2·5 per cent. and the bank rate was about 3·5 per cent. If we were to adopt Reagan economics today, our interest rates would have to be higher than those in America. Is that what the right hon. Gentleman is advocating?

Mr. Kinnock: The right hon. Gentleman should take up those matters in private with his father-in-law. The answer to his question is that Britain has its highest real interest rate for 50 years—the gap between the inflation rate and interest rates—for 50 years during which his father-in-law, the Earl of Stockton, pursued particular policies. The previous time that Britain was in such a position with its real interest rates, the Earl of Stockton had the honour to be a rebel on his Benches, demanding different policies, and eventually campaigning successfully to obtain those different policies. I wish only that that attitude ran in the right hon. Gentleman's family.

The markets are a fact of life; we recognise that and we shall deal with it. We do not worship at those markets as the Government do. But the Labour party, in common with all post-war Governments of every colour, believes that, because of the irrationality, selfishness and influence of the markets, the Government—indeed, any Government —have a basic duty to take and keep powers to ensure that they can protect their citizens against the capriciousness and the moods of the people and institutions in the markets, who have no sense of public obligation and no sense of national duty. I speak of the people who, as Upton Sinclair said many years ago, "do not need to use armies to crush countries" when they can "pick up Mr. Bell's telephone instrument."

In recent weeks, the most advanced forms of electronic communications have been used for the purposes of speculation and destabilisation. In those circumstances, more than ever before, modern Governments should retain the powers that would protect their people against those vagaries. They should take the powers that were taken and kept by other Governments. As the Labour party and many Conservative Members maintain, they should take and keep powers to control the flow of money abroad. They should take and keep powers to establish minimum lending rates. They should take and keep powers to control the production of a vital asset such as North sea oil. They should retain some convertible currency reserves to enable them to intervene, if necessary, to meet contingencies. They should use the Government's finances as a way of stimulating and developing the economy instead of using the Government's power to depress and deprive the economy. They should work actively for international economic co-operation to promote the essential well-being of the country.

In doing those things, a Government would not be over-centralised or over-powerful and would not be creating an overweening state. They would be fulfilling their responsibilities, not creating a subordinated control economy. Those are the bounden responsibilities of a modern Government which, in the name of the welfare and security of their people, a Government must accept.

Of course, the Government have a responsibility to work for price stability and cost reduction. They have an equal responsibility—as the Prime Minister is so fond of selectively quoting the 1944 White Paper, I shall do so—to seek,

"a high and stable level of employment."

They are responsibilities that Governments of all parties should accept. However, those duties of protection, support and opportunity have been abdicated by the Government. They have wilfully abandoned every other objective and instrument for safeguarding the people of Britain, especially in times of economic storm. They got rid of exchange controls, minimum lending rates and authority over oil production. Their commitment to international co-operation is nothing more than grandiose verbiage intended to help the Prime Minister's political reputation. Millions of people know — 4 million and more unemployed know to their terrible cost—that the Government feel no obligation to introduce policies for generating employment. They are a Government of column dodgers and deserters from the national interest.

The Government scorn the history of their party and of Governments of the Labour party since the war. They are contemptuous of everything that went before the Prime Minister's reign—everything that came before what the Chancellor of the Exchequer called, "the British experiment." We have endured five years of that experiment: five years in which our trade in manufactured goods has plunged from a surplus five years ago of £1·5 billion to a deficit now of £4 billion; five years during which Britain has lost £35 billion worth of investment and £40 billion of output compared with 1979 standards; five years during which 2 million people have been thrown out of work; and five years during which industrial relations have been reduced to nothing more than conflict by policies like the one under which the Government will spend £2·4 billion to sustain a strike and to keep 20,000 miners out of work, when for that money they could have created 500,000 jobs and tried to change our economy.

Those failures of investment, output, employment, currency, interest rates, and of opportunity and justice in society, caused us to table a censure motion against the Government. The experience of the past five years has been dignified by the name "experiment", but there is nothing scientific or objective about it. If there had been, the Government would have amended or abandoned the experiment long ago. It has not been a scientific process, but dogmatic incompetence that has plunged our country into crisis and that will do so again unless there is a radical change in the Government's policy.

The Government and the Prime Minister set out to make history. They have made history in our time. They have created a historic manufacturing trade deficit. They have created historic levels of unemployment. They have created historic levels of conflict, bitterness and division. That is why we censure them. That is why the country must be rid of them.

4.29 pm

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof,

'supports Her Majesty's Government in its firm action to maintain the sound financial conditions and medium-term strategy which have brought about the lowest level of inflation since the 1960s, nearly four years of sustained economic growth, record output, sound exports, record investment and record living standards, and which provide the best long-term prospects for a fundamental improvement in the performance of the British economy and for the creation of new jobs.'.

We have heard from the Leader of the Opposition his customary speech. It was distinguised by a paucity of argument. I noted a number of the things that he said. He began with some comments about British Telecom, home owners and privatisation. In regard to privatisation, I would rather listen to the millions of our citizens who bought shares in British Telecom, to the many employees of the British Freight Corporation who made such a success when that was privatised and to the millions of council house tenants who, under this Government, had an opportunity, that they never would have had under Labour, to purchase their houses.

The right hon. Gentleman went on at length about my right hon. and noble Friend the Earl of Stockton. I remember his policies vividly. He kept public expenditure down; he kept income tax rates world competitive; he turned back the tide of nationalisation; he began the process of leading Britain into Europe; and all in the teeth of the then Labour Opposition. In his maiden speech in another place, he pointed out that President Mitterrand, who had started off with a Labour policy, had had to turn to ours. I noted what the right hon. Gentleman said about exchange control.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Can the Prime Minister explain to the House why, if privatisation and giving shares to millions of people has been so successful, unemployment has continued to rise?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman knows that the two are not connected. I am amazed that he would deny working people shares in their own industry and not let them have independence. Socialism is the doctrine not of independence but of dependence of people under the control of Socialist Governments.

The right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) also spoke about exchange control. I remind him that, even under the most rigid exchange control, there were currency speculators moving around the world because no amount of exchange control can prevent many billions of currency from moving around the world. Not even he can stop the telephones or the computers, about which ridiculous comments have been made.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to strikes. I remind him that when in power a Labour Government complain about strikes, but when in opposition, the Labour party does its level best to support every one of them.

The right hon. Gentleman's speech was empty of any serious analysis of recent events or of any convincing alternative policies which his party would pursue. I shall deal with both analysis and policies. First, I should like to spend a moment looking at the Labour party's credentials for bringing the motion before the House. [Interruption.] Of course, Opposition Members will not want it. It exposes what happened when they put their policies into practice.

The Labour Government's first act on taking office in 1974 was to introduce the same quack remedies as the Opposition advocate today. In their first year they increased public spending by £15 billion in today's money.

[The Prime Minister]

By August 1975 inflation reached the record level of 26·9 per cent. Record inflation — the record held by the Socialist Government. Did that extra expenditure and extra inflation cause unemployment to fall? Of course not. One year later they had more than doubled the unemployment level that they had inherited. What they have to prove now is why, if those policies had that effect then, they would not have a similar effect if put into execution today.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn) rose——

The Prime Minister: I shall give way when I have finished this point; as the hon. Gentleman knows, I customarily do.

By the autumn of 1976 the Labour Government's credit was exhausted. No one would lend them money and they had to go to the International Monetary Fund for help. That was their policy in practice. Record inflation, and it doubled unemployment.

Mr. Straw: The Prime Minister must know that, compared with the other six major industrial nations in the world, unemployment under the Labour Government was the average for those seven and that our inflation was also average. The Prime Minister must know that that was the reality in 1974 and in 1979. She must also know that inflation today is still only the average of the OECD seven, but that unemployment is the worst of any of those countries. Will she explain that difference?

The Prime Minister: Twenty seven per cent. was never the average of European inflation. That was the Socialist record.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned unemployment. Unemployment has again doubled in Britain, but, according to the European Commission—I do not use my own figures—unemployment has also doubled in Europe. [Interruption.] If hon. Members request me to answer questions I shall, of course, answer them. If I am to give way, there is no point in doing so unless I answer the questions. The hon. Gentleman cannot stand the answers because they are right. That is his trouble.

What happened when the Labour Government followed that policy? After they had gone to the IMF, the next year they had to cut spending by £10 billion in today's money — the biggest single cut ever known. Those are the credentials of the party which now brings this censure motion on our economic management.

The House deserves a more serious analysis of the causes of recent increases in interest rates than it received from the Leader of the Opposition. Let me say at the outset that it is no use the right hon. Gentleman deriding the operation of the markets. The markets are part of the world we live in and we cannot escape their operation any more that his Socialist predecessors could. As a major trading nation it would be disastrous for this country, of all countries, to turn its back on the markets of the world.

The right hon. Gentleman scarcely mentioned the real reasons for the recent speculation against the pound and upward pressure on interest rates. Incidentally, he urged us to bring back the minimum lending rate. I thought part of his complaint earlier in the week was that we acutally used it. It clearly did not suit the right hon. Gentleman's purpose to examine the real reasons for recent speculation, for none of them substantiates either his speech or his motion.

There have been three reason for the recent speculation against the pound and the upward pressure on interest rates. First, the dollar has been very strong against every other major currency. Since May 1979 the dollar has risen against the Swiss franc by 36 per cent., against the deutschmark by 40 per cent., against the French franc and the Italian lira by 55 per cent. and against sterling by 46 per cent.

That process cannot go on indefinitely. It is distorting the pattern of world trade, making it more difficult for debtor countries to service their loans, and rekindling protectionist pressure in the United States. It is perhaps for those reasons that the G5 countries in Washington reaffirmed their commitment, made at Williamsburg, to undertake co-ordinated intervention as necessary. That agreement has already helped to check the rise of the dollar against the rest of the world. That was very largely the initiative of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The second reason has been uncertainty over oil prices, and particularly the Geneva meeting of OPEC.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Prime Minister aware that there is one central weakness in her argument about the pound being affected by dollar domination and oil? During the course of previous Governments, including those of Mr. Macmillan and her other predecessors and Labour Governments, at all times the Italian lira traded at a discount against the pound. This week, for the first time since the end of the war—ever since the right hon. Member or most Members in the Chamber have been in politics — the Italian lira was trading at a premium against the pound. As the man on the Clapham omnibus said to me this morning, "What a load of wallies!"

The Prime Minister: I think that "What a load of wallop" would describe the hon. Gentleman's intervention about the state of the dollar. What he said does not accord with the facts in my speech about the strength of the dollar, when I explained the way in which the dollar has risen against the Italian lira by 55 per cent. and against sterling by 46 per cent.

The second reason is the uncertainty about oil prices, and particularly the Geneva meeting of OPEC. That was certainly a major factor affecting sterling in the last week or two, but it is hardly rational, because oil represents only 5 per cent. of our GDP. The effect of a $1 fall in the oil price would in itself reduce Government revenue by less than half of 1 per cent. So oil remains a major asset to the British economy.

If we were to exercise powers for depletion of oil in the North sea—the Leader of the Opposition will remember the Varley assurances that he would not do so and the assurances from us that we would not do so — investment and exploration in the North sea would not take place. Investment and exploration is vital for jobs in that part of Scotland. If we used that power, we should put down the possibility of creating more jobs in that part of Scotland. That would be the result of the right hon. Gentleman's policy.

The third factor which has affected the recent fall in sterling was the fear that the Government were weakening in their resolve on inflation and sound finance. That fear, however unreasonable, could not be dispelled by words of reassurance alone. If my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had resisted the upward movement in market interest rates, it would have given a totally wrong signal to the markets and would, indeed, have led them to believe that their fears were justified.

Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can tell us, since he has made criticisms, what he would have done. [Interruption.] He has specifically refused to do that. When the Opposition criticise, they are supposed to put forward an alternative. The right hon. Gentleman does not have one. So far as we can deduce from previous policies, he would do everything possible to damage confidence in the country's future direction.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) recently commented on the sterling exchange rate. I gather that he did not say that he thought that it was right, but that it "may" be right. One thing is clear. If an element in the speculation against sterling has been market fears about the Government's resolve to contain inflation, the Opposition have no remedy whatever to offer. Their policies would make the prospects for inflation infinitely worse.

Of course we do not wish interest rates to be high, even for a short period; but, if they are necessary to protect the long-term strategy, we shall not hesitate. These high interest rates emphasise just how important it is to exercise the tightest control on Government spending and borrowing. Had we not done so, interest rates would have had to be even higher.

What the right hon. Member for Islwyn is complaining about is that the Government have had the guts to take the measures necessary to maintain our strategy. The response of the market has shown that. The Opposition, by contrast, have lost no opportunity to talk inflation up.

Does the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook recall saying during the last election:

> "Despite all claims that inflation has been conquered, there is no doubt that inflation will be in double figures by the end of the year if this Government remains in office."?

That is what the right hon. Gentleman said in May 1983. In December 1983, inflation was 5·3 per cent.

The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) is no doubt similarly disgruntled. Does he recall that on 24 July last year he predicted that inflation would be 7·5 per cent. by the end of 1984? The outcome, of course, was 4·6 per cent.

This Government believe that a prosperous and competitive economy requires both a clear financial framework and a Government with the resolve to stick to it.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): How many times over the last four years has the right hon. Lady and her Ministers predicted that unemployment would start coming down immediately?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman can find one prediction—[Interruption.] I do not think that he can find one prediction from me about unemployment. I challenge him to find one from me. He will not be able to find one, because for years when I stood at the Opposition Dispatch Box I watched Ministers in the Labour Government refusing to predict, and I thought, "How wise." Do not blame me for being wise.

Mr. Chris Smith rose——

The Prime Minister: For many years the financial discipline required for a stable economy came from the system of fixed exchange rates under the Bretton Woods agreement, but rising inflation throughout the world brought about the collapse of the Bretton Woods system.

Today it is recognised, not only in Britain but throughout the industrial world, that the only foundation is the discipline that the Government impose upon themselves—unless, like Labour, they yield their very sovereignty to international bailiffs.

It has been suggested many times that Britain should join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. We have on many occasions said that we are ready to join when the circumstances are right, and I said that again this afternoon. Of course the position is reviewed regularly, but I should make it clear that joining the EMS is not a way of avoiding a rise in interest rates. It is a mechanism which yields benefits only if the Government are ready to accept the financial discipline that it entails, including a rise in interest rates, if necessary, to maintain the agreed parity, reductions in public expenditure, if necessary, and all the other things that discipline involves and to which other countries have had to agree.

The EMS is not a way of escaping discipline or rises in interest rates. It is a way of saying that if certain relationships obtain, one must put into effect rises in interest rates or changes in public expenditure.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): No one is arguing with the Prime Minister's thesis. We are arguing that, because there is no exchange rate policy, she has given sovereignty on the exchange rate to the market, to OPEC in Geneva, and to the next crank who comes along.

The Prime Minister: I do not know how the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) would stop large sums of money moving around the world. He cannot do so. It is a ridiculous argument. No Government can stop large amounts of money moving around the world. When there are fixed exchange rates, we have to change the exchange rate in very sharp steps. Even in the EMS there are times when there has to be a realignment. Indeed, Socialist France has already had them.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

The Prime Minister: I shall gladly give way. I enjoy it. However, I give notice that my speech will take longer if I do, because I have certain things which I wish to say. On that understanding, of course I give way.

Dr. Owen: Everybody in the country is pleased that inflation has been kept to the low levels that the Prime Minister mentioned. But will the Prime Minister admit that if the exchange rate during her period in office had not oscillated up to $2.40 and down to $1.10, many more people would now be in employment? One of the arguments for exchange rate stability and entering the EMS is that it will allow us to have higher levels of stable employment.

The Prime Minister: The EMS has nothing to do with the dollar rate, as the right hon. Gentleman ought to know. When the dollar was very weak, he said that deprived us of jobs because we got a lot of American imports. If he takes the reverse of that argument, when the dollar is strong we should have the opportunity of creating jobs and making a lot of exports. But the right hon. Gentleman seems to be wrong all along the line.

The Government have set their own disciplines, for that is the only basis for the creation of wealth, prosperity and jobs.

Although Governments — and I want to make this very clear — can create the financial framework, they alone cannot create jobs. Jobs come when enterprise has the freedom and vigour to meet the demands of the market, to produce the goods and services that people want and are prepared to pay for. The right hon. Gentleman does not like that.

I shall read what the Opposition said when they were in government, because they said almost the same thing. The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) said:

"The only answer to the economic problems which have dogged Britain ever since the war is to improve the performance of our manufacturing industry. That means higher productivity, better design, more vigorous salesmanship, more reliable delivery and servicing. That means good management, good relations and co-operation with trade unions and management, and fewer strikes and better delivery dates."

That, of course, was what the then Chancellor said when Labour was in power.

We have to compete in the markets of the world, not on the basis of national self-esteem but in the eyes of people making hard-headed decisions about the design and the value of the products that we offer. The problems of the economy lie not in insufficient demand, for every category of spending is at record levels. Nor is it a lack of public spending which now takes 10 per cent. more of GDP than it did 20 years ago when unemployment was a fraction of what it is now. Nor is it a neglect of the infrastructure, since spending on major roads has increased by 25 per cent. in real terms under this Government and investment in water is increasing by 9 per cent. next year. Infrastructure investment must, however, like all other investment, be justified by its return. It is not a cheap route to more jobs.

Those who genuinely want more jobs must address the deep-seated problems of the economy, such as the amount that we pay ourselves in relation to the amount that we produce. If we pay ourselves more in relation to what we produce than our competitors, the jobs go elsewhere. When we resist change by restrictive practices while others get ahead, they get the jobs. One does not build an enterprising economy by imposing high taxation, as the Opposition wish to do.

The message of today's unemployment figures is that we have not yet resolved those three problems, and until we do we shall not create the jobs that we need.

If there were easy choices, we can be sure that other nations with governing parties of different political persuasions would be pursuing them. Although unemployment in Britain has more than doubled since 1978, it has also doubled across Europe. In the Netherlands and Belgium the rate is higher even than here. Of the major economies, Japan and the United States have done best in holding down unemployment. It is no coincidence that those economies have an excellent record on unit wage costs, because unit wage costs in Japan have actually fallen by 5 per cent. over the past year while our unit labour costs have risen by 5 per cent.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East) rose——

The Prime Minister: Unless right hon. and hon. Gentleman pay attention to these things, they will not help to get more jobs in the country.

We are often urged to adopt one particular policy from abroad, but one cannot pick and choose one policy and leave out the others.

Those who urge us to follow United States fiscal policy forget that the size of the deficit is causing great concern in America. In December Mr. Donald Regan, the United States Treasury Secretary, said:

"Deficit reduction is by far the most serious problem facing the United States, the Administration and the Congress. Reducing the deficit is the number one priority."

Those who urge us to follow that path forget that in the United States the state and local authorities run a surplus, not a deficit, as mostly happens in our local authorities. They forget that the United States accepts the discipline of monetary targets and has experienced high real interest rates—even higher than our present rates. They forget that public expenditure takes 10 per cent. less of national output than it does here.

What about Germany, France or the Netherlands? They have taken some tough decisions which I wonder whether the House would be prepared to face. Between them, those countries have seen cuts in social services, delays in pensions increases, boarding charges for hospital patients and cuts in public sector pay.

Germany has kept its interest rates half our own, despite the rising dollar. One reason is that it has kept its inflation rate at about half of ours. It is no good yearning for the advantages of other countries and ignoring the strict disciplines by which they have been achieved.

The Opposition motion conveniently ignores all the good things about the performance of the British economy. They will not want me to state them, so I shall do so. Despite the coal strike and the most determined attempt since the war to inflict damage on the economy by denying power and light to our homes and industries and despite all that Opposition Members could do, output is at an all time high. The proportion of people of working age in employment in Britain exceeds that of nearly all other industrial countries, and employment is growing. Profits have recovered dramatically and in consequence total investment is at record levels and still growing. Despite the heavy cost of the miners' strike and all that Opposition Members could do, our current account has remained in surplus for the fifth year in a row.

The terms of the Opposition motion single out the deficit on manufactured trade. What matters, of course, is not a surplus or deficit on any particular part of our trade, but the overall balance, and that is what the Opposition cannot get away from.

Our oil surplus has enabled us to import more manufactures and invest more overseas. But Opposition Members are against both. Yet again, they wish to repeal the laws of arithmetic. What would they do to improve the balance of trade in manufactures — impose import controls? I can think of nothing more guaranteed to damage efficiency and close export markets.

What of their attitude to overseas investment? Since 1979, Britain's net foreign assets have risen from £13 billion to £70 billion. These will provide a stream of income to the country for years to come because of the policies of the Government. As domestic capital expenditure is at a record high, this has clearly not been at the expense of domestic investment at home.

Why does the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook wish to penalise companies which invest abroad to earn profits for Britain or the financial institutions which invest abroad to improve the retirement incomes of millions of pensioners? I will tell the House why. It is because the more wealth that the right hon. Gentleman can bring under the power of politicians and bureaucrats, the happier he will be. He wants to invest not where the return is highest, nor where it meets the needs of consumers, but where it furthers the political ambitions of Socialism — a Socialism that the people reject.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): The right hon. Lady has devoted a great deal of time and attention to interest rates and money. Would she care to say a little about the plight of the ordinary people in the country, particularly the unemployed?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman was listening, he would have observed that I pointed out that the only way in which we can increase the number of jobs in the country is by pursuing policies which will increase enterprise. Otherwise, the only way is to distribute what there is, and that would not help to further enterprise in the country.

The Leader of the Opposition scarcely mentioned the coal strike. Never in this country has a strike been so unjustified. Never has a strike been called by such blatant manipulation of trade union rules. Never has a strike been pursued by such tactics of violence and intimidation. In 1978-79, when the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) was Prime Minister, democracy and the rule of law were under attack by trade union extremists in the winter of discontent. The then Conservative Opposition offered the Labour Government the necessary support to take whatever measures were required. Contrast that with the Labour party today: today it supports political strikes which totally disregard democratic values and the rule of law.

By encouraging the leadership of the NUM to believe that the Government and the National Coal Board could and would concede its impossible demands, the Opposition have helped to prolong the strike and the suffering that it has caused for miners and their families. By prolonging the strike and the suffering, they have seen to it that on average, each miner has suffered an £8,000 loss of wages, the industry has lost 52 coal faces and the union is now divided against itself. Which half does the Labour party support? It supports not the working miners, but those on strike against democracy and the rule of law.

Throughout the strike, the right hon. Gentleman has had the choice between standing up to the NUM leadership and keeping silent. He has kept silent. When the leadership of the NUM called a strike without a ballot, in defiance of union rules, the right hon. Gentleman stayed silent. When pickets tried by violence to close down pits in Nottinghamshire and elsewhere, against the democratically expressed wishes of the local miners, the right hon. Gentleman stayed silent. When the NUM tried to impose mob rule at Orgreave, the right hon. Gentleman stayed silent. Only when the general secretary of the TUC had the courage to tell the leadership of the NUM that its tactics were unacceptable did the right hon. Gentleman take on the role of Little Sir Echo.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Will the Prime Minister give way?

Mrs. Thatcher: I shall give way when I come to the end of this section.

The Leader of the Opposition knows that the demand made by the NUM leadership, that no pit shall ever close on economic grounds, is an impossible demand and that it has never been accepted by any Labour Government. The last two Labour Governments enshrined in their own Acts of Parliament grants to assist the "elimination" of uneconomic colliery capacity. That is what the Labour party put into law when it was in power. The right hon. Gentleman knows that three independent inquiries—by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and by Select Committees of both Houses — have endorsed the principle that uneconomic pits should be closed.

Mr. Nellist: Will the Prime Minister give way?

Mrs. Thatcher: The Leader of the Opposition knows that the offer to the miners is the best since nationalisation.

Mr. Lofthouse rose——

Mrs. Thatcher: I shall give way in a moment.

The offer to the miners is the best since nationalisation. It offers the best pay, the best investment, the best guarantee against compulsory redundancy, the best early retirement terms and the best colliery review procedure. Yet never once has the right hon. Gentleman urged the NUM to accept that offer. Never once has he urged it to accept the agreement negotiated by NACODS. An agreement on exactly the same terms is available to the NUM. If the right hon. Gentleman really wants an end to the strike, as I do, I challenge him to urge the NUM to accept the NACODS agreement.

Mr. Lofthouse: Is the Prime Minister aware that we have heard all this before? Is she further aware that it is unprecedented in industrial relations for one side to demand the terms in writing before the talks begin? Does she admit that it is she and her Government who are insisting on those terms and that they do not want a settlement of the strike?

Mrs. Thatcher: It is nonsense to say that we do not want a settlement, because we do. We never wished the strike to begin. That is why the very best terms to be offered by any Government since nationalisation have been offered by this Government. We did not wish the strike to start. It started because the NUM refused to observe democratic values, and it has been maintained by violence and intimidation. Seven rounds of talks have foundered on the same points. Unless the NUM is prepared to discuss the closure of uneconomic pits in accordance with the NACODS agreement, the next round of talks will founder as well. I do not wish the talks to founder.

I challenge the Leader of the Opposition. Will he urge the NUM to accept that agreement or will he not? [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer!"] He will not answer, because he dare not answer. The right hon. Gentleman spoke today free from the cares of office and from any serious prospect of office. Nothing underlines the irresponsibility of the Labour party more than the way in which it has abandoned in opposition so many of the lessons that reality and circumstances forced it to learn in government. In office, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East said that it was "the responsibility of unions not to throw the members of other unions out of work in pursuit of a dispute".

The Labour party and the NUM have no such qualms now. In office, the Labour party recognised that uneconomic pits must close, put that principle into legislation and implemented closures on economic grounds. In opposition, Labour Members pretend that that never happened.

The Leader of the Opposition attacks us on monetary policy and calls it a doctrine, but the right hon. Member for Leeds, East boasted that the last Labour Government had "really given monetary policy the importance it deserves".

Labour Members chant about "cuts". They should know, because their party made the biggest cuts ever. The last Labour Government cut public spending in real terms on the education and science budget, on the industry, energy, trade and employment budget, on transport and on housing, in Scotland and in Wales. Now that the Labour party is in opposition, it claims to be the guardian of the National Health Service, but in two of their five years in office the Labour Government actually cut real resources for the National Health Service.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Hon. Members: Give way.

Mrs. Thatcher: I will give way in a moment.

Over their whole period of office, the Labour Government cut capital investment in the Health Service by 35 per cent. What has the hon. Gentleman got to say to that? [Interruption.]

Mr. Nellist: There are 5 million people outside for whom this is no laughing matter. How can the Prime Minister maintain the fiction that at the beginning of the coal strike her intention was to save £275 million worth of uneconomic capacity when in the past 11 months the Government have spent between 20 and 25 times that amount trying to destroy the NUM? If it was really about saving money, the strike could have been over within three weeks of starting.

The Prime Minister: Year by year, the amount of subsidy to the coal industry was increasing. In the last practising year it was £1·3 billion. We are pouring money into new pits. As the three independent reviews said, we cannot go on pouring money into investment in new pits and still retain all the old uneconomic pits. If we do, we shall put up the price of coal and electricity for every other industry and create unemployment. That is my answer to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) rose——

The Prime Minister: I shall not give way. I am nearly at the end of my speech. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman wishes to catch your eye later, Mr. Speaker.

The Leader of the Opposition and the Labour party do not have even the beginnings of an alternative economic strategy. That is not just my view. It seems that a Labour party document somehow found its way to the New Statesman. I hope that no Opposition Member will complain about that. Tht Labour document apparently says:

"Labour has lost the economic argument."

It went on to say that the Labour party

"has little credibility on policies for dealing with the economy."

And so say all of us.

The purpose of the Leader of the Opposition in tabling this censure motion is not to help the unemployed, because he has nothing to offer them; nor is it to strengthen the economy, because he has no strategy for it; and nor is it to win confidence, because his prescription would destroy it. This censure motion is bogus. It deserves to be, and will be, overwhelmingly defeated.

5.12 pm

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): The debate so far has been a futile, noisy, bad-tempered charade. I want to deal first with the issues in the past few days and then with the Government's handling of the economy generally and to propose a change of direction. I suppose that proposal will be as much a waste of time as everything we have heard so far, because we know that the Government will not change direction.

I shall deal first with the points made by the Prime Minister at the beginning of her speech. She denied that she had ever forecast unemployment rates, and I accept that. She cannot, however, deny that she and her Ministers have predicted year in, year out, since they took office that economic recovery was just around the corner. The people want to know: is this it? If this is not the recovery, is there still another corner to go? Are there another two or three corners to go? We cannot continue to have these statements about how wonderful the economy is when people can see with their own eyes that that is untrue.

In less than a fortnight there has been an unprecedented three times increase in interest rates amounting to a 4·5 per cent. increase. The effect on our industrial costs is staggering. The CBI says that the increase will add £1·2 billion to industrial costs. There will be an especially adverse effect on new and small businesses which have no reserves to tide them over. Many of them will go to the wall because of interest rates, and they will join many others. One of the Government's achievements has been a record number of company liquidations. In the year just before the Conservative party took office, there were 4,700 company liquidations; in 1984 that number had increased to 14,000 liquidations. That represents a terrible drain not only of employment but of other resources.

The high interest rates were caused by the Government's incompetence, and the Chancellor's incompetence in particular, in the panic following the Government's earlier refusal to use either United Kingdom reserves or interest rates to ward off the speculators. I do not deny the Prime Minister's reasons for the speculation, but I criticise the Government's lack of action in dealing with it. If I quarrel at all with the Opposition motion it is because the word "mismanagement" is not quite correct —we criticise the "non-management" of the economy.

We saw the Chancellor lolling around lethargically until the last minute and then rushing about hysterically telling everyone to keep calm. There was a sudden and dramatic switch in tactics. No one in his right senses would agree with the Daily Express profile of the Chancellor just after he had taken office which described him as "The Iron Chancellor behind the Iron Lady".

Not even the Daily Express would seriously suggest that now.

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Steel: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, because I had the pleasure of beating him in an election not long ago.

Mr. Malone: The right hon. Gentleman says that the Government did not intervene in the money markets and used interest rates to stabilise the exchange rate, and he criticises the Government for doing that. What else would the right hon. Gentleman have done?

Mr. Steel: I am not criticising the Government for doing that. I am criticising the Government for letting matters slide. They were forced to intervene sharply and suddenly because of their earlier determination to do nothing.

There are other reasons for the speculation. The Chancellor was wrong — the Prime Minister referred again to this matter — to suggest that part of the speculation was caused by a widespread international belief that somehow the Government would change course and tackle unemployment and that investors had been reading the speeches of the Labour party, the alliance or even Conservative Back Benchers. That is nonsense. Anyone sufficiently sophisticated to take note of our speeches would know that the Government have a three-figure majority in the House.

The truth is that the speculators would have been more likely to be upset by the Chancellor's speeches, his obsessive and single-minded repeated determination to indulge in tax cuts as a priority in his Budget. I do not believe that that has impressed anyone. People are also not impressed by the sheer irrelevance of much of the Chancellor's economic preoccupation—for example, the transfer of capital assets through privatisation into current account expenditure. No company chairman would be able to defend that policy at an annual meeting of his company.

On top of the Government's involvement in the principle, we should consider the loss that the Government have sustained. The Prime Minister mentioned how many millions of people have bought British Telecom shares. They would have been fools not to buy them at the price the Government were giving them away. [HON. MEMBERS: "How many shares did you buy?"] I did not buy any, but that is not the point. [HON. MEMBERS: "You are a fool."] As a matter of fact, I do not own any shares. The taxpayers as a whole have lost £3 billion because the Government gave away the shares below cost.

Yesterday the Chancellor of the Exchequer said at a City lunch that the ship was "on course". Many people would say, "We hope it is not, because if so, it is on the wrong course." The truth is that the ship is not on course at all. For a long time there has been no one at the tiller. The leaks in the ship have not been repaired. We can see the leaks throughout the country. The crew has been busy down below working out which bits of furniture or equipment to sell off to make the ship operate better.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) has referred to the statement made yesterday by the Governor of the Bank of England about Britain joining the European monetary system. We have never made any secret of our belief that there are wider political reasons for joining the EMS. It has been reported that the Governor of the Bank of England accepted that "it would have been easier to check the pound's slide if it had been in the European 'snake' of currencies whose exchange rates are fixed against each other."

I ask, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Devonport asked: do the Government agree with that statement? If they do not agree, why not? On a previous occasion, the Chancellor said, "The balance of arguments for and against are much the same." The other day he said that the balance of arguments had not changed because of the crisis in the past few days. That contradicts the statements by the Governor of the Bank of England. During an interview yesterday, the Governor of the Bank of England said:

"what has happened has sharpened the interest in this very important and fundamental issue."

He could have fooled me. I do not detect any increase in the Chancellor's or Prime Minister's interest in this matter. It is time they were interested, because I believe it is in our long-term interests to join the EMS without any further delay.

I come now to the long-term management of the economy. The most serious aspect of the Government's record is the deficit in manufacturing trade. The trouble is that the Government and the Chancellor are mainly obsessed with the theoretical economy, the money supply and the PSBR, which is doubly theoretical. It is theoretical anyway and it is more so because the targets are theoretical compared with his actual figures.

The Chancellor is not interested in the real economy, the currency market, jobs, and capital spending. Those are the issues with which we are concerned. If we study the 1984 figures and the real trade deficit we find that it was £4 billion, but the non-oil deficit was £11·5 billion. I do not believe that the Chancellor will reject that figure. That is the extent of the disguise that oil gives us. In other words we have a non-oil deficit in trade of £11·5 billion after five years of this Government. When they came into office there was a £500 million non-oil trade surplus. That is how they have turned the economy round.

When the Chancellor accuses international markets of attaching too much importance to oil when looking at the value of the pound, he quotes oil as a small percentage of our gross domestic product and as a tiny percentage of our tax revenues. Those figures are wholly irrelevant. The rest of the world sees oil as a massive subscriber which disguises our balance of trade deficit. That is why it treats our currency more as a petrocurrency than anything else. The Government cannot deny that.

There has been a serious loss of manufacturing capacity. It has drained away from this country throughout the Government's period of office. That is why we have argued consistently that the Government have a duty to stimulate carefully and cost-effectively the process of employment and revival.

The Prime Minister says that the Government cannot create jobs. That is not the view of the CBI, the Engineering Employers Federation or any of the other bodies that have been producing reports after reports pointing out how much our public infrastructure needs repair. I shall not go into the whole litany again. We have discussed it many times recently and in the unemployment debate.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): Has the right hon. Gentleman failed to notice the fact that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) in a speech in the House on 15 January said:

"we may have to reduce the amount of money that we put into capital spending."—[Official Report, 15 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 223.]

Does the right hon. Gentleman disagree with—I gather we are to call him this — his right hon. Friend the Member for Devonport?

Mr. Steel: It depends upon what spending we are talking about. We have both argued, and continue to argue, that we can identify projects up and down the country on which there should be capital spending as much by the private as the public sector. I shall give one example. What about house improvement grants? They are cost-effective and labour-intensive, but the Government have chosen to axe them. They provide a continuous flow of contracts for the construction industry in the building and in the equipment that goes to make the industry. I give that as an example because it is an area in which the Government have deliberately cut and created more unemployment.

We believe that the benefit of the oil revenues that the Government have had uniquely — they were not available to previous Governments of any colour — should have been used for forward investment in our country in the form of capital expenditure and training and education and not solely to extend indefinitely current expenditure on an ever-lengthening dole queue. Those revenues have been wasted in a literal sense in that way. They have forced upon the country years of determined deprivation, and people are entitled to turn round after five years and say, "What is it all for? When will the promised recovery come? It has all been for nothing."

I wish to go to the heart of what I believe is a fundamental disagreement between us and the Government. The Prime Minister believes that politics is a triumph of the will; that if she wills something to happen, it does. We believe in the politics of persuasion. We do not necessarily believe that what we say ought to happen will happen. She believes in the politics of confrontation as a virtue. We believe in building the politics of consensus.

There is now a growing consensus in the country on a range of economic issues, which is absent from the Floor of the House. The Earl of Stockton talked of building a national approach. He is right. That national approach exists in the country; it does not exist in here.

There is a consensus in the country that there should, in these internationally depressed times, be a sense of shared sacrifice. [Interruption.] The Government do not accept that. Last week the report of the pay and benefits bulletin confirmed the evidence of our own eyes—that over the past five years, in the words of the Daily Mail, which is not a notably Left-wing journal:

"The rich are getting richer and the poor are becoming poorer".

That cannot be right, and it is not what the country wants.

There is a consensus in the country that the growing division between the wealthy, comfortable south——

Mr. Skinner: They are attacking Owen again.

Mr. Steel: —and an impoverished, resentful north is wrong, but the Government are not interested in that.

Mr. Skinner: He is attacking Owen again.

Mr. Steel: There is a consensus in the country that while there is great merit in the further extension of home ownership and popular capitalism of all kinds, those objectives are no substitute for the creation of necessary public assets and the common benefits of thriving communities. The official Opposition do not accept the first part of that equation, and the Government neglect the second.

There is a consensus in the country that sees a direct link between the rise in unemployment and enforced idleness, and the appalling increase in crime that we have seen, especially theft and robbery. The Prime Minister denies that consensus.

There is a consensus in the country that recognises that the coal industry cannot be immune from everyday reality, and that some uneconomic pits must close. The official Opposition says no, and the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said in the House the other day: "not a single pit in Britain is uneconomic".—[Official Report, 29 January 1985; Vol. 72, c. 154.]

What absolute balderdash.

There is further consensus that more effective plans are needed to help the mining communities that will be hit by that reality. The Government have been grossly insensitive to that and we press them constantly to bring forward more effective schemes.

There is a consensus in the country that before there is any industrial stoppage those being asked to strike should be given the chance to vote in a secret ballot. The official Opposition sold the pass on that one early in this dispute.

Mr. Skinner: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Steel: I shall not give way to any hon. Member who has been interrupting constantly from a sedentary position.

There is a consensus in the country that picketing should be confined to the numbers necessary to persuade those going to work of an alternative view. It should not degenerate into mass intimidation, let alone violence. The official Opposition have been utterly spineless on that issue. I do not know how the Leader of the Opposition can talk about conflict in our country today when he has done little, with the great authority that he could have had, to resolve this kind of conflict early.

We know that there are no moderates left in the Labour party, only prisoners posing as moderates. The new general secretary describes himself as from the soft Left. That is an apt description as we see Members of the House giving up the reselection battle against the militants without so much as a fight.

There is a growing consensus in the country that one route back to prosperity is a far more dynamic structure of partnership in our industrial life. When we consider the thrusting economies of Japan, to some extent the United States, and even Taiwan and Korea, we find that they have in common a greater pattern of take-home pay in the form of a share in profits. There is no interest in that approach by the Government or the official Opposition. They are happy to continue the debilitating trench warfare and class struggle that passes for British industrial relations.

There is a consensus in the country, as every opinion poll shows, that the House would be more effective in easing the running of the economy if it properly represented the political views of the country, but we know that neither Government nor Opposition will agree with that. We all know what the result of the vote tonight will be. We know that we cannot win with the rules of this place, but we represent the consensus on those issues in the country and we are winning the argument in the country. We do not need to build a consensus on those issues. It is already there.

Last of all, there is consensus that a resolute approach has its time and place. When it is used properly it is supported both in the House and in the country. However, on economic policy, the Prime Minister and the Chancellor have proved obstinately and resolutely wrong. We shall support the censure motion in the Lobby tonight.

5.30 pm

Mr. Peter Hordern (Horsham): It is difficult to know why so much fuss should have been engendered about this debate. I had understood that it was to be a censure debate. I looked forward eagerly to hearing the Leader of the Opposition describe what, in his view, the Government were doing wrong. I listened to the leader of the Liberal Party with similar expectations. However, as the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) must know, the present crisis does not rate in comparison with crises of the past.

I remember that in 1968 the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), the then Chancellor, came to the House at 3.20 am and announced that the banks and the stock exchange were to be closed for three days. On the fourth day, he announced that the IMF was to lend us £4 billion, that purchase tax, through the regulator, was to rise by 10 per cent., and that the price of a bottle of whisky was to be increased by four shillings, a pint of beer by a penny, and a packet of cigarettes, I believe, by fivepence.

I cannot understand why the right hon. Member for Islwyn thinks that the present situation rates as a crisis, compared with the position in those days. It does not even begin to do so. So far as I can understand it, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is talking about reducing taxes, not increasing them. It is difficult to understand the basis on which the Opposition have launched their censure motion.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The answer is obvious. Because of oil, for the first time since the war, we do not have a balance of payments problem. That is what has changed the situation.

Mr. Hordern: I do not believe that that is true. I shall take up that point later.

I had always understood that the Labour party thought that the pound was too high, and wanted to devalue it. A paper was produced in November 1982 under the auspices of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) in which it was argued that the pound was too high and should be reduced in two annual dollops of 15 per cent. I have done a few calculations. In November 1982 the exchange rate was $1·65 to the pound. We allow for the 15 per cent. In November 1983, the exchange rate was $1·47 to the pound. If the right hon. Gentleman's policy had been carried out, the rate would now have been $1·09·2 to the pound. I admit that we have not quite reached that situation, but I cannot see why the right hon. Gentleman should complain.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but the position with which he should make his comparison is not that of November 1982, but that of April 1982, which was the position against which those simulations were made. The pound sterling then stood at $1·80. On that basis, the arithmetic is somewhat different.

Mr. Hordern: I am not sure that it would be very different. What is certain is that the exchange rate for sterling has moved in much the same way as the right hon. Gentleman suggested at that time and as the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) suggests it has moved since.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has suggested that there should be a realistic and competitive rate of exchange. What does he call a realistic rate of exchange? He is very reluctant to define it. He says that it may be about right now. The House and the country are entitled to know what the Labour party considers to be a proper exchange rate.

Apart from commenting on the exchange rate, the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook also says that the Government should adopt a new policy. They should make overseas investment more difficult and, better still, in the right hon. Gentleman's view, retract some of the very substantial investments which have been taking place in the United States and elsewhere during the past few years.

I wonder whether, if the Prime Minister had not given him a clue, the right hon. Gentleman would have had any idea of the substance of the overseas investment that has taken place during the past four years. I hesitate to correct my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on this matter, but according to the autumn statement, overseas investment has grown from £15 billion in 1979, representing 7·5 per cent. of gross domestic product, to some £70 billion now, which represents 22 per cent. of GDP.

What would the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook do with that investment? He thinks that we should bring back the money. What would be the effect of bringing £70 billion in investment back into this country? Does the right hon. Gentleman have any idea? He wants to make the pound more competitive. What would be the effect of bringing back £7 billion—let alone £70 billion—into this country? It would raise the exchange to such a level as completely to destroy all the manufacturing industry in this country. Is not that an extraordinary policy? It is akin to that of a seedy solicitor in some provincial town making off with other people's goods.

No doubt some of that money was drawn in to finance the American deficit. But, whatever else may be said about investing that vast amount of money overseas, the investment has certainly proved to be a very good one. People ask what is to happen when North sea oil runs out. The answer is that there is substantial investment overseas, both direct and in portfolio form——

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): For some.

Mr. Hordern: —which will stand us in good stead for many years to come. The hon. Gentleman says, "For some." There are 11 million people with shares in pension funds. The Labour party cares nothing for those with shares in pension funds, or in anything else.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Will the hon. Gentleman join me in making representations to the Chancellor not to tax pension funds in the Budget, as he proposes to do?

Mr. Hordern: I am lucky that I do not have to anticipate my right hon. Friend's budget. I shall not do so now.

When the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, who produces these solutions, was prices Minister, he was—as a result of the failure of his policies, and of the attentions of Professor Clegg—directly responsible for the most disastrous increase in prices that we have ever had. Everything that the right hon. Gentleman touches seems to turn to dross.

[Mr. Hordern]

What is the truth about the so-called sterling crisis? There is the question of oil. There can be no doubt that we are regarded as an oil country. Oil represents only 5 per cent. of GDP but, when we came to office, the price of sterling rose sharply against the dollar because of the perception that since the price of oil was rising sterling must rise too. It did. It rose to the uncomfortable level of $2·42 to the pound. It was as natural as day following night that when the price of oil fell the price of sterling would fall too, because of how this country is perceived abroad.

The fall in the price of sterling provides business and industry with the best opportunity that they have ever had. Business and industry are taking advantage of that opportunity. In the past two years, company profits have risen by some 35 per cent. and private sector investment is at an all-time high. Provided that business and industry have the confidence that their order books should certainly give them, there is no reason why the economy should not continue to grow—and, ultimately, employment too.

The question of confidence is all-important, particularly in relation to the American deficit. The House should recognise that the perception of how the American economy is being run has also changed. It is a very different affair under President Reagan from what it was under President Carter. There is a good deal more confidence in investment in the United States now than there was in those days. The higher rates of interest are not the only important factor.

The United States statistics are most impressive. Inflation is controlled by firm monetary policies. Wage increases are substantially lower than they are here. There is a free enterprise economy which works, and which has been the engine of growth in world trade for the past two or three years. People are prepared to pay a premium to be in the United States and they are helped in that by high interest rates. The United States provides us with a huge and comparatively open market. Oil, and the United States as an investment haven, are two reasons why sterling is low.

Was my right hon. Friend the Chancellor right to increase interest rates? I do not think that he had any choice. He was right to mention all the good things that are happening, but when every economic commentator of every shade of opinion is poring over the books it is extremely important to present a balanced view of the economy. I do not believe that my right hon. Friend has always done that. When he claims that monetary policy is under control, it is important that all the measures of money should be under control, not just the ones that he mentions such as the narrow measurement of MO or the measurement of M3, which can be adjusted by selling more gilt-edged investment than is strictly necessary for the task.

A more accurate measurement of money at the moment is the wider one of PSL2. Any indication that we might like to draw upon about spending and credit and the level of bank lending, which is at a record level, must leave us with no doubt that credit and spending are extremely easy at the moment. It would be only right for my right hon. Friend to refer to every measure, not just those that suit his argument.

Credit is perceived to be easy at the moment. The combination of that fact and my right hon. Friend saying in the autumn statement that there was £1·5 billion to go in tax cuts gave, quite wrongly, the impression that the Government were going soft about inflation. There is no denying that that is what the markets thought. That was a mistake. Indeed, I think that the autumn statement was a great mistake. I would rather do away with the whole thing, but if it must be done I beg my right hon. Friend not to talk about the giveaways that will be made in the future and to remain as silent as he can about the prospects. It was all his fault in the first place, because if it had not been for the Rooker-Wise-Lawson amendment we should not be in this state.

The public expenditure White Paper is also a rather improbable document. I sometimes think that my right hon. Friend is determined to disprove the old saying that out of every thin man a fat one is trying to escape. Perhaps my right hon. Friend is trying to prove the opposite because he is showing that he has great determination to reduce public expenditure, but it has increased in each of the past three years, as is shown by the public expenditure White Paper. People find it increasingly difficult to envisage public expenditure being reduced to 39·2 per cent. as my right hon. Friend says. There must be a clearer and more forceful examination of public expenditure. It would be of great advantage to do so in the context of bringing public expenditure and revenue together so that the whole country could see what the plans are.

Anyone who looks at the national accounts will be pleased to see that borrowing is taking place solely for profitable investment. The accounts could be presented as they used to be, below the line—only for profitable borrowing—and above the line. Nobody would object to lending for that purpose. The increase in interest rates has put paid to any inflationary fears that there might have been. My advice to my right hon. Friend, for what it is worth, is to ignore the foreign exchange markets, not to give too much away in the Budget and to say as little as possible. When I think of the disasters in the past 20 years that have resulted from Governments spending without counting the cost and the ruin that that has brought to many people, I am astonished that the Opposition should have the nerve to table this motion. I wish my right hon. Friend every success.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): This is an important debate, but I have little hope of Conservative Members joining us in the Lobby. Their conduct, which has been described as an organised demonstration against the speech of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, has been deplorable, bearing in mind the problems that face the country. The Opposition motion has not been tabled light-heartedly, although Conservative Members have treated it in that way.

I should like to consider the serious problems caused by social discontent in northern cities. Listening to the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Hordern), one would think that there is no crisis simply because, as he said, the financial markets are OK. However, there is a human crisis in Britain. In many northern cities suicide rates are increasing, homelessness on a scale such as has not been seen for many years, and an increase in the number of young people glue sniffing and taking drugs. An increasing number of families are breaking up. Earlier this week we discussed corporal punishment in schools. Social discontent caused by the factors that I have outlined is now spreading into schools, making control there extremely difficult. Many young people's parents, brothers and sisters are unemployed. They go to school and ask, "For what?" It is extremely difficult to keep discipline.

Conservative Members can kid themselves or hide behind the Prime Minister. To corrupt the analogy of the three brass monkeys, they can hear all, see all and, as we say in the north say nowt. They seem able to divorce themselves from the growing chorus of criticism of the Government from every quarter. That criticism comes from industrialists, churches, the academic world and even some Conservatives in the country. Unfortunately, much of that criticism is falling on deaf ears.

I should like to give an example of the criticism that is coming from industry. My local paper, the Sheffield Morning Telegraph, produced an industrial survey on 9 January. One of the articles was written by the chief executive of Johnson and Firth Brown, under the heading:

"Leadership has been singularly lacking".

The author mentioned the breakdown of social order because of mass unemployment. To illustrate his case he quoted Michael Howard, professor of modern history at Oxford—not the Prime Minister's favourite academic institution at the moment, but still well qualified. The article said:

"Professor Howard warns of 'the long-term threat' to Britain's social cohesiveness from the volatile masses of unemployed, especially among the young 'who simply do not feel part of society at all and so defiantly turn their backs on it'."

He continued by offering advice on how the energy industry should be run:

"The strategic importance of coal for our economy in both the short and long term is unquestioned. Indeed, it is suggested that the additional oil purchased as a substitute for coal-fired generating stations is costing the CEGB an additional £20 million each week. Whilst this strategic importance lasts there cannot be an absolute 'right to manage' which is divorced from logistic, political, social and occasionallly geo-political realities. The energy industry, per se, has to be an industry that responds to broader criteria than doctrinaire economics, and manages its affairs in the broader national interest by consent within a coherent strategic framework. The 'right to manage' is not obtained by right, or force . . . we are not capitalists and socialists, we are workers and managers who should all share in the legitimate reward of success. The best managers are working all of the time . . . The best workers are managing all of the time."

We should adopt a collective approach to the problems of our industrial framework, rather than make demands and take actions which result in the confrontation that seems to be the order of the day under the present Government.

According to the unemployment figures announced today, the nation has 3·25 million people unemployed—equal to 13·7 per cent of the work force. In Sheffield, my city, 43,918 people are unemployed—an increase of 1,100 since the figures were last announced—representing 15·2 per cent. of the work force. When the Conservatives came to office in 1979, Sheffield had 13,000 unemployed, or 4·5 per cent. I assure the hon. member for Horsham that that is a crisis.

In 1979, in my constituency unemployment stood at 3,900, or 8 per cent. It is now 10,200, or 25·7 per cent. The worst aspects are masked by the figures, because in the centre of Sheffield unemployment is over 50 per cent. The deprivation caused by that must be seen to be believed, as 53 per cent. of the unemployed have not had a job for a year and 30 per cent have been unemployed for over two years. That, too, is a real crisis.

About 10,000 young people in the city of Sheffield have not had a real job since leaving school. That is a crisis for them. More than 40,000 jobs have been lost since 1979 in the steel and associated trades in the proud steel city of Sheffield, and there is a growth industry among the companies producing "For sale" signs.

It goes deeper than that, because what is occurring is a reflection of the Government's approach to industry. The Government's simplistic approach could be likened to the Prime Minister going into a restaurant and looking at two different menus. First, she picks up the a la carte menu and immediately sends that to the Common Market, with a PS saying, "Please look after the CAP."

The right hon. Lady then picks up the second menu—we can liken this situation to British industry—which is a much more limited menu because, for starters, everybody gets the same: free market forces are allowed to run wild, with a touch of trade union control.

We come to the main course. There is a limited choice, although there is a selection of chefs. For the steel industry we are given Ian MacGregor. He is there to dish up phoenix I, II and III. Phoenix I was not a raging success, being denationalisation, to which the Prime Minister referred earlier.

Phoenix III was supposed to represent an important part of our steel industry—steel forging—but industrialists, trade unionists and even some civil servants said that phoenix III was based on rocky financial foundations. A rescue attempt involving more than £10 million had to be devoted to that after only two years of its life; so phoenix III has not been a raging success, either.

Everybody is waiting for the announcement of phoenix II, which has been in the oven of the Department of Trade and Industry for about six months. There were 100,000 job losses in the industry in five years and the chef, Mr. MacGregor, relegated the industry, both the special and bulk steel sectors, to being not even comparable with the steel industries of some Third-world countries.

There will be a crisis when, if the economy is reflated and we are in the aerospace, nuclear power and high technology industries, we need the base materials. They will have to be imported, because the technology, investment and research and development suffered one cut after another. Mr. MacGregor relegated Britain to a position well down the league of major steel manufacturers. The chef, having done that to the steel industry, was moved to the NCB to create havoc there.

The next course is the sweet—which we in the north call pudding—and that involves leaving the mess to the local authorities and local communities to sort out. But the Government add a little vindictiveness, and the local authorities are called irresponsible and Left loonies. To make sure that they cannot respond, they start to remove their rights, and with that step we have an undermining of the democratic basis. "Public expenditure" is made a dirty phrase in the English language—even worse than Oxford university. Democratic rights having been removed, local authorities are unable to govern in the interests of the community.

It may be said that I make somewhat light of the problems of the steel industry. I assure Conservative Members that those working in that and allied industries do not take the situation lightly. The nation will regret the day when Ian MacGregor set foot on the steel industry.

I am privileged to represent Sheffield, Central. I join many others in warning the Government that if they do not change course and step aside from the policies of confrontation which are undermining our industrial base, deliberately creating unemployment, along with treading on people and their institutions, the stability which enables the financial institutions to function will itself be undermined.

There exists in society today great anxiety and frustration. Unless there is a change in Government policy, confrontation will be the order of the day and stability will disappear. The Opposition have tabled the motion, not to score points off the Government, but genuinely to bring before the House the concern that is felt not only by the millions who are unemployed but by the British people generally, and especially by those who are living below the poverty line. If the Government do not heed our advice, it will be to their sorrow and detriment in the future.

5.57 pm

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): The central accusation in the censure motion is that the Government have mishandled the economy. I understand why the official Opposition, and some of those who have had the responsibility in the last 30 years of managing the economy, would now like to pretend that all our present industrial problems and our relative industrial weakness are the consequence of the actions of the present Government. For them to do otherwise would be to admit that they have a share in the heavy burden of responsibility for our long-standing problems and for the deep-seated danger signals that have been emerging for many years.

I exclude, in fairness, from that general condemnation the Leader of the Opposition, because he has been responsible for nothing. However, when previous Prime Ministers have trooped up to Oxford to collect their honorary degrees, I wonder how many of them paused to reflect that the academics who were honouring them were the same people who looked on technology transfer as some unworthy activity, beneath their intellectual dignity.

Those same academics would diligently pursue their research at public expense, collect their Nobel prizes and then sit back complacently as the development of their work and the jobs that their ideas generated were taken up in the United States or Japan. We in this country must now re-import goods manufactured overseas for which we did the basic technological work and research.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Has the hon. Gentleman visited the west midlands? Is he aware that in 1979 we had 6 per cent. unemployment and were a manufacturing region, whereas unemployment there is now as high as it is in any other region of the country? That is the type of damage that has been done to the British economy—it is encapsulated in the west midlands—by the Conservatives since 1979.

Mr. Batiste: Many jobs and millions of pounds worth of work would be done in Britain today had we had the foresight in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s to take up the ideas that we generated in our universities. Our traditional areas of industry, such as those in the west midlands and in my area of west Yorkshire, would have been the prime beneficiaries of that foresight. Technology transfer is not an alternative to the adequate funding of higher education. Nor is the adequate funding of higher education an alternative that enables those institutions to ignore the need for technology transfer.

Because of the pressures that this Government have put upon the academic world, it has been prompted for the first time into the surge of technology transfer that has taken place during the past few years. This Government have recognised the importance of new technology and have done something about it. They have fostered, developed and encouraged the Alvey programme in information technology, a field in which we once led but which we have since neglected. This Government set up the National Space Centre to bring together the diverse and complex threads of a vital industry that we once led, but it is a lead that we have squandered. This Government are fighting against the claims of the United States for the extra-territorial application of their law in high technology industries. It is the companies in my area and in the other industrial areas that will be the beneficiaries if the Government stand up robustly against those claims and against American interests and fight for the interests of this country. The shame lies with those who over the years have neglected these opportunities. The shame lies not with this Government who are trying to pick up those opportunities.

For years profit has been a dirty word in this country, and in the Opposition's vocabulary it still is a dirty word. Yet profit is the mainspring of opportunity, of investment and of jobs——

Ms. Clare Short: All the hon. Gentleman is interested in is profits for him and his friends.

Mr. Batiste: That intervention by the hon. Lady shows just how right I am when I say that "profit" is still a dirty word in the vocabulary of the Opposition. Until they have learned that, they have learned nothing. Until they have learned that, they will never understand how a free economy can grow and prosper and how jobs can be created. This Government have restored profitability and investment to British industry.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South) rose——

Mr. Batiste: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment. This Government have restored profitability and investment to British industry and have reversed the strength-sapping spread of creeping nationalisation with a brilliantly successful privatisation programme leading to genuine public ownership—that is, ownership by people for themselves, not ownership by bureaucrats on their behalf.

Mr. Bermingham: Would not the hon. Gentleman agree with me that the real question is where the profit goes? Does it go into a few hands, or does it go into the hands of all those who participate in the production of the product?

Mr. Batiste: No, I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman at all. Unless a company produces profits it will be unable to employ people. If there is no profitability there will be no employment. And if one wishes to increase employment one has to increase profitability. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman does not understand that point.

For years, across the world, particularly in the developed nations, inflation has been rightly regarded as the enemy of economic progress and as the enemy of employment and of savings. Yet in this country it is only this Government who have demonstrated a clear and consistent will to take the steps necessary to keep inflation under control. I shudder to think what level interest rates and the pound would now be at if the right hon. Member for Blaenau, Gwent (Mr. Foot) had won the last general election and had implemented the disastrous Labour party manifesto. Upon these issues, and to such matters as the development of small businesses, successive Governments have for years paid lip service. Yet for years the share of the economy held by such an important sector as small businesses has declined. However, the experience of the United States economy and of the German economy shows that it is this sector that is best able to provide new jobs. It is this Government who have changed the pattern. They do not say, "We shall pay lip service to this concept." They produce the programmes that will help small businesses. This Government have produced the business expansion scheme, the loan guarantee scheme and the enterprise allowance scheme. This Government have promoted and expanded local enterprise agencies.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Batiste: No, I shall not give way. My speech must be brief because there are many other hon. Members who wish to take part in the debate. I have already given way twice without any enlightenment being proferred by the Opposition.

It is the actions of this Government that have been successful in promoting the expansion of small businesses and in creating new jobs in the small business sector—and not just in the small business sector. The example of the United States shows clearly that the service sector provides many new jobs, yet over very many years Government after Government in Britain have introduced policies that have progressively handicapped, frustrated and hindered the development of service industries. It is this Government who have turned that tide and abolished the tax on jobs which Labour introduced.

The most important feature that underpins a successful economy is the handling of industrial relations. After lurching in industrial relations, from the sledgehammer approach of the Industrial Relations Act to the pre-emptive cringe towards militancy of the Opposition—so good an example of which is shown by the faces now on the Opposition Benches—it is this Government who have had the wisdom and the tact to set about creating a legal framework for industrial relations by means of a steady, step by step process that has gone along with public opinion and that has taken public opinion along with it.

Mr. Lofthouse: Would the hon. Gentleman tell the young miners in his constituency, or the youngsters who would normally go into the pits, what are their employment prospects when pits in his constituency, such as Ledston Luck and Saville, close?

Mr. Batiste: I shall tell them and the hon. Gentleman very clearly. Every miner in my constituency who may be faced with redundancy and who comes from those pits and who wishes to continue in mining will be offered alternative employment by the National Coal Board in another pit in the area. What is the threat to those young men? What is the threat to those miners? It is the attitude of the Labour party and the continuation of this terrible strike. It is this Government who have taken steps to put industrial relations into their proper legislative framework and who have the determination to stand up to those militants who are so well represented on the Opposition Benches and who believe that intimidation is an alternative to industrial democracy.

Many of those hon. Members who came into Parliament for the first time in 1983 were motivated by the belief, reinforced by the record of the previous four years, that this Government and this Prime Minister would demonstrate the guts, the determination and the foresight to reverse what had hitherto appeared to so many of us to be an irreversible national decline. After one and a half years of this Parliament and having seen the manifest withering on the vine of the Opposition, I am pleased to say that I can see no reason to doubt that belief and that I have no reason to do other than support this Government in their handling of the economy.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) referred to the help given by the Government to small businesses. Nobody can dispute the fact that small businesses are of enormous importance to this country, but I wish that I were able to say that the help given by the Government to small businesses, compared with the disadvantage to them, both by the number of bankruptcies from which they have suffered and the high interest rates under which they labour, was as great as the hon. Gentleman suggested. If one adds up the "pluses" and deducts the "minuses", the Government's record is not as good as the hon. Member for Elmet and so many other Conservative Members believe it to be. Their record does not come up to the standards for which we would have wished.

The starting point of any examination of the effectiveness of a Government is how much power the Government have to influence events and how they use that power. The general rule is that Governments come to office believing that they have many levers to pull and many buttons to press. However, after a year or two they realise that some of the levers have rusted up and that some of the buttons are not connected to anything at all. That inevitably leads the Government to blame others for their own errors. However, it also leads a sensible Government to learn from their own mistakes and towards the end of their term in office to put right those misjudgments that they started with in the happy, optimistic days when they came to office. But to any observer the fact remains that there is asymmetry about the operations of the Government.

It is much easier for the Government to harm the economy than it is for the Government to do good. It has some of the characteristics of any mechanism about which we know too little: tightening the screw here, removing a component there. That cannot be guaranteed to improve performance.

Previous Governments have been humbled by the fact that they must contend with the despotism of reality. They have learnt the limitations of power and acquired some of the skills of relating to that knowledge. The acquisition of such wisdom has been called U-turns.

We have seen the famous U-turns of Governments since the 1960s. But true wisdom comes when one realises that one does not know that which one thought one knew. Such wisdom is a recognition that the Government have had second thoughts, and the embarrassment of having to deny previous assertions is a small sacrifice for the greater good of the British people.

The Government have not learnt from their period in office, and they present that failure to learn as proof of their consistency and determination rather than a blindness to the damage done to our fellow citizens, when they are the only real reason why we are in the House at all.

The particular damage is that done to our manufacturing industry. The Manchester chamber of commerce and industry regularly presents the voice of reality in our factories. It is different from that which the Government hear from the more luxurious dining rooms in the City which benefits so much from the Government's policies which devastate so much of the rest of Britain.

The disadvantage for industry is that the City is nearer to the Government, and industry is far away and thought to be dirty. Ministers have that rapport with the City. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has an especial rapport with the City. One third of the firms in my constituency closed in the first two years of the Government's period in office and my constituency consists of small firms. We have no international finance, no international insurance and no international banking. We see the problems that small firms face, and we take no comfort from the preference given to the service industries, with which we have little to do.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend hits upon an important point when he says that there have been bankruptcies. There has been a record number of bankruptcies in the past year. How does he square that with the speech by the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste), who told us that only the Government and those on the Conservative Benches have done so much for small businesses?

Mr. Sheldon: That is true. There have been 12,000 bankruptcies, and that is a record figure. It is about four times the rate of only a few years ago. That is the danger for the small companies in so many of our constituencies.

There is the problem of international trade in goods which one can see benefiting my constituency but which is of less importance to other parts of Britain. I recall well the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) talking about the favoured parts of Britain which are dominant and which should be less dominant. The telling argument that the right hon. Gentleman used had great repercussions. There were echoes of it in my constituency and anywhere north of this city.

The Prime Minister has endorsed fully the medium-term financial strategy, the main statement of which was set out in the Financial Statement and Budget Report in 1980. It said:

"The Government's objectives for the medium-term are to bring down the rate of inflation and to create conditions for a sustainable growth of output and employment."

That has been the aim of all the Government's efforts over the past five and a half years.

One of the arguments used by the Prime Minister was that her economic policy, which embraced her attitudes to monetarism, the PSBR and so on, was a necessary, if not sufficient, condition for prosperity. The notion of "necessary" and "sufficient" is one that was devised by philosophers and appropriated by scientists to distinguish in a laboratory that process which is essential to a successful experiment from that which is not. It does not ensure a successful outcome on its own.

The Government tried to show that one must reduce inflation and have a monetarist policy before anything else can occur. One could argue that a necessary condition for our prosperity is an improvement in morality. Such things cannot be tested, and the essential task for politicians is to provide policies which can be tested by results and can be seen in operation.

One possible regret is that the Labour party never thought of that one first. How clever it would have been if we had said that the nationalisation of the steel industry was a necessary if not sufficient reason for a manufacturing rebirth rather than what it was — an attempt to control and assist a beleaguered industry.

How imaginative if we had said that capital transfer tax was a necessary if not sufficient reason to improve industrial performance rather than what it was — an attempt at fair taxation.

The Prime Minister is able to hide behind that as an essential step along the road when the end has no connection with it. It is to reality that we must turn again and again. When we look at the Government's policies on incentives——

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North): Am I right in thinking that the Treasury team of which the right hon. Gentleman was a prominent member, at least from 1976 onwards, also believed that it was essential to follow a monetarist policy?

Mr. Sheldon: No. The hon. Gentleman will surely know that I strongly disapproved of that. I disapprove of it now and I disapproved of it during the interim period.

The Government's essential task has been to carry out their fixed monetarist policy, which has resulted only in deflation and a loss of output to the disadvantage of Britain, but to the particular disadvantage of the area which I have the privilege to represent.

We have been round this course many times before. In 1962 we provided advantages to those surtax payers. In 1972 we introduced a unified tax system to help the better off. In 1979 we reduced the highest rate of income tax from 83 to 60 per cent. In 1983 we removed the investment income surcharge. Those were tax changes of enormous advantage, designed for the so-called entrepreneur, but they did not come out of their closet as a result. The money was given to no avail at all, and so it will remain during the Government's period in office.

Let us turn to the particular problems that we see. How was it that we failed to take advantage of the enormous benefit given by North sea oil? The period of greatest prosperity, the period when something can be done about such a windfall, is when the revenue from that particular product is increasing. As it increases year by year, so there is extra money to disburse. The greatest period of prosperity that we can recall individually is always when our income rises the most — not when we have the highest level of income, but when it rises the most. That is when we have spare money over and above our previous needs. That is what the Government had. For the first time ever this century, the Government had an enormous increase in income—in wealth.

The question was what should be done with that windfall, which, because it was provided by oil, was non-recurring. What we should have done was use it to prepare Britain for investment in those areas which would produce a return. It is a pitiful return to think that that money went abroad to help other countries' industries and that we cannot be sure it will return to Britain. The days of tax exiles remain. They have not been brought back to Britain by low levels of tax. They are still abroad and the fleet-footedness of so many of those individuals is likely to lead to them staying abroad.

That money should not have gone abroad. It should have gone into industry because we depend on it for so many jobs. We have 50 million people in the United Kingdom, and we cannot earn our living by providing banking and insurance services. We can earn our living in Ashton-under-Lyne only by making things. There is no other way. If we give an advantage to service industries over manufacturing industries, we are saying what the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said about regional incentives — that there is no economic case, only a social case, for regional incentives.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire South) rose——

Mr. Sheldon: I shall give way in a moment.

That is an appalling statement to make. It implies that we are the recipients of handouts, and that there is no economic case for dealing with the large numbers of people who are unemployed and with the many people who daily see what is happening in the favoured parts—the south and south-east. They believe that they have skills which are still relevant in the modern world but which are not being called upon.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Sheldon: I am afraid that I am overrunning my time.

That is what is happening today, and we must be aware of it. Not all that long ago Quintin Hogg was sent to the north-east, with his cap, to do something for that area. He did not do very much, but he showed that his Government cared. We should like to see a member of the Government, preferably the Prime Minister, go to such areas to show that they care. We know that the right hon. Lady is not happy about showing that she cares about these matters. She never travels on the railways—we know that she does not like them. She has never said a nice thing about civil servants—we know that she dislikes them. She does not go to those regions, because she does not think they matter. But they are important. She must overcome her aversion and show that we are one united country. That is an essential task of politics, not economics.

Five and a half years is long enough for any political or economic experiment. The prosperity of the country and the uniting and knitting together of the people should be foremost. Those are the tests by which a Government should be judged. I regret that the Government have failed them.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): I shall try to confine my remarks to the 10 minutes that the Select Committee I chair has urged on the House. In so doing, I hope to prove that one can still debate points. I shall take the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) slightly to task. At times he is a travelling companion of mine, even in financial matters. His argument that, because there have been some failures within the small industry section, we have not achieved three times more than anything that was introduced by the Labour Government, does not hold up. It is a sign of the weakness of the Opposition's case. He argued that we had the strictest monetarist policy, but he knows that I am not a strict monetarist. Perhaps that is why I speak from below the Gangway. There is a vast difference between the Government's policy today and the strictness that we expected in 1979. The right hon. Gentleman knows that, in all honesty.

I shall deal with four matters. We must consider the Socialist approach if we are to accept the criticisms of the motion. What would that Socialist approach be? Within the shortest possible time it would bring about a return to a massive increase in inflation. It would ensure that there was a major increase in industrial costs and, therefore, a considerable decrease in the level of increase in productivity within the industrial structure. We would see a major reduction in international confidence in sterling, a genuine flight of foreign investment from Britain—I hope that all hon. Members would wish to encourage that investment in Britain—and a major departure of the foreign currency balances that are in London at present, especially those relating to America and Arab investment. The Opposition's policies would be disastrous. They are a farrago of financial fiction. They are complete nonsense —the proper definition of a farrago.

I shall put another point to those who seriously support the motion. Today's attack from the Opposition Front Bench achieves nothing; indeed, it works against sustaining the growing confidence in sterling's recovery and our economic recovery. I believe that the country is in favour of those who work to benefit the economic expansion of this nation, and not of those who work against it.

For that reason I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to be waylaid by the siren voices of the false expansionists. I am worried that those who suggest a massive injection of public capital spending do not realise how in the past we have suffered from that approach. We have seen a major dash for growth by a Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer, my late colleague Mr. Reginald Maudling. We have seen what that did for the economy. I criticised my party in the past, and I say that that did not prove to be either successful or helpful.

We should not forget — this is not frequently mentioned—that such an action lasts for only a limited period. Opposition Members do not consider what will happen when that injection of extra money from Government ceases. If it is the pump-priming exercise, which the Opposition try to suggest that it will be, unless the massive artificial level of Government capital expenditure is sustained, it will come to an end right in the middle of the period when the pump-priming should be working. That will have a deleterious effect on the economy because false jobs will have been created. The economy will suffer, and the policy will do nothing in the long run to achieve growth in genuine jobs, the creation of which all hon. Members wish to ensure.

I shall now deal with two matters that are frequently forgotten. I ask the House and the country to remember the number of people who are employed at present, as well as those who are unemployed. It is interesting to note that more than 24·2 million people are in work in the United Kingdom.

[Sir Peter Emery]

If we examined the position when the Government came to power in 1979 and took account of the increase in unemployment since then, we would expect to see only 23·2 million people employed. Therefore, 1 million new jobs have been created, jobs that are different from those that were in existence in 1979. That does not alter the great need to deal with the problem of unemployment. However, those who wish to attack the Government on their record frequently neglect that point.

The Government have failed to make the country realise the economic cost to the nation of Scargill's strike. It is not just a matter of fighting for the coal industry; between £2 billion and £2·5 billion has been artificially removed from expansion and from our economic recovery simply to deal with the whims of a man who wishes to bring down a democratically elected Government. More people should consider not only the arguments about the strike, but the massive economic effect, deleterious to everyone in the nation, of Scargill's policies.

There are several views about Britain entering the European monetary system. However, although we may disagree with him, we must respect and examine the opinions of the Governor of the Bank of England. A major argument that I advanced for Britain's entry into Europe was that we would have a structure of European reserves to combat the strength of the dollar. We are fast approaching the time when Britain must join the European monetary system. It may not be a popular belief, but I have always believed that the problems that the Chancellor has had to tackle during the past two weeks, especially the reduction in the value of sterling against the dollar, would have been lessened if Britain were a part of the EMS.

A fact that is seldom, if ever, considered in the Chamber—perhaps because it is unpopular—is that we shall never return to the over-full employment of the 1950s and 1960s. Anyone who believes that that is not true is living in cloud-cuckoo-land. Therefore, we must consider how best to use our valuable manpower resources. It must be sensible that the unemployed, who are being sustained, rightly, by the vast expenditure of public funds, should be asked and be able to make a social contribution to the society that sustains them. I do not advocate placing them in full-time jobs, which would mean removing work from those already in employment, but there must be enough work to be done by able-bodied men in hospitals, in caring for the elderly and disabled, and in our streets and countryside. They could do many of the jobs that we cannot afford to do within the present structure of local government or public expenditure. The payment of tens of billions of pounds in order to keep people sitting on their behinds doing nothing cannot be a proper use of resources. Hon. Members on both sides of the House would be doing a favour to the unemployed, many of whom wish to believe that they can still make a contribution to society, if they considered my suggestion.

It is easy to criticise a Government in retrospect, and we can always point to ways in which things could have been done better. But I urge the House to realise that the Government's achievements are real and that they will continue for the benefit of the nation. What is more, the Opposition have put forward no alternative.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): I support the motion of censure, which would be carried overwhelmingly this evening if Conservative Members faithfully represented the views of the people who put them there rather than gave slavish support to their slave-mistress, the Prime Minister.

I make no apology for concentrating on the northern region. As I said to the Prime Minister earlier this afternoon, the northern region has been crucified by the policies pursued by her Government during the past five years. I grew up in the north-east during the bad times, under successive Tory Governments in the 1930s, but even in those days the despair was not so complete as we see in the region now. Never in my lifetime has a Prime Minister shown such callous disregard for so many of our people. One cannot run a great ship of state as though it were a small rowing boat on a park lake, but that is the inevitable price that we must pay for the Prime Minister's corner-shop mentality.

Were it not for more than £1 billion of support received from the European Community, God knows what the northern region would be like today. It has the highest unemployment in mainland Britain, and it is becoming steadily worse month by month. It would not be so bad if we could see a faint light at the end of the tunnel, but we cannot. For every 100 jobs created in new, innovative industry in the northern region, the south-east receives no fewer than 500 jobs. That cannot continue. It is immoral for a Government to allow the soft underbelly of the country to receive five times more jobs than does the northern region.

I have argued long and loud for Government intervention in the north in the shape of a Government research and development agency, yet the northern region is the only one in the United Kingdom without such a facility. It is no coincidence that the growth of such establishments — like mushrooms growing in the morning mist — alongside the M4 has created a new silicon grove in the area between west London and south Wales. When will the Government recognise the facts and give nothing less than a fair deal to the north? The Government have the power to give a lead. When will they do so?

No one can deny that good road communications are much more vital in a peripheral region like the north than in other regions, particularly the south-east. Yet the Government have failed completely to realise this important geographical factor. Since 1979 expenditure on roads in the north has on average been only 40 per cent. of that in the south-east. In the last financial year nearly £11 million was spent in the south-east compared with £4 million in the north.

Airports are crucial to an area like the north-east. The local authorities in north-east England are to be commended on the way in which they developed the little airport outside Newcastle from a pleasure-based airport to an excellent regional airport with international potential. The local authorities combined have spent no less than £8·5 million on building a new terminal. Because of the success of the airport we have ever-increasing traffic and need a parallel taxiway. The Government last May refused authorisation for such a project. In other words, they are not even prepared to allow us to help ourselves while at the same time the Prime Minister is willing to commit countless millions of pounds in national resources to suck up to the French of all people by supporting the building of a channel tunnel. This is one of the most offensive of the many offensive things that she has done to the north-east in the last five years.

The north badly needs more resources for health care, bearing in mind that there is far too much ill-health and a high death rate.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is my hon. Friend not unsettled when he hears Conservative Members saying that unemployment is here to stay? Does that not send a signal to regions such as ours that they cannot look to Parliament to resolve the problems of unemployment over the longer term? So long as the Government refuse to raise the level of benefits, does that not indicate also that they would leave people on the dole for decades in receipt of a very small amount of money every week? Does that not disturb people in the north?

Mr. Brown: It disturbs me. More than that, I am disturbed when I see hon. Members who represent parts of the west midlands, which has suffered badly under the Government, looking as though they were enjoying the talk about unemployment. My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) said that the Government were not prepared to increase welfare benefits. The reverse is the case. They have reduced them in real terms.

That brings me back to the point I was making about the high death rate in the north. I attribute much of it to suicides caused by the grim economic plight of high unemployment. Infant mortality was consistently higher in the north than in the rest of England and Wales until, thankfully, in 1980-81 the rate reduced to slightly less than the national average. We have fewer doctors and dentists than the rest of the country and the number of patients on their lists is appalling.

In the face of all these facts, what do we see? Do we see the Government rushing to help a region that has been under-privileged in regard to health care? Do we heck. The 1984-85 capital allocation to the northern regional health authority has been cut by this pathetic Government by no less than £4 million, just under 10 per cent. of our total expenditure. Does the House wonder that we in the north suffer deep anger and almost despair at the unfairness of the incumbents of the Treasury Bench?

In regard to energy, gas sales in the north fell by 8·2 per cent. between 1979 and 1983, compared with a national fall of 1·7 per cent. The most serious part of the fall in energy sales was in industry, where sales of gas decreased by 17 per cent. That point cannot be lost on the House. The same can be said about electricity. There is a reduction of 12 per cent. in industrial take-up. That illustrates what has been happening to manufacturing industry.

We have reached the stage where nationally, for the first time in our history, we are importing more manufactured goods than we are exporting. I need hardly say in this Chamber, of all places, that an island nation depends on importing raw materials, turning them into ploughshares or whatever, and exporting them. If we are not doing that, what chance have we of survival?

Disposable incomes in the north are well below the national average.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will my hon. Friend agree that in the west midlands and the black country, the very heartland of the manufacturing regions of the United Kingdom, there has been absolute devastation because of the Government's economic policies? In 1979, when they took office, the unemployment rate was 5·1 per cent. Now and for some time it has been between 12 per cent. and 15 per cent. In my travel-to-work area the official figure is 17 per cent.

Mr. Brown: The whole country has been devastated by the Government's employment policy. I sympathise with my hon. Friend. I still maintain, as I said last year in a similar debate, that all the facts and figures I have exposed must be a fair indication to the Government that they should understand the message that we are long past the time when, for survival, the north needs positive discrimination.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown) has made a regional speech; I shall refer to some of his comments when I talk about manufacturing industry.

One must admire the audacity of the Leader of the Opposition in introducing a motion such as this against the Government. We should consider the background against which he introduced it, one where the Government of the day have repaid over half the money that the Labour Government borrowed from the International Monetary Fund. [Interruption.] It is all very well to talk about oil. When I asked the Leader of the Opposition why they had had to borrow the money, he could not answer.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough) rose——

Sir William Clark: I shall not give way yet. The motion has been introduced against a background of a panic visit to the IMF by a Labour Chancellor. This Government have never been to the IMF in such circumstances.

The Opposition criticise the Government's record over the last five years, but in 1979 we took over rapidly rising inflation. Today inflation is down to 5 per cent. That is no cause for criticism. We took over high and increasing overspending. We have brought the public sector borrowing requirement down through strict monetary policy and it is now about 2 per cent. of GDP. When we took over production was falling. Now production is rising.

When we took over, grossly excessive wage and salary awards were being made. One of the mistakes that the Conservative Government made was to accept the Clegg recommendations. Today claims are far more moderate. When we took over, there was gross over-manning. Today over-manning has been slimmed down, certainly in the private sector and to some extent in the public sector.

When we took over, industry was experiencing falling profits. Now profits are rising. All that is against the background of a world recession which increased in intensity after 1979 until a year or so ago. Despite the temporary setback, I cannot understand why the Leader of the Opposition has moved his censure motion.

There must be a reason. One of the reasons must be the pressure from the Left wing of the right hon. Gentleman's party. We are to have a debate about the miners on Monday, but for weeks the Leader of the Opposition said that we would not have such a debate. It would have been easy to arrange a debate on a Supply day, but the Leader of the Opposition said no. The pressure built up. I understand why the Leader of the Opposition did not want a debate on the miners' strike. The public are fed up to the back teeth with the violence that they have seen on their televisions sets.

Today's debate is another sop to pacify the right hon. Gentleman's Left wing. The Leader of the Opposition had nothing positive to say today. All he did was criticise. He had nothing positive to offer about what a Labour Government would do.

The Leader of the Opposition today admonished Government Members and said, "Don't you realise that the miners' strike has cost the economy between £2 billion and £3 billion?" That must have an effect on the value of sterling. When has the right hon. Gentleman condemned the miners for causing that loss to the economy? He has never said anything.

Is the Leader of the Opposition saying to the country that the cost is too high and that the Government should give in to the demands of Mr. Scargill and his executive? We all know that the NUM executive has been infiltrated by the Left. Again the Left is using pressure. Of course it has cost money to import coal, although our balance of payments last year was in surplus.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Oil.

Sir William Clark: It is no use saying "Oil.". Opposition Members believe that the country is not fit to live in, but I believe that the country should be congratulated. Instead of trying to run down Britain, it is about time the Opposition talked about our achievements.

Mr. Winnick: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir William Clark: No. I want to be brief.

The Government are criticised for defending democracy against the impossible demands of Mr. Scargill, but what has he been offered? He has been promised no lost jobs. Surely that is good. He has been offered the best redundancy terms in the nationalised industries. Certainly they are better than anything in the private sector. He has been offered more investment in the mines. It is sometimes forgotten that retired miners have index-linked pensions. Any trade union leader could accept such a package.

The British taxpayer cannot continue to pour money into uneconomic pits. That is the nub of the problem. For some time my considered opinion has been that the strike has nothing to do with pay, economic pits or the welfare of the miners. I believe that the strike is about bringing down the democratic system. I am certain that the Government are right to resist. Opposition Members know as well as I do that under no circumstances can any Government give way to such demands by any union because if they did Governments in future would be subjected to the whims of any trade union leader.

The strength of the dollar is an enigma and many people do not understand it.—[Laughter.] Opposition Members may laugh, but the United States has a 200 billion dollar deficit, which is increasing, and its national debt went up last year by 15 per cent. It is an enigma that the dollar stays so strong. Why does it stay so strong? I believe that one of the main reasons is that the United States is self-sufficient. There is no point in trying to compare Britain with the United States because we are not self-sufficient; consequently, we are in a different position.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir William Clark: No.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said today, oil provides about 8 per cent. of the Chancellor's revenue. If the oil price comes down by 1 per cent. that revenue will be reduced to 7 per cent. and the Chancellor's income will be reduced by about £1·2 billion. If that were added to the public sector borrowing requirement, instead of PSBR being 2 per cent. of GDP it would be 2·5 per cent. or 2·75 per cent. of GDP. With such reserves there is no reason why the price of oil should affect the pound. The effect is over-exaggerated because of the so-called link between oil and our total economy.

I deal next with the question of the balance of payments. Last year we had a surplus. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) in an intervention referred to oil. Of course oil helps. One accepts that we now have a deficit in the manufacturing industry, but one must ask why we have that deficit. For example, why is it that the car industry no longer has the same share of the world market or, indeed, the domestic market? The simple reason is that we have not been sufficiently competitive. We must therefore identify where the trouble lies in the manufacturing industry. In the last five years we have increased our service industries, in addition to oil, with the result that we were able to balance our books on the balance of payments.

I have attempted to point out where I think the censure motion is misplaced. In my view it is frivolous, and a diversion to cover up the differences between the Left and Right wings of the Labour party. Nobody should doubt what might happen if, the Labour party ever got in. In the last five years our overseas investments have gone up by £55 billion, roughly the amount of revenue that has accrued from North sea oil. One has to realise that from those investments abroad come not only dividends but also the influence that we can have on making overseas subsidiaries buy British. Anybody who knows about imports and exports knows that that will help in the long run.

I feel sorry for the Leader of the Opposition. He has an impossible task in trying to straddle the two extremes of the Labour party. One section of his party is not really interested in democracy, and moderate Opposition Members know that I am right.

I hope that we will throw out the motion, knowing that it is a frivolous and merely diversionary tactic by the Leader of the Opposition, and a sop to the Left wing of his party.

7.2 pm

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) devoted a good part of his speech to dealing with the miners' dispute, as did some of his hon. Friends. I began to think that I had transgressed into next Monday's debate on the mining industry.

The hon. Gentleman repeated some of the usual excuses of the Government—for example, that we have not been competitive enough. There may be something in that. Next came the old chestnut about a world recession, but there is no world recession. I can point the hon. Gentleman to a number of countries in Europe which have far lower levels of unemployment than the United Kingdom.

I was surprised to hear the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) say that we would never get back to levels of full employment such as we have enjoyed in the past. He may well be right, but, if the Government had the will, there is no reason why we should face such a situation. We are lacking many amenities that would provide work for people. No Government, if they had the will, need accept the dismal forecast that we will never see anything like full employment again.

I thought that the opening speeches on both sides were rather poor. If I do not embarrass the Leader of the Liberal party by saying so, his speech was the first coherent one in the debate, although I did not agree with it by a long shot. At least it was something to listen to compared with the mixed up excuses and recriminations that were offered by the Opposition and Government Front Benches.

The Leader of the Opposition made what I thought was a good point when he said he took offence not only at the policies but the attitude of the Government. The whole ethos of the Government is wrong—their meanness of spirit and purpose and their incompetence, compounded by their stubborn refusal to heed the warnings even of members of their own party. It makes for a dismal prospect.

Some hon. Members have suggested that the entry of the United Kingdom into the EMS snake is a way out of our difficulties. I differ entirely from that point of view. Whatever readjustments might be made in the United Kingdom when we have the power to make them, we would lose to a great extent if we joined the EMS.

There are many ways still in which we could save money. We are to continue with Trident, for instance, although many people have lost faith in it as a weapon and have questioned its escalating costs. Some people are discussing the building of a Channel tunnel, although they seem to have learnt no lesson from the fate of Concorde and the way in which its costs rose gradually inch by inch. Initially it was going to cost £125 million. The ultimate cost was approximately £1,200 million. The public was conned stage by stage—"We have spent £x million. Therefore, we must go on to the next stage."

I hope that, whatever other mistakes they have made, the Government will not become involved in building a Channel tunnel. Let us leave that to the private people who like profit. Although some people allege that profit is a dirty word, I do not take that view. However, I object to the view that profit is all that matters in the world. I hope that the Government will not make the mistake of backing the Channel tunnel. As some hon. Members in business life know, in the few months before a business goes bankrupt it often sets out on the maddest spending spree of all.

In my brief intervention, I intend to deal mainly with the Scottish aspect. Today's figures for unemployment in Scotland are tragic. The unadjusted figure of 362,000—16 per cent. unemployment—equals the peak figure experienced early in 1983 before the Government carried out their exercise of massaging the figures later that year.

I was amused to hear the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, on the "Today" programme, chiding Mr. Brian Redhead for describing the number of unemployed as 4 million. It may not be 4 million, but it is near enough. While we may accept the official figures, it was the right hon. Gentleman who fiddled the books with regard to future figures. Thus, he was in no position to pull up his interviewer on that point.

In the last few years, the official Scottish Office propaganda has suggested that Scotland is leading the United Kingdom out of recession. Nothing could be further from the truth, as I have told the Secretary of State from time to time. Today's unemployment figure proves that beyond measure. Unemployment in the United Kingdom has risen by 122,000, but Scotland has borne about 19,000 of the total.

The spurious claim that Scotland was leading some sort of recovery was based on the fact that the proportionate rise in Scottish unemployment throughout the recession had been smaller than in the United Kingdom as a whole. That is not in the least surprising to anybody who knows anything about Scotland, because our pre-recession level was higher. Like the noble Earl of Stockton in another place a few days ago, I was not impressed by that argument. When output and unemployment statistics are analysed, it is abundantly clear that Scotland's dive into recession has been just as deep and that its present recovery is in fact less advanced.

The manufacturing base in Scotland has been almost destroyed in the last six to seven years in particular. Under the policies of the Government, neither Scottish oil nor the advent of the silicon glen has been able to replace the jobs lost. The Labour Government failed to improve the Scottish situation, but this Government have taken the failure to new depths.

When we examine the areas that should be giving Scotland a bright future, even the signs there are disturbing. Directly oil-related employment in Scotland fell by 2,700 between December 1983 and June 1984. Many firms in the oil industry in Scotland are subsidiaries of foreign companies — British, French, Dutch or Norwegian. The Norwegians know how to handle their economy and politics. Unlike Scotland, Norway has control over its vast oil resources. Unemployment, which was far lower in any case, has fallen by 18 per cent. in the past year. There are now about 16,000 unemployed in Norway. When one compares that with the situation in Scotland, one realises how much we are losing through being part of the United Kingdom set-up. Scotland would do well to emulate the Norwegian example of gaining independence as a prerequisite for a healthy and prosperous economy.

Investment in the oil industry and other industries in Scotland has come heavily from overseas, while the British Government have used the massive wealth from Scottish oil most unwisely. Instead of using it for capital investment in industry and infrastructure, they have squandered it on undesirable objects and tax cuts for the wealthy. In view of the attacks on health, education and local government expenditure, it is deplorable that that money has been consumed by tax cuts for the wealthy. The value of sterling has fallen from $1·57 in June 1983 to $1·11 now. That should provide a great opportunity to embark on an export drive which would greatly benefit Scotland, but the Government's general mismanagement of the economy has probably precluded that.

There is a social and economic crisis of tragic proportions in Scotland, and it has been growing for many years. One sign of the crisis has been the haemorrhage of skilled people through emigration, which is on an upward trend. In 1982, net migration from Scotland was 15,100. In 1983, it rose to 18,000. The crisis facing Scotland results from the fact that we do not govern ourselves and cannot control our own economy. Only Scottish independence can solve that problem for the Scottish people.

7.11 pm

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): The right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) ought by now to have accepted that the Scottish electorate has thrown out the idea of Scottish independence. It seems entirely appropriate that the Government should use the revenue from North sea oil to maintain the purchasing power of pensioners, to ensure a decent level of subsistence for the unemployed and to maintain real expenditure on the National Health Service. Those seem entirely laudable objectives.

Today's debate raises two questions. Have the Government mishandled the economy? And have the Opposition put forward any viable alternatives? Looking back over the Government's policy, I see, first, their success in reducing inflation. I hope that the whole House agrees on that. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) will recall that when he was a Treasury Minister inflation was edging towards 30 per cent. We have come a very long way since 1976.

Secondly, have we got the economy moving? The latest CBI report shows that the economy is growing quite substantially.

Thirdly—the Opposition may wish to forget this—the key dimension of the Government's objectives when they came to power in 1979 was to remove controls. They have removed all price controls, exchange control, dividend control and wages control. Those are major successes for any major Western Government. Finally, they have had some success in making British industry competitive, restoring profitability and helping entrepreneurs to succeed in this environment.

The whole House will agree, however, that the remaining challenge is that of unemployment. I do not share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) that we shall have to live with the current level of unemployment for the rest of time. Looking back over the past six years, I believe that the Government's broad strategy has been correct. When my right hon. Friend the Chancellor presented his Budget last year, I was certain and I still am certain that it was a major reforming Budget of great help to British industry, and I believe that that will continue to be the case.

Conservative Members too easily forget that the Prime Minister and the Cabinet have had to roll back 40 years of Socialism. Some of us have lived in parts of the country dominated by Socialism for 40 years. [Laughter.] Hon. Members may laugh, but the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) was not laughing because he knows what that has done to Sheffield. The results of 40 years of Socialism are all too clear in my old borough of Islington. Rolling that back takes time. Inevitably, minor mistakes are made. A recent one was the removal of the pound note. Another current mistake is the attack on the National Health Service and parts of the pharmaceutical industry by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health. But those aspects are not central to the overall situation.

What alternative policies do the Opposition propose? The speech of the Leader of the Opposition contained little of substance but much bombastic insult directed at my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Let us consider the reality of what the Opposition are offering. There is the miners' strike. Mr. Scargill, having been three times defeated by his own membership, decided that it was time to attack the democratically elected Government. He did so without a ballot because he knew that he could not win one. He set forth to challenge the Government on the basis of uneconomic pits. Three times the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) went cringing to Mr. Scargill to try to bring the parties together and three times he came away empty handed — not from the National Coal Board, which has been prepared to discuss uneconomic pits at any time, but from Mr. Scargill and his Left-wing friends.

Only in recent weeks have Labour Members voiced any objection to the strike. I have listened to all the recent energy debates and as a member of the Select Committee on Energy I have listened to the evidence of Labour Members, but not once until the past few weeks have they made any attempt to resolve the strike. Even now they will not admit that uneconomic pits will have to be closed. It was in the Labour Government's "Plan for Coal" and in their legislation, but they still refuse to accept it.

Let us consider another aspect of nationalisation. Did the Opposition spokesman on transport, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), tell the Southampton dockers that the only way to keep container traffic was to be economic and efficient? No one in the Labour party told them that. As a result, container traffic has left Southampton, major redundancies are likely and the future of Southampton as a container port has gone.

There is indeed a crisis in Liverpool and places like it, but it results from the attitude of local authorities and some trade unions in those areas. Until that attitude changes, no industrialist—British, Scottish, Welsh or foreign—is likely to go there. The sooner the Labour party realises that, the sooner it is likely to solve the unemployment problem in those areas.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in the Merseyside area, where there has been a loss of 80,000 jobs, many firms have never had a day of industrial unrest or had any strikes? The image of Merseyside seen by many people, including the hon. Gentleman, distorts the reason why Merseyside is in its present position.

Mr. Morris: I am sad to say that parts of British industry do not change or face changing realities. Unless firms provide products for today's needs there will never be high employment. The problem is that the investigators go where they are welcomed, and not to those areas where they are not welcomed.

Although the speech of the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) was coherent, it did not contain much policy. He criticised the Government for not believing in sharing profits among employees, yet my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has done more for wider share ownership than any other Chancellor since the war. I shall be disappointed if my right hon. Friend does not do more in the coming Budget.

I appeal to my right hon. Friends in the Cabinet to remember that we are an exporting nation. If I have a criticism of the Government, it is that we have lost a little of the impetus we had when we came to power in 1979. Our former colleague, Sir John Nott, was very much involved in the engine room of the Treasury, cutting out Government forms and making a drive for exports. There is a need for more impetus.

I have just spent some time in south-east Asia, and I know that British investment would be greatly welcomed in Indonesia, which is just one country that needs investment. Indonesia is crying out for further investment from Britain. There are many opportunities in Indonesia for industrial companies, including companies from Ashton-under-Lyne.

We need to re-emphasise our determination to create jobs. It is criminal that factories in my constituency in Northampton are short of skilled labour. That is unacceptable when there are 3 million unemployed, and is a sad reflection on our education and training systems. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment should push ahead vigorously to ensure that every young person takes part in training and that no young person is allowed to go on the dole. Young people should be encouraged and should be cajoled into taking a skill, as happens in Germany. No wonder the Germans are more successful that we are.

I say to my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench, for heaven's sake, carry on boldly trimming public expenditure but do not fall into the trap of doing that in a Socialist way.

Mrs. Currie: What about the Health Service?

Mr. Morris: I shall come to the Health Service if necessary. I say to my right hon. Friends who are responsible for local government and housing, stand firm. There is still excessive expenditure in Camden, Hackney, Islington and Northamptonshire. We should get tough with the Ministry of Defence. We know about the overruns of expenditure which are considered by the Public Accounts Committee. It is time a cut was made.

My right hon. Friends should push ahead with privatisation. They have had a major success with British Telecom in bringing about a private shareholders' market, and we want more of it. My right hon. Friends should also remove restrictions on overseas trade.

There is a real need to undertake a drive to remove the impediments to the private sector and not to forget the role of manufacturing industry. I do not share the views of those who believe that manufacturing industry is finished.

I do not complain about what the Treasury is doing, but I complain about the lack of consultation, sensitivity and understanding in certain Departments by certain junior Ministers. Our party needs a drive to see through our strategy and to communicate our conviction that this country will and must compete successfully in the world. There is no reason why our share of world trade should continue to decline. If we undertake that drive and build on last year's Budget—this year, we have to deal with the other half of our strategy in terms of direct tax cuts —we will complete our strategy. Now is not the time to waver. Given that consistency, confidence will return to the Conservative party, the country and the exchanges.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Conservative Members have asked whether the censure motion is justified. I believe that it is justified and necessary. I have been amazed at the mixture of arrogance and ignorance portrayed by Conservative Members about the real issues in the debate, and I am sure that people outside will note the way in which they have dealt with the motion.

Regardless of the wording of the motion, the central issue is, and will remain, mass unemployment. So far, Conservative Members have said nothing that will help to deal with that matter. The dissension among Conservative Members, which has been apparent from time to time—it was mentioned by the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) — disappeared when the censure motion was tabled by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. In recent weeks, we have seen the nervousness of Conservative Members when Government policies have affected their constituency or class interests. There have been murmurings from Conservatives about the Government's policy. No doubt those murmurings will disappear when the Division is called tonight.

Conservative Members should take on board the statement consistently made by the Opposition—that the northern regions are facing tremendous economic and social problems which appear to be totally ignored by the Government. I do not want to be parochial in a debate that concerns the whole of Britain, but hon. Members should consider what is happening in certain parts of the country. The hon. Member for Northampton, South, who talked about unemployment, should note what is happening in places such as Merseyside, the north-east, the north, Scotland and Northern Ireland. There are pockets where there are male unemployment rates of 50 per cent., 60 per cent., or 70 per cent. That is the reality in which people live today.

The facts and figures that have been bandied about today ignore the real human problem that develops from mass unemployment. Conservative Members have said nothing that shows they want the Government to alter direction in order to tackle unemployment. Unemployment has been used by the Government, especially the Prime Minister, as a battering ram against the employed. Since 1979 the Government have made it clear that their prize would be a considerable reduction in the power and rights of the trade union movement. The Government have sought to roll back not 40 years of Socialism, but 40 or more years of the advancement of the living standards of ordinary working people.

Lord Donovan, the chairman of the Royal Commission on trade union employers' associations, said that the conflict of interest at the point of production was an integral part of capitalist industry and could not be removed. Clearly, there is a conflict of interest if Labour pursues better living standards—that aim is justified—and those who own and control industry and capital pursue the maximisation of their profits. That fact should not be denied by the Conservative party which places profitability above all else.

Conservative Members argue that they are rolling back 40 years of Socialism, but I believe they are whipping back 40 years of advancement under previous Labour Governments and ignoring the role played by the trade union movement in abolishing the hyper-exploitation that existed from the turn of the century until after the war and enabled people to begin to achieve a better standard of living.

Capitalism can no longer afford to make concessions. It can no longer allow working-class people to enjoy better living standards. The Government know that the first shield against them is the trade union movement and that that must be weakened. That is the prize that the Prime Minister has been pursuing. That is why she has taken her stand against the National Union of Mineworkers.

The Government have missed the point of the NUM dispute. It is not about wages for those who are employed at the moment. It is not good enough to say that there are good redundancy payments. The Opposition have made the point—it has not been answered by the Government—about the next generation of job seekers. Who will provide them with jobs, or will they join the 3 million-plus—in reality 4 million or 5 million—who are now in the dole queue and on the scrap heap?

Nothing has been said so far from the Conservative Benches to give any hope to the youth of this country who have been completely alienated. Why do people think that in areas such as Merseyside and others drug abuse and crime are in the ascendancy? The answer does not come from the left-wing press. The current edition of Police gives details of the aftermath of Toxteth. The police say that there is a direct correlation between youth unemployment and crime and drugs. The Government disregard the consequences of that. The Opposition would be reneging on their responsibilities if they did not table a censure motion such as the one that we are debating.

The hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) mentioned new technology. Anyone who knows the writing of Tom Paine will recall that, in his book, "The Rights of Man", he said, in relation to Louis of France, that he was admiring the plumage and ignoring the dying bird. We are all aware that the new technology will come and will be beneficial, but it will be beneficial only if it helps all society, not merely those who make profits from it.

New technology offers, possibly for the first time, the opportunity for us not to rely on human resources to produce wealth. Wealth will be produced. It will allow a compassionate Government to look at the areas of poverty, but not, as the hon. Member for Honiton implied, to compel the unemployed to carry out social work. There is a tremendous amount of work to be done by human labour. Our schools, hospitals and infrastructure need human labour. The opportunity to do that work has never been as great as it is now that we have the new technology. The new technology is releasing—if I may use that word—millions of people from the need to be involved in production. That labour is lying around. Human labour is the most precious commodity that we have. It is being left to rot. The Government have made it clear that they do not intend dramatically to change their political course.

Not until we see an end to the Government will we see an end to the poverty, frustration and inhumanity of mass unemployment.

7.33 pm

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): The hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) said that the Government had done nothing for the people of Merseyside. May I point out to him as gently as possible that only this week the Ministry of Defence has placed an order with Cammell Laird in Birkenhead which will provide work for 1,000 men for three to four years? Whatever the economic rights and wrongs of that, it was regional policy in everything but name. He might at least be grateful for that aspect of Government policy. One might think that Liverpool was the only place in this country that had unemployment. The hon. Gentleman might care to remember that on my side of the River Mersey we have a higher rate of unemployment than the city of Liverpool.

I thought that the debate was about a censure motion on the Government. We have heard a number of remarks about hon. Members' own areas. I should like to try to bring back the debate to what the motion is alleged to be about. I shall be supporting the Government tonight without the slightest hesitation.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman always does.

Mr. Porter: Not at all. The Whip is an utterly unnecessary instrument for that purpose.

I support, as I have always supported, the general strategy of making the control and eventual defeat of inflation a priority. It seems to me, as it seems to the Government, that without that control none of our other economic objectives of increased competitiveness, investment and production and eventually increased employment is attainable. I shall return later to the subject of unemployment.

In offering my vote to my right hon. Friends tonight, I do not pretend that they are necessarily the acme of perfection, because all Governments make mistakes although often they are more obvious in retrospect than at the time they are made. For instance, many years ago VAT was introduced on far too narrow a base even though the exemptions and zero ratings appeared to have virtue at that time.

While the principle of broadening the VAT base is being widely canvassed at the moment — every suggestion is met with howls of indignation and gloomy forecasts of the collapse of civilised society as we know it—it strikes me, and I hope that it strikes my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench, that the long-term political and social cost of a radical revision of the present VAT arrangements would be difficult, if not impossible, to bear.

It was, in my view, an error in the Government's first term of office to raise VAT to 15 per cent., for reasons which I hope have become glaringly obvious. It is fair to say that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) pointed that out at the time. If VAT is to remain at that level to counterbalance any reduction in the standard rate of tax or to raise income tax thresholds, I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will consider raising the VAT turnover ceiling, under which VAT is not payable, to about £50,000. It would be of enormous benefit to small business and of relatively little consequence to the Treasury in terms of tax revenue.

May I deal briefly with the events which have brought about this debate and which the Opposition declare are the result of the mismanagement of the economy? It enters my mind that the latest opportunity that the Opposition had to do a bit of managing is hardly the most solid basis on which to declare that they would do any better now. It may have entered people's minds that the Government cannot do a great deal about the United States budget deficit and high interest rates, although President Reagan's inaugural speech gave me some hope that the deficit will be reduced, that interest rates will fall and that accordingly the dollar's external value will decrease.

There is not a great deal that the Government could do — if I may borrow a quote — about the irrational behaviour of the market in relation to sterling. Whether we like it or not—and we do not—the market treats sterling as a petro-currency, although the facts to a large extent gainsay that view. I believe that with the present level of the pound some of the original objections that we had to joining the EMS have disappeared. We should take a long hard look at the possible advantages of the relative stability that could flow from our joining.

As it happens, it looks as though the OPEC agreement and the Chancellor's intervention in the market, which was inevitable and might have taken place sooner, have stabilised the position, although there will probably be a further small fall in oil prices. However, as our major oilfields would still be profitable at $20 a barrel, I face that prospect with some equanimity.

The position of the past few days was a touch tricky, to say the least. It was not a crisis, as the Opposition thought.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): It was straight panic.

Mr. Porter: The Opposition certainly panicked.

There is a wide expectation that the base rates can be reduced in the near future, and the impending and inevitable end of the miners' strike can do nothing but good to the economy both in the long and the short term.

Whatever the rights and wrongs of the arguments about coal, the opinion has been widely held that the militant trade union activity had to be shown to be a total non-starter. The Government deserved the support of the country, which they got, and the congratulations of my hon. Friends, for their courage, determination and consummate skill in dealing with a totally unnecessary dispute.

That is the nice bit. The blot on the Government's escutcheon is the rate of unemployment. When I came to the House in 1979, having supported in every possible way the policy of my party in the period leading up to the election, neither I nor any other new Member nor the incoming Government expected that, almost six years later, unemployment would be at its present level.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: We said that it would.

Mr. Porter: The hon. Member for Workington has made many forecasts to his own satisfaction, but that forecast was not made.

Unemployment has risen for various reasons, many of them unconnected with the policy of the Government. We should not forget that 23·5 million people are working. A higher proportion of the population of working age is working than in any other country in western Europe except Denmark.

Even so, I am not prepared to accept that it is beyond the capacity of the Government to deal with some of the problems. The Government have a role to play. Like my noble Friend the Earl of Stockton, I am not an 1860s Manchester Liberal. That does not mean that the demand side of the equation is the only side by which the matter can be dealt with. Domestic demand can be boosted by fiscal or monetary means. However, the evidence of the past 20 years shows beyond a peradventure that the benefits of such a stimulus have been more and more quickly dissipated by accelerating inflation.

On the other hand, the efficiency of markets has not been vindicated by experience. There is not much point in exhorting workers to restrain their wage claims. That is futile. It is equally futile to ask employers to resist wage claims. However, there are methods by which Government can assist the process of re-employment. I do not pretend that I know the exact answers. No one does. However, we could do more within the general economic strategy of the Government—that is the important point —to generate employment.

If the Daily Telegraph—of all organs—is prepared to say that unemployment must not drift on, I, for one, am prepared to agree. Perhaps the Government and Chancellor will be prepared to consider all or some of the suggestions made by Mr. Andreas Whittam Smith in yesterday's Daily Telegraph. They seem sensible, because they fall within the general strategy of the Government. At the very worst, they are worthy of serious consideration. At best, they could provide positive proof that my party and our Government are concerned with the plight of the unemployed, especially in the north.

I am not prepared to contemplate the possibility of the return to office of a party which, by its performance today, has shown an inability even to understand the problems, and which has also shown its inability to control the strange and disparate elements within its own ranks. The Labour party could not run a drinks party in a brewery. On that basis alone, I would support the Government. However, I also support them for positive reasons. I support them for their success in relation to inflation, and their success over the past few years in relation to investment and productivity. I merely ask that those achievements should not be thrown away in political, social and economic terms by a failure sensibly to address the problems of unemployment.

7.45 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): It is a thing about censure debates that they start off by being one-way but after a bit become two-way. It turns out that those who censure are themselves censured. It is an examination of two sides of the question, not just one side. Nevertheless, it is the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the policies centred upon his Department that have been under censure in this debate. I had always supposed that it was not merely a courtesy but the duty of a Minister whose Department was under censure to attend the debate and hear what was to be said in criticism of him. It is only a partial justification—though it is a partial justification—that the Bench from which the censure was launched has for most of the debate been empty or nearly empty of those responsible for representing the Opposition on economic and financial matters.

One count against the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the rise in interest rates, for which he is held responsible. Certainly the Chancellor has seen himself obliged on two occasions sharply to raise the rate of interest. The reason why he did so is not difficult to discern. He has to borrow. He has to borrow on a substantial scale. He has to borrow on a scale probably larger than he envisaged when he drew up the Budget, or during most of the financial year. With the pull of interest rates and investment in the United States, if the Chancellor is to go on borrowing from the public, he must borrow at a competitive rate of interest. He shares that with those who are borrowing for other purposes and not on public account: indeed, the rise in the rate of interest offered by the Government was forerun by a rise in the rate of interest offered by the private sector. The hon. Gentleman was responding, as he was obliged to respond, to the conditions in the market for loans and for savings. I hope that he has taken from that the lesson not to rely too much upon the small percentage which the public sector borrowing requirement bears to the gross national product or to the budgetary total, but to realise that it is that element which is marginal—it is the borrowing requirement that is marginal—which exerts the leverage effect upon the policies and successes of a Government.

However, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is censured by the Labour Opposition. We have no doubt about the attitude of the Labour party to Government borrowing. They want more of it. They have advocated more of it. Borrow, borrow, borrow has been the ingeminated cry from that Bench until the House almost ached with boredom at hearing it. If this alternative, this criticism, it to be pushed home—that one ought not to put up interest rates but ought to be borrowing much more—what is the solution to the conundrum? As far as I can see, there are two possible solutions. One is not to borrow from the public but to borrow from the banks—that is to say blue it on inflation. The other is to prevent those who have savings, to lend, and are within one's powers of control, from doing anything but lend them to the Government; to create, in other words, a prison state. The counter-proposition of the Opposition to the Government's raising rates of interest in the circumstances which rendered it necessary in order to continue to fund their debt from the public is either a prescription for inflation or it is a prescription for a state in which all the elements of production, of enterprise and of savings would be controlled by an iron and centralised despotism.

We have heard a good deal today in favour of the Earl of Stockton and his period—some of it, I thought, rather mythical. But this prescription does not take us back to the good old days of Stockton. It takes us back to the good old days of Lord George-Brown, and the national plan. It is the spectre of Lord George-Brown not the beneficent, angelic presence of the Earl of Stockton, that is evoked by the prescription of those who have moved this vote of censure.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer also stands accused of having failed to control the movement of the sterling rate on the exchanges. The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), when this matter was mentioned earlier, interjected, "It is not in the censure motion." He is quite right: it is not in the censure motion. There is a reason for that. Some of us remember how the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore)—he is not here to verify it, for he made but a fleeting attendance at the debate—used constantly to complain of the high level of the exchange rate of sterling and say that the correct course of action, the manner in which to stimulate the economy, export trade and the industries involved in it, was to bring the exchange rate down. He intended to do that artificially by creating pounds and selling them on the market—that is the way in which the exchange rate of a currency is normally brought down. However, the exchange rate has fallen. It has fallen, one might almost say, beyond the dreams of the Opposition who put it forward in earlier debates as part of their recommendations. One would have thought, therefore, that, as a change from a motion of censure, there might have been a motion of congratulation to the Government on having carried out one at least of the elements in the prescription of the Opposition, in bringing down the exchange rate to a competitively low level. [Interruption.] Apparently that does not entirely meet with the satisfaction of the authors of the motion of censure.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Interest rates are too high.

Mr. Powell: If interest rates are too high, a floating exchange rate will adapt itself to relative advantages and attractions, including those created by the prevailing level of interest rates in the various countries.

Ms. Clare Short: What will happen to the British economy?

Mr. Powell: One of the interesting moments in this debate—which has not been without its longueurs—a point of great fascination was the dialogue between the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder) and the Leader of the Opposition about the alleged views of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) on the desirable level of the exchange rate of the pound sterling. The right hon. Gentleman had been accused unjustly of saying that the present rate was, in his view, "about right". It turned out that he said that it might have been "about right".

This is not merely semantically fascinating. There is a really solid point behind what might appear to be merely a difference in the voice of the verb. If the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is not sure that whatever the exchange rate of sterling happens to be today is the right one, how is he to be sure, and how does he ascertain, what is the right rate? If he says, "Well, it may be right," what is he waiting for, to know whether it is right? What he is waiting for is to see what will happen. Just as he waited to see the pound sterling fall to its present level before declaring that that might be "about right", so he reserves to himself the right and the opportunity, should it go either up or down, not be found in disagreement with—dare I say it?—the market. He accepts in fact the judgment of the market as an expression of the real world in its fixing of the terms on which we conduct our trade with the rest of the world.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that foreign exchange dealers and bankers throughout the world believe that sterling will fall to parity with the dollar by the middle of this year? Is it not incomprehensible that the Government might wish to intervene on the exchanges and prop up the pound by high interest rates in the knowledge that it will fall? Is not that the objection of British industry? We are throwing good money after bad.

Mr. Powell: I had hoped that I had carried the hon. Member with me when I explained that the motivation of the Government in raising interest rates so as to match those being offered elsewhere was to be able to continue to borrow what they required for the financing of public expenditure, and that they were not engaged in playing the exchanges. Indeed, they have almost ostentatiously abstained from playing the exchanges.

What the hon. Member for Workington says does not, however, rescue the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook because, if interest rates or prospective prices of oil are factors, as indeed they are, that enter the interplay in the market which fixes the exchange rate of the pound sterling from day to day, the trouble is that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook knows no more than any of the rest of us how those factors—all of them throughout the world—will move. Therefore, he wisely refrains from attaching himself to a dogmatic statement that such and such ought to be the exchange rate of the pound sterling but reserves to himself a safe position from which to observe what will happen and issue his blessing as and when he thinks fit.

Mr. Loyden: My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) should be a politician.

Mr. Powell: I had not regarded the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook as conspicuously deficient in those qualities with which those most hostile to politicians commonly credit us. However, I might be wrong and I am prepared to accept the judgment of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden)

If the exchange rate was not in the censure motion, a reference to the balance of payments and to our visible surplus was there. The fact that it features in the censure motion, and the form in which it features in the censure motion, show how little a major factor in the causation of unemployment has been grasped and understood by the Opposition. That we have suffered in the past five years, almost for the duration in office of the Government, from a corking surplus on current account on our balance of payments, which has in part, and perhaps preponderantly, been due to the fact that we had become an oil-producing and oil-exporting country, has been savagely inimical to the manufacturing activities of the British economy. That should—it is not the first time I have invited the House to contemplate the connection — evoke from those wishing to censure the Government some view on our approach to the surplus on current account on the balance of payments and to the part which is played in it by the oil production and oil exports of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Leave it in the ground.

Mr. Powell: The hon. Member for Workington is helpful, and suggests that we leave it in the ground. I am not, however, prepared to accept that statement of Labour policy from him. I would rather have a policy statement about British oil from the Opposition Front Bench.

This subject has been too little debated in the House. Although he is not at present in his place, I align myself with the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) in asserting the almost self-evident proposition that for this country, of all countries, to be engaged in a sustained operation to make oil, one of the major sources of energy, dearer than it would otherwise be, must be nonsensical. Whatever else is good and stimulating for the economy of this country, to have the cheapest available sources of energy must come under that description.

I ask those who censure the Government for the inevitable fact that, within our overall current account surplus, there has been a manufacturing trade deficit, if it is their view that the price of oil should be brought down? Is it their view that we should not take part in OPEC's arrangements or in any of the cartelisations, but go for obtaining oil at the lowest possible price at which it pays to explore, exploit, extract and refine it? Is that their point of view? It is a subject on which they should have a point of view, because the issue is crucially bound up with the level of unemployment in Britain.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): North sea oil is expensive because of the investment required to obtain it. Must it not, therefore, be sold at a higher price so as to get a return?

Mr. Powell: One can rarely sell at a higher price than the market price. We are engaged in keeping the world price of oil, to which we tie the price charged for British oil, way above the profit-making price for our own oil. If our oil were unprofitable at anything below the OPEC price, I would understand, though not necessarily approve of, the policy; but what the hon. Gentleman says does not fit the existing situation.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Does the right hon. Gentleman advocate the abolition of the role performed by the British National Oil Corporation in expending taxpayers' money on purchasing North sea oil at a ludicrously high price?

Mr. Powell: I am opposed to any use of public money for rigging prices. What is more, I deplore the fact that the Treasury has a vested interest in a high market price for oil. I would sooner see the price of oil, the price of energy and the price at which oil is sold in this country reduced and sacrifice the oil revenue, so that it would have to be made up in other ways to meet Government expenditure, than that we should keep that price at an artificial level, for that is a form of indirect taxation, which probably comes home to roost on our own industry and our own unemployed.

This is, therefore, a subject on which there should be a statement of views to the House from both Front Benches —certainly from those who censure the Government for their part in the present composition of the balance of payments.

Ms. Clare Short: Is it not a fact that throughout the 1960s the constraint on Britain's growth was the constraint of the balance of payments and that in the current situation we could afford to have more demand so as to reflate the economy, and not be constrained, for example, by the oil situation? That would be the way to create jobs and wealth in the economy.

Mr. Powell: I remember the period to which the hon. Lady refers. Throughout that period I used to say that we should not be constrained by the balance of payments. We were constrained by the balance of payments through our attempt to maintain a fixed parity—or, more accurately, an only occasionally altered parity — for the pound sterling. It was that which made us the slaves of the balance of payments. One of the early blessings — I hope that it will not altogether go away—of freeing the pound and allowing it to float freely is that we no longer had to read about crises in the balance of payments every morning at our breakfast tables. There is no inconsistency in the fact to which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) draws attention.

[Mr. Powell]

One proposition on oil has persistently been put forward by the official Opposition. They say, "We should have used the profits and revenue"—or rather, the revenue, for only that is within the Government's control—"from British oil to invest in Britain, but the Government have been spending it instead of investing it."

That sounds fine until one begins to examine it. Our revenues from oil have been part of the total revenues which almost, but not quite, met our total expenditure. If, therefore, it is the proposition of the Opposition that we should be using our oil revenues for investment — presumably Government-directed investment on public account—what are they really saying? They are saying that the total of public expenditure should be increased by the amount of that revenue and that, whether we hypothecate the oil revenues to it or not—hypothecated revenue is a silly game—or whether we simply continue to put the oil revenue in the Consolidated Fund, we should be spending that much more. It is mere spoof for them to say that because part of the revenue which the Government have currently spent — about which they did not complain — was derived from oil, the Government should somehow, by double counting, have been also spending that oil revenue on public investment.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), in an interesting speech which hon. Members were unlucky not to hear, made an important philosophical observation. He said that there is an asymmetry in Government, whereby Governments can do harm but cannot necessarily do good. Whether wittingly or not, he there placed his finger on the fallacy by which the Labour party is hag-ridden, the notion that because Governments have certain powers and can use them to make mistakes—to do harm, to inflict problems and troubles on their citizens—therefore they also have it in their power to do not just good generally but specific good. [Interruption.] I think I hear the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), if not others, reaffirming the credo.

I am saying that this Government have abstained, and they are still abstaining, from use of their power which would bring self-evident harm to this country — either by manipulating the exchange rate so that it no longer matches the real conditions in the world or by creating inflation and thus taxing without parliamentary authority.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: I am grateful to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) for allowing me to correct one part of my speech. Essentially what the Government have done wrong is to pursue their monetarist policies. It is that interference which has been so damaging to our economy. I pointed out that the damage of that kind which can be done is much greater than any good the Government have done.

Mr. Powell: My difference with the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne—his experience and reflection upon these matters is very wide and deep—is that he takes it to be an interference for a Government to ensure that they finance their expenditure directly and honestly, not indirectly and dishonestly by means of inflation. That is monetarism as I understand monetarism. In holding to that principle the Government have done part, at least, of the good that is in their power, and have refrained from doing that harm which all previous Governments have done and which this Government were the first resolutely to reject. For that the Government would deserve support and not censure, even if the censure which is set out in the motion could be sustained in the terms in which it is expressed. My right hon. and hon. Friends will tonight be helping to defeat that motion of censure in the Lobby.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): Order. The House will wish to know that the wind-up speeches are expected to begin at about 10 minutes past nine, so we have less than one hour. Many hon. Members still wish to speak, so I appeal again for short speeches.

8.11 pm

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): One of the great ironies of this debate is that if, on top of a strong dollar and weak oil prices, we also had the uncontrolled public spending, inflation and debts that we suffered under the Labour Government, we would now be talking about a real crisis—not a $1 pound but a 50 cent pound. It is also odd that the Opposition can whinge about the weakness of the pound on the one hand and propound policies which would weaken it still further on the other.

One of the main causes of the weakness of the pound is the perception that we are still spending too much. Even now, if the value of sterling was truly to reflect our higher inflation rates since 1976, it should stand at only 96 cents. So the fall in the pound over the past few months has its roots in the hyper-inflation of the mid-1970s — something which oil has been able to camouflage until now. The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), who is not in the House, recognised that fact not so very long ago when he called for a 30 per cent. devaluation of the pound. Now he has got it, and the Labour party is still not satisfied.

Another common theme of the Opposition is that the Prime Minister has, single-handed, put 3·5 million people out of work. I am sure that hon. Members in all parties can agree that unemployment is the key problem facing us. But, does it really help to make out that it is a problem that has suddenly arisen over the last six years? The debate turns upon whether more or less Government spending is the answer to the problem, whether a moderately tight financial policy and tax cuts will have a greater impact, or whether yet more public spending will. I am not sure whether either policy would have much effect—at least in the short term—but to find the cure for the problem it may be a good idea to look for the real causes.

For too long as a nation we have relied on the cosy markets of the Empire and the Commonwealth to keep our factories running. High inflation has further eroded our competitiveness. Some of the unemployment we suffer from today is directly related to the profligate policies pursued by the Labour Government and, indeed, all Governments in the 1970s. We are also going through a stage when the effects of new technology are causing painful adjustments which might mean net job losses in the short term. Furthermore, we as a nation have a higher proportion of women in the work force than most industrial nations. In fact, in Britain 66 per cent. of people of working age are in employment, compared with 61 per cent. in Europe.

Yet another factor which is all too often overlooked by the Opposition in their zeal to pin the blame for unemployment upon the Government is the increase in the number of people of working age. In the past six years the number of people coming up to working age has risen by 800,000. At the same time, the number of people coming up to retirement has fallen by 400,000. That is a net gain of 1·2 million people looking for jobs over the past six years. That is why we have record numbers of people in jobs at the same time as record numbers of unemployed. Even the most bigoted, rabid Leftwinger would be pushed to blame the whole of the "baby boom" on the Prime Minister.

We also have a cultural problem in this country. Too many of our best minds spurn productive industry and go into service industries. The result is that we lead the world in a great many service areas, especially in the City, but we lack good management in much of our manufacturing. Anybody who thinks that we can survive just as a service-oriented society should look at the prosperity of Germany and Japan which is soundly based upon the messy business of making things.

The key problem—not the unions, though they must take their share of the blame—is poor management in some of our industries. Too many of our vital industries have simply failed to design, produce and deliver the goods that we want at home and that we can sell abroad. British Leyland, for example, now produces only half the number of vehicles that it produced in 1970. Meanwhile its work force has been halved, and for evey job lost directly three jobs have been lost among BL's suppliers. One reason why the Consett steelworks had to close was the it had to rely upon making steel plates for the motor industry.

In too many of our industries mediocre management has led to the export not of products but of jobs. All those factors cause unemployment, but they are largely outside the Government's control. However, I am not one of those who would argue that unemployment is all the fault of extraneous forces outside Government control. On the contrary. Of course the Government can affect and influence levels of unemployment. They can cause high inflation. They can borrow money which future generations have to pay back. They can create a climate which allows extreme trade unionism to succeed. They can burden employers with national insurance surcharges. In looking for the causes of unemployment, one must not forget the pernicious effects of Socialism which has tried to make a public enemy out of business enterprise and profit. All those things, and more, cause unemployment, as the Opposition know full well.

The answer to the problem is not more Government investment. Investment in industry is at record levels and efficient companies are able to raise more money than ever before. Nor is public enterprise the answer. There is a great lie in the Socialist claim that jobs can be created merely by shifting money used for unemployment benefit into job creation. They know that unemployment benefit costs only about £5,000 a person a year. But new jobs require not just wages but buildings, equipment and, above all, products that one can sell.

The cost of so-called job creation is nearly £50,000 a person. Even jobs building roads—not something that I recall the Labour party was very keen on in the 1960s—cost about £20,000 a person. The idea that by building bridges, roads and canals we can spend our way out of the problem in a kind of latter-day new deal is totally out of date. Construction no longer involves hordes of lowly paid navvies sweating over picks and shovels. It involves massive amounts of machinery, much of it imported.

Previous experience of Government enterprise is not encouraging. The simple fact is that bureaucrats and politicians cannot run companies better than good managers and business men. No amount of Government projects or new town halls will replace a healthy manufacturing sector. "But," no doubt say the Opposition, "what about America?" Is it not ironic that President Reagan, who is their whipping boy on everything else, is held up as a model of economic rectitude by the Labour party?

Apart from all the structural differences between the American economy and ours, even now, at the height of its deficit, it is still only a shade above ours at 3·1 per cent. of GDP, and its public spending is still only 37 per cent. of its GDP while ours is 47 per cent.

It is also conveniently forgotten that the United States has experienced a real reduction in wages and tax cuts. If there is a lesson to be learnt from America, it is exactly the opposite of that which some people are currently preaching.

Surely a better example for red-blooded Socialists is France. After all, a Socialist-Communist Government came to power in 1981, pledged to spend their way out of the recession. By 1983, inflation and unemployment had nearly doubled. The result was a spectacular U-turn and the imposition of policies which some have dubbed "Thatcherite."

Earlier this month the French Prime Minister, Mr. Fabius, told the press that tax cuts would take priority over more public spending in Left-wing Socialist France—straight from the Socialist horse's mouth. Therefore, it is clear that high public spending is not the answer to unemployment. Indeed, high public spending and joblessness have gone hand in hand for the past 15 years. The Leader of the Opposition knows that full well. He knows, as Mr. Mitterrand found out, that the realities of government are somewhat divergent from the insubstantial huff and puff of Opposition and speeches at Scargillite rallies. He knows that public spending does not create jobs. Otherwise, why did he not resign when the previous Labour Government cut public spending by more in a year than we have managed to do in six years?

It is no mistake that low-spending countries tend to have the lowest unemployment. Indeed, high spending is one of the real causes of a current world recession which is a major cause of job losses today.

I have the honour to represent a constituency which consists primarily of skilled industrial workers. I know that if they are to have jobs they must supply things which people want to buy. We have many successful firms which do just that. They do not do it because of Government spending. They succeed because they are well managed, because they design and make products people want to buy and because their work forces know that to strike would be to put a grin on the faces of our competitors in France, Germany and Japan.

I cannot see that more public spending will help those of my constituents who are in work or out of it. However, I can see that to raise tax thresholds might help them. I can see that to restore incentives and enterprise might help them. I can see that the spreading of wealth through denationalisation and the sale of council houses might help them. I can further see that a policy of putting more money in people's pockets but asking them to pay for what they consume will also help them.

[Mr. Phillip Oppenheim]

We cannot reverse 30 or 40 years of decline and profligacy in a few years. There are no easy, magic solutions. Admitting that does not mean that one cares any less about unemployment. It means that we are not prepared to mislead the public and dishonestly and falsely raise the hopes of the unemployed by offering a mirage.

Surely the greatest irony of the debate is that in censuring the Government the Opposition are putting forward policies that will greatly exacerbate the problem, as they have done in the past. The country which forgets its history is doomed to re-live it.

8.23 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) is a real hard-line Thatcherite, bashing his head against the brick wall of the real world. He should go far under this regime.

Earlier this week I had positive proof that the Tories were desperate about the fall in the value of the pound. I found one outside the Chamber; it had obviously been thrown away by a Conservative, disgruntled at its fall in value. I can assure whoever lost it that it will go to an excellent cause—the miners' strike.

The miners' strike is linked with the current crisis caused by the fall in the pound and the consequent rise in interest rates. The Government are now so dependent on oil because of their fight against the miners that any discord in the international oil market sends the pound into a spin and a frenzy.

But the miners' strike is linked not only to that short-term crisis but to a much longer-term economic crisis in Britain. That crisis is a personal one for millions of people and their families—the crisis of unemployment.

The official figure of today's record unemployment is 3,340,958, but the reality is a lot worse. That is over 13 per cent. of the population. One person in seven is out of work. That is the figure for my constituency of Leyton. It may be a bit higher. Earlier this week, before the rise in interest rates, a CBI survey said that it was likely that an additional 5,000 people would be added to the unemployment list each month from now on. That is the real crisis.

For the Prime Minister to put on her Saatchi and Saatchi sympathy voice and describe that unemployment as disappointing when it is her Government who have increased it threefold and for her Back-Bench minions to gloat about such statements in today's debate is worthy of censure alone.

The miners' strike has also exposed one of the central lies that the Tory party used at the general election—its monetarist lie. It used that to justify its policy to cut social services. We have all heard the lie that we cannot afford to spend on the public services, to repair and build homes for our people, to provide decent pensions and proper schools. But we have afforded the £5 billion-plus that has been wasted on the miners' strike which the Chancellor of the Exchequer described as a worthwhile investment.

We have afforded a lot more. We have spent billions on the fortress Falklands policy, and money is still being spent. We could afford tax cuts for the rich. Indeed, the Chancellor wants to give more in tax cuts rather than invest for jobs. We intend to afford about £11,500 million for the Trident missile programme as well as other nuclear weapons. Only this last week there have been reports of getting the neutron bomb for the Army. We can afford all that and we can afford to waste our North sea oil resources in a desperate and expensive burnout to try to beat the miners. We are wasting all that money to finance the ever-growing dole queues.

All that is supposed to be a worthwhile investment. It is only such if it is put in the context of the real aims of the Government's economic strategy—to enhance and maintain their economic and political power here and abroad to keep the few, the rich and the owners of industry, in a dominant position, and the vast majority firmly in our place.

That latter job is done in the main by reductions in living standards, by worsening real pay and working conditions for those in work and the pay of those who are reliant on pensions and other benefits. It is done by cuts in the social wage and in public services which benefit people. Housing has been cut in real terms by 70 per cent. by the Government since 1979 and, according to their White Paper, they are planning another 4 per cent. reduction on top of that.

Above all, the Government have used the fear of unemployment as an economic weapon; indeed, as their main economic tool. The Government have deliberately used mass unemployment as part of their strategy. They have written off millions of men and women, whether old, young or middle aged, in their bid for power and to support their vested class interests. That is not in the interests of the British people.

To make their strategy work, they have to break all resistance to it. At present the miners form that resistance, so it is their turn to experience the Government's vicious vendetta. From the start we have heard the lies that the Government have used. For example, they said that they were not intervening in the strike. The Prime Minister planned the confrontation and has been its main protagonist. She appointed Mr. MacGregor, and he is her puppet. Last week she stepped in to stop a settlement. The Government's role in that must be plain to everyone.

The miners' strike is about unemployment. That is what fuels the miners' resistance. They are struggling to stop pit closures, to keep their jobs and to keep jobs for future generations. At the beginning of the dispute, the National Union of Mineworkers spoke about a hit list, and that was ridiculed. But the Prime Minister acknowledged its existence on television only last week when she said that she was demanding a 12 per cent. reduction in the industry. Therefore, the NUM was right, despite that vilification.

There is no other work for miners when the pits close. That is why they fight for their jobs and the industry. The miners are fighting for jobs, but the Government are fighting to get rid of jobs. Although miners have faced hardship and vilification for 11 months, 140,000 of them are still on strike. They have a fantastic network of support in communities throughout the country, including London.

The Government have nothing to offer the miners except pit closures and grinding unemployment. The Government's only approach has been to starve them and their families back to work. The Government are playing the numbers game. No doubt we shall see more of that again next week. That sort of victory, if the Government achieve it, would be shabby and shoddy. As it will only add more people to the dole queues, it will not be a victory for the British people.

The miners can produce plenty of cheap safe fuel for Britain and for people, such as pensioners, who would benefit from it. Many pensioners are suffering and dying from hypothermia this winter. The miners can produce fuel to rebuild our industry and create more employment all round. We should use our natural resources for the British people, not waste them. We should invest in jobs. Until that is done, resentment of and resistance to Government policies will continue to grow.

8.33 pm

Mr. William Powell (Corby): The Government's policy during the past 11 months, as has been articulated plainly—at least, to my ears—has been that we should produce cheap coal. The argument between the National Coal Board and the National Union of Mineworkers is whether to have an energy policy that allows us to concentrate on cheap coal — that would benefit the people whom the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) identified — or to continue to produce coal more expensively than necessary.

We have had a wide-ranging debate this evening, and there have been many notable contributions. Two themes have run through the speeches. I shall deal with the first theme. With the notable exceptions of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) and the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown), it has been as though the world began in June 1979. It did not begin then.

Hours ago, I when I listened to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) describing in bleak but undoubtedly accurate terms the plight of unemployed steelworkers, I felt bound to contemplate the reaction of unemployed steelworkers in my constituency. Their once great steelworks was identified for closure under the Labour Government and the decision to announce the closure was made by that Labour Government. Although it was plain to the workers that the great Stewart and Lloyds steelworks in Corby would close, not the slightest effort was made to provide for them after the day of the closure, when 13,000 people were to lose their jobs. Although the hon. Gentleman talked about the changes that have occurred in the steel industry, in Sheffield it is preposterous for him to blame it, as he has done, on my right hon, and hon. Friends.

Last year saw the conjunction of two factual events in the United Kingdom, which had not previously occurred in my lifetime, nor in the lifetime of a growing number of hon. Members. All my life I have been told that as a nation we should aspire to high growth and low inflation in the conduct of our economic policy. That is now perfectly self-evident to me. Last year, for the first time, we had a growth rate slightly higher than the average of our major competitors, and an inflation rate slightly lower. We achieved that for the first time, albeit only by a narrow margin, but at least we are coming near to our targets.

I expected from the Leader of the Opposition a different line of approach. I expected him to say, "Congratulations. You are getting into the target area. You have made that progress for the first time. The only censure that we can pass on you is that we are not convinced that your plans and intentions for consolidating that progress are sufficiently serious." If that had been the Opposition's line of approach, at least there would have been a respectable argument.

I shall now deal with the second theme. Not one Opposition Member urged the growth of our competitiveness in the markets. All hon. Members can describe the effects of unemployment. However, when one analyses how it has come about, it is clear that during the 1960s and 1970s, for a combination of reasons, we lost our competitiveness in world markets. British Leyland did not lose its position in the world when the pound rose to $2·40 or $2·20. It was on the rack long before that happened.

One after the other our once great industries have been destroyed because our policies have not ensured that they remained competitive. It does not matter how much we spend or what laws we pass; unless we have competitive industries, there will be no jobs in the future. I would have expected from the official Opposition an indictment of the Government's policies on improving competitiveness, and to have heard their ideas for fulfilling that task. I heard not a word.

The general thrust of the Opposition's policies would lead to a further loss of competitiveness. Therefore, their policies are a recipe for disaster, not for the restoration of the economy.

Much has been said about demand, which has been increasing sharply. In 1983, cash demand increased by about £6 billion, but British industry was able to satisfy only £3 billion of that. The other £3 billion was satisfied by imports. If we are to compete in world markets and exclude those imports, we must either create a fortress Britain or beat the competition by making more reliable products at a better price than those made by our competitors. The brutal truth, if one takes the example of the motor car industry, is that many Opposition Members talk about the glories of that industry, but then go out and buy cars that are manufactured abroad. It is time that such nonsense was stopped.

As my right hon. Friends decide how to consolidate the priceless conjunction of events last year and to increase the foothold that we gained, they should concentrate on several factors. One of those—here I agree entirely with the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell)—is the price of energy and oil. The right hon. Gentleman said it far more clearly and eloquently than I could, but I must say that one of our primary national interests is to have the cheapest possible energy. Any policy that seeks a higher price for energy than we need to pay is positively insane. I commend to all hon. Members the right hon. Gentleman's analysis of energy prices. I hope, as he does, that it will become the subject of closer examination and debate. It is insane to try to prop up the price of oil when it would naturally fall. We have no interest in high oil prices.

I hope that my right hon. Friends will address two other matters as they develop their policies in the coming weeks and months. The first is the poverty trap. When I came to the House 18 months ago, I was the Conservative Member with the highest number of unemployed people in his constituency. Although the number has decreased, and will continue to do so, I still represent many thousands of unemployed people. It is noticeable that Britain has a system of tax thresholds and social insurance benefits which means that a family man must earn a substantial wage before he is better off in work than out of work. I have no doubt that hundreds of my constituents examine the equation whether it is worth their while to work when they are offered work.

[Mr. William Powell]

We can do many things, but the most important is to tackle income tax thresholds and national insurance contributions. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has talked about tax cuts in the context of raising thresholds. The Government have managed to raise thresholds during their period in office, but they have not done enough. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor would be the first to agree with that proposition. What my constituents want more than anything is an end to the system of income tax thresholds and social security benefits that makes it extremely unprofitable for them to work, unless they are to be paid a very large salary. It is an extremely serious problem. It is no good Opposition Members saying that the solution to poverty is substantially to increase social insurance benefits. That would only make the poverty trap worse—[Interruption.] I know that Opposition Members do not like what I am saying, but as I have to listen to them day after day, perhaps they would be courteous enough to listen to me.

Another matter on which my right hon. Friends should concentrate is that, during the years, the House has deliberately tried to increase the cost of employment. It has imposed taxes and laws that make it more expensive to employ people. If we had no unemployment that might be a sensible policy, but for years we have pursued policies that favour capital over labour, and we have made laws that price people out of jobs. If we are to reduce unemployment, we must have a bonfire with all those restrictions. The old Conservative slogan was, "Set the people free." There is no better way to set the people free than to loosen the bonds that make it difficult for employers to take on workers and that encourage them to move in the direction of capital investment. Last year's Budget was the first to take steps to redress that balance and to make it more sensible for people to employ labour than to employ capital unprofitably.

Although the great Corby steelworks is closed, steel tubes are still made there on two production lines. One was installed in the 1930s by Stewart and Lloyds, and the other — highly mechanised — was established in the mid-1970s, when money was available for investment in steel. It is still an extremely impressive sight. When I visited the plant I saw how well the new line worked. When I saw the old production line, it was obvious that many more men were working on it. I asked, "When will you install the new process here?" British Steel told me, "We will not do that because we cannot justify the investment. We would never get any return." In the 1970s, unprofitable and stupid capital investment was made at the expense of labour. That has been the story in many areas of the British economy. I urge my right hon. Friends to do everything possible to ensure that such nonsense and contradictions are finished for good.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell). He may have thought that we were not listening to him, but we were, with great interest. We are not obliged to agree with what he said, but I congratulate him on the way in which he put his speech over. He mentioned high growth and low inflation. We have neither high growth nor low inflation. The growth that we have is due entirely to the pull back in the United States economy as a result of borrowed money. As for low inflation, the inflation rate will rise shortly because of the increase in bank rate and in mortgages.

The hon. Member for Corby and I came into the House together after the election on 9 June 1983. He may have been in the House, as I was, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke in the debate on the Queen's Speech in 1983. If I may borrow a phrase used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer then, I too was in at the birth. He was talking about the birth of the medium-term financial strategy mark I. I was in at the birth of the medium-term financial strategy mark II. My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) defined the medium-term financial strategy mark I. It was aimed at bringing down the rate of inflation and creating conditions for a sustainable growth in output and employment. Throughout the debate Conservative Members have congratulated themselves on the reduction in the rate of inflation. Few have referred to sustainable growth; few have referred to output and few have referred to the strides which the Government should have made on employment.

I ally myself briefly with the remarks of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). The policies of the Chancellor are under attack. Many of us would have expected to see him in the Chamber for longer than he has been here. I am grateful for the fact that he is here now. I hope that he will listen with care and attention to what I have to say.

It was the Chancellor himself who proudly proclaimed that he had been the architect of the medium-term financial strategy; that he had laid the foundation stone and had poured the concrete. In the debate on the Queen's Speech, he described that strategy as a framework for sound financial policy. What he really meant — he was too modest to say so—was that he would continue wringing inflation out of the economy at the cost of jobs. On Teesside we are still feeling the effects. In the 10 days between 1 January and 10 January we lost 1,000 jobs.

The Chancellor emphasised a theme referred to by the hon. Member for Corby — competition. He said that there would be competition where none had existed before; that it would encourage the development of a more flexible and responsive economy; and that it would improve the working of the markets. As we know, the markets have been the Chancellor's lodestone. He has come back to them more and more often during the first parliamentary year of his Chancellorship. It would be for the markets to be impressed by the reduction in the growth of money supply and the public sector borrowing requirement. Both, of course, are deflationary. Both detract from growth. Even the definition of money supply itself would be altered to accommodate the Chancellor's vision of the future. He announced that he had extended the medium-term financial strategy to embrace narrow as well as broad monetarist aggregates.

The weaknesses of the Chancellor's strategy were apparent even during the debates. As Napoleon once said, a chain is as stong as its weakest link. Curiously, but disastrously, the exchange rate would have no role to play in the new medium-term financial strategy. Exchange rate policy was Keynesian and the Chancellor of the Exchequer wanted nothing to do with Keynes or Keynesians. At the time the Chancellor was not aware that in her handbag the Prime Minister carried the Keynesian White Paper of 1944 on employment. The White Paper called for a high and stable level of employment, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) pointed out earlier.

Those who live by the markets will fall by the markets, a fact which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not grasped. Although he may wash his hands of the British economy, letting the markets take the strain, should they not share the Chancellor's confidence, and should they not believe in his policies, all this will rebound to his discredit. That is what we have seen over the last two or three weeks. We have seen what has happened when there is no policy on exchange rate. One unforeseen consequence of the Chancellor's failure to have an exchange rate policy is that the market has devised one for him—the pound is now oil-related and, therefore, subject to what is happening or not happening wherever OPEC Ministers happen to be.

The oil-related economy was mentioned by the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) in an interesting speech. I sought in vain to intervene during that speech. He referred consistently to the fact that the Labour Government borrowed money in 1974-75 and that the Conservative Government in 1979 began to pay it back. As I tried to tell him before, all Governments in the Western world, faced with a fourfold increase in the price of oil, borrowed money to sustain the standard of living of their people. We based our policy on repaying that money as North sea oil came on stream. It was the Conservative Government who fulfilled the policy laid down by the Labour Government in 1974-75.

The other unforeseen consequence, which has been referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), is that if there is no policy for the exchange rate the market will create one. It created a second strand—that the exchange rate should be one dollar to the pound. Therefore, it will depress sterling still further. The Chancellor's knowledge of the market is abysmal. Everyone knows that the value of anything on the market is the price arrived at between a buyer and a seller acting independently. Therefore, in a free and open market —we can go back to Adam Smith on this—that is the value of that article.

It is useless for the Prime Minister to say to the nation on "Woman's Hour", in her best dulcet tones, that the pound is undervalued, or for the Chancellor to say that the markets are distorted. The right hon. Gentleman's failure to understand the markets and his blind faith in them is an abdication of responsibility. The way that he has washed his hands of responsibility and his monumental ignorance would make even Pontius Pilate blush.

The Prime Minister referred to those who had been able to buy their own council houses. She did not refer to those who, because of the hike in the mortgage rate, find that they are not able to pay for those houses. She did not refer to the people on council estates in Middlesbrough whose dwellings are not being improved because of the lack of improvement grants, or to the people desperately in need who will be deprived of housing because of Government cutbacks. Those people will not appreciate the Prime Minister's comments.

As I said earlier, 1,000 jobs have been lost on Teesside since the beginning of the year. What do we tell a small business man who has set up on borrowed money under the Tory Government and who now cannot pay back the interest, let alone the capital? Does he draw any comfort from the fact that General Electric is cash rich and is profiting from high interest rates? What about the importers who see the cost of their imports rising, not because there is an increase in the value of the merchandise but because the financial market has been allowed to run rampant because the Chancellor has said that there is no exchange policy? The Government have consistently turned their back on joining the European monetary system. We hear hints that possibly when conditions are right we shall be moving into it. Why are the Government reluctant to use the concerted intervention agreed with the other leading industrial nations in Washington last week? Perhaps the Chancellor will answer that.

Why should the British people, six years into a Thatcher Government, have their living standards cut? Why should their job prospects be diminished? Why should they feel the evil hand of insecurity stretching towards them? Why should they have to fret and worry about a future for their children?

The Chancellor has turned his back on the British people. His fixation with monetary targets and public spending restrictions, and his desire to reduce inflation at the expense of unemployment, has not worked—even by his standards. The high value of the dollar feeds inflation into the system, as do high interest rates. The consequence is that inflation cannot be kept down and unemployment will rise still further. The Chancellor's own policies, by his own standards, have failed. The markets have not let the Chancellor down. Neither OPEC nor the City of London has let the Chancellor down, rather it is his failure to annunciate a proper policy.

John Bunyan wrote "The Pilgrim's Progress." I looked that up, but I was thinking of "The Rake's Progress". In this instance, the rake is the Chancellor of the Exchequer. His policy has raked the progress of these islands. It has left behind it unemployment, insecurity, lower living standards, poorer health care and tougher social security regulations, and those who are in work have to work longer hours for less money. Union rights have been degraded and diluted. Civil liberties and civil rights have been eroded. That is all happening because of the rake and his progress.

I tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Government that this nation will be a better nation when the rake's progress is over, when he is no longer at No. 11, when his Government are no longer in power and when they are consigned to the oblivion which they all so richly deserve.

9.1 pm

Mr. Michael Knowles (Nottingham, East): Many hon. Members have predicted that we shall never have full employment again. I do not believe that. Vast structural changes in society are taking place, but historically whenever there are changes in technology we have full employment again. That has happened before, and that is what is happening now.

The difficulty is that the attitudes of the old society are carried through to the new society. In Britain's industrial society the attitudes of the agricultural society did untold damage. That was true of all parts of that society. If I had more time, I could cite many instances. Perhaps the new shape of our society will mean a service rather than an industrial economy, but it will still provide jobs for all our people.

We must cut the size of government. I do not believe that we should keep it the same size; we should govern more efficiently. We need to cut down. I recommend the

[Mr. Michael Knowles]

Chancellor to consider zero-based budgeting so that we do not just take last year's programmes and estimates and top up. Officials love that. We must examine the programme and ask whether we really need it. It is not a case of saying "That would be nice." We must ask "Do we really need it? If we do not, it has to go." That is the only way to get enough manoeuvring room to cut taxes.

Many hon. Members have spoken of the evils of unemployment. If one has not suffered the sheer terror for oneself and one's family one cannot really know what it means. Unemployment is terrifying. I suppose that I am not the only hon. Member who has suffered unemployment. It is not something that I shall forget. People say that there is a trade-off between employment and inflation. Unemployment affects an individual and his family. It is terrifying for them. Inflation erodes the moral basis of society because it is nothing more than the state stealing money from people's pockets.

An inflation rate of 27 per cent. was indefensible. So is 5 per cent. inflation. I shall not be satisfied until we bring it down to zero. Nothing else is acceptable because inflation undermines the fabric of society. That is the difference between unemployment and inflation. That must be made crystal clear. The Government's aim must be to destroy inflation and to squeeze it out of our economy and our country once and for all.

9.4 pm

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): When we have the highest real interest rates since the 1930s, the highest rate of unemployment since the 1930s, a trade balance of only £200 million and all the North sea oil is being exported, it is simply not good enough for the Prime Minister to seek to persuade us and the country that the Government do not deserve censure. The record levels of real interest rates will cause a further rise in unemployment on top of an already unacceptably high level. The official figure is given as just over 3 million, but we know that with the 500,000 who are on special employment schemes and those who have been taken off the employment register by the Government's measures, the unemployment figure is 4 million. Hon. Members who represent constituencies in the north-east, the north-west and other regions of the country know that that means that half the residents in street after street are unemployed, with a level of unemployment at 50 or 60 per cent. in many wards.

It is not good enough for the Prime Minister to seek to give a gloss that there is nothing wrong and that the Government's strategy is working. The Government have been in office for five years. When will we see an end to the present high levels of unemployment? They have been reached because the Government have been pursuing a restrictive fiscal policy and a restrictive monetary policy. The Government have been screwing down the economy so hard that it has not been able to expand in the way that other economies in the western world have expanded. If the Prime Minister and her colleagues would only examine the way in which our competitors in the world have been behaving in the last few years, they would see the key to the success which those competitors have achieved.

I agree very much with the Conservative Member who said that the failure of the Government has been their lack of competitiveness against industries overseas. The Government have done nothing to increase the competitiveness of British industry through their fiscal and monetary policies. I acknowledge that they have done something to make British industries face the realities of life, and I support what they have done in that regard. However, the Government have not provided the economic background against which industry can thrive and compete with our major competitors in Germany and Japan.

We want from the Government a rethink of the economic strategy that they have been pursuing. We want to see the Government pursuing a much less restrictive policy than hitherto so that expansion can get under way. We want to see our industries becoming more competitive and growth taking place at a faster rate than in the past in order to bring down unemployment.

If the Chancellor had not been so hung up on the monetary and borrowing targets that he set himself, the latest crisis which has given rise to the censure motion might never have occurred.

The Government have adopted an ambiguous attitude towards the exchange rate, the oil price and the oil depletion of the country, and they know that pay rates in the private sector are rising to a level that will make industries less competitive and our economy more vulnerable. The Chancellor has no policy on these matters. All he can do is offer exhortations to industry that rates of pay should come down.

We have made clear our belief that, if the Chancellor were to relax his borrowing strategy and his monetary strategy, it would be possible to start some growth in the economy so long as he maintains a right monetary policy to avoid inflation taking off again. If pay continues to increase in the private sector at current levels, the Chancellor and his Government will have to be prepared to act unless unemployment is to continue increasing. It is no good having an ambiguous exchange rate policy and an ambiguous policy on oil and on pay. That is a recipe for disaster.

I hope that the censure motion and the support expressed for it will give rise to some second thoughts by the Government on the policies that they have been pursuing for the last five years. Unless the Government have second thoughts, there is no hope of our reducing the 4 million figure over the next two or three years, and not only the Government but the whole country will rue the consequences.

9.9 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): The conduct of Tory Back Benchers at the beginning of the debate did more to rehabilitate the reputation of football hooligans than anything that has happened for a long time. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where are they now?"] The football analogy is exact. Having realised from today's shameful unemployment figures that they had an impossible position to defend, they decided to disrupt the proceedings.

Nothing, however, can change the facts. Unemployment stands at the highest level in our history. Shamefully, all that the Prime Minister had to say about that was, "Don't blame me." That was not always her view of prime ministerial responsibility. Before she became Prime Minister she believed that Prime Ministers had the power to act and ought to do so. In April 1979 she said in Birmingham:

"There is nothing inevitable about rising unemployment".

I did not hear her express that sentiment today. A month later, in Bolton, she added a stricture which everyone who heard her today will applaud. She said:

"The Government likes to blame every ill and error on world trends in the face of which they are powerless."

Yet that was exactly her own claim today.

The Prime Minister was absolutely right when she said that she had never predicted that unemployment would fall. The Chancellor, however, has continually and consistently done so, in the general election campaign and most recently in Leicester at the end of last year. The Prime Minister did not repudiate her right hon. Friend at that time, and she simply hides behind his bogus forecasts now.

The Prime Minister's amendment asks the House to support what it describes as the Government's "firm action to maintain the sound financial conditions and medium-term strategy".

That is as near as it comes to mentioning the collapse of sterling, the consequent rise in interest rates to the highest level in our history, unemployment, which——

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon) rose——

Mr. Hattersley: Having sacrificed a little of what is normally Opposition time, I am prepared to give way to some extent, but not in the middle of a sentence.

I was about to remind the House that, on the Government's own doctored figures, unemployment now stands at 3,341,000. If the figure had been calculated on the honest basis that was current until the Government decided to massage the statistics, it would now be 3,728,000.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The right hon. Gentleman seeks to lay the blame for the present high unemployment at the door of the Government, implying that the Labour party has policies which would dramatically reduce unemployment. Will he be good enough to tell the House with precision what those policies are? If the Labour party has no credible policies, or indeed no policies at all, in seeking to make a debating point the right hon. Gentleman is practising a cruel deception on the unemployed.

Mr. Hattersley: That is the last gross abuse of an intervention to which I shall give way, but I shall answer the hon. Gentleman's question directly. To start with, we would spend the £1·5 billion which the Chancellor proposes to give away in tax cuts on direct job creation by investment in the infrastructure. Not only would the Labour party do that. Half the Tories below the Gangway would do the same, and I am delighted to see some of them nodding assent.

I return to the Prime Minister's amendment, which refers to "firm action". I hope that the Chancellor will tell us to what "firm action" the amendment refers. For instance, was it the "firm action" characterised by the two weeks of indecision before 11 January? Was it the firm briefing given by the Treasury on 12 January saying that the Government would not intervene? Was it the firm briefing given by No. 10 Downing street saying that the Government would not intervene? Was it the firm way in which the Chancellor intervened to increase interest rates in three nervous instalments, two of which did not work? Perhaps "firm action" is even the firm way in which the Chancellor persists in confusing the markets about his impressions and therefore undermining confidence.

So that the right hon. Gentleman may at last remedy that error, I ask him again: will he concede that the policy of the free float of sterling has now been abandoned? We all know that that policy has been abandoned and that it will be in the interests of sterling stability for the Chancellor to say so, but he will not acknowledge that change in policy, because what is good for the economy requires a formal denial of Tory dogma. It requires the right hon. Gentleman to say in public that the whole free market philosophy has failed. The Government now intervene to determine the exchange rate and now manage domestic interest rates, invariably upwards—upwards on 11 January, 13 January and on 28 January to the highest level of real interest in this country's history.

I concede at once something which the Prime Minister certainly never conceded when she was in opposition—that uncertainty about oil prices and the frenetic behaviour of the markets puts great pressure on our economy. However, it is the Government's proclaimed policy to allow those frenetic markets, and those markets alone, to determine sterling's value. The Government cannot convincingly bleat about the behaviour of the market's irresponsibility, while insisting that the exchange rate should be determined by those irrational markets, and those irrational markets alone, especially when the Government have added to the uncertainty, first, by refusing to confirm that there is any exchange rate for which they will stand and fight, and, secondly, by encouraging the markets to believe that the Government positively welcome depreciation because the increased size of the fiscal adjustment that depreciation brings about will provide more room for the tax cuts which are politically so necessary to the Government and their supporters.

The self-inflicted wounds of the last month are wholly characteristic of the Chancellor's economic performance. For the past three weeks he has been running about like Corporal Jones in "Dad's Army", hysterically crying, "Don't panic, don't panic. There is nothing to worry about." The right hon. Gentleman has behaved like that throughout his stewardship.

In the medium-term financial strategy, this Chancellor and his predecessor set the Government targets which the Government have constantly failed to achieve. The money supply consistently exceeds the Chancellor's intention. Public expenditure has been off course for four of the last five years, and it is now higher than when the Conservative party came to office. In fact, the Chancellor constructs his own hurdles, trips over them, falls flat on his face and then complains bitterly when international opinion notices what happens. Having made those blunders,

"Their favourite . . . excuse is that their appalling record is all due to the oil crisis and the world-wide economic depression."

I have taken those words from the 1979 Conservative manifesto.

Let us look at the Government's appalling record as described in our motion. We have the highest level of unemployment and the highest level of interest rates in British history and the worst deficit in manufacturing trade since the industrial revolution. We could have added to our motion

"the highest level of taxation and the highest level of company liquidations in British history."

The Government's answer to those charges comes in three humiliating parts — first, it is not their fault; secondly, some things have gone well; and, thirdly, it will all come right in the end. Let us look at each of those excuses. Let us examine what has gone right as listed in the amendment, starting with "record output". That means that output is now rather higher than it was in 1979. Every Government since the war have increased output, except, that is, the first Thatcher Administration. In the past five years output has increased by 3 per cent. In the Labour Government's last five years it went up by 8 per cent. No doubt the Chancellor will tell us that the mining dispute is part of the reason for the current year's poor output. I think this part is right. That is why the Prime Minister should be assisting a solution to that dispute, rather than prolonging it for political reasons.

Secondly, the Government talk about record investment. That is true, but only if they talk about gross investment, rather then net investment. Net investment has been lower in every year of Conservative government than it was in any year of the previous Labour Government. In machinery, construction and transport — job-creating sectors—investment is now negative. Such selective use of statistics hardly strengthens the Prime Minister's case, nor does the Prime Minister's pathetic insistence that she deserves credit for reduced inflation but none of the blame for rising unemployment. Honest people know that the two trends cannot be separated.

The Government's inflation record is the statistical success that the Prime Minister describes, but prices have been held down by depressing the economy, by the intentional creation of unemployment, by the abandonment of regional aid, by the assault on local authority spending, by the destruction of the public sector building programme, by first allowing exchange rates to rise absurdly to a point where they prejudiced exports and then allowing them to collapse to the point where it was necessary to impose a massive increase in interest rates to prevent a major sterling crisis.

Over the past five and a half years, whenever the Government have had to make a choice between the real economy of work and jobs and the theoretical world of the medium-term financial strategy, they have always chosen theory in preference to the needs of the real economy.

The Government have justified their choice, as the Chancellor did yesterday, by insisting that the policies which have increased unemployment by over 2 million will soon begin to bring unemployment down. I therefore ask the Chancellor a simple question: when will that begin to happen? When will his certainty that the pursuit of the magic numbers enshrined in the medium-term financial strategy begin to produce the result that he has promised? How, as that strategy has gone so wrong for so long, can he have the effrontery to ask the people of this country to believe that one day all the indications will change, all the auguries will be different and all the results will be as he pretends?

There are people in this country who are not prepared to wait for as long as the Chancellor demands. It is convenient and comfortable for him at lunch or dinner in London to say that soon, as long as we are patient, unemployment levels will decline, but for the men and women in the north of my constituency, where adult unemployment is now running at more than 50 per cent., it is not such a conveniently comforting assurance, when we do not know when and do not believe that, the promises will be kept. The assurance is not comforting, in particular because we know that there is an alternative, in terms of unemployment. That alternative involves two things. It involves, first, what the Prime Minister used to deride as bogus jobs, but now euphemistically calls the measures —the conscious, considerate and continuous attempt by the Government—to provide direct forms of employment.

Secondly, it involves the Government using what money is at their disposal for investment in projects which are desirable in themselves and will directly create jobs.

When we debated the topic some weeks ago, the Chancellor said that his criticisms of a call for more public investment were based on the insistence that public investment must in itself be worth while. I believe that it is worth while to end homelessness, to end overcrowding and to rebuild slums. I believe that it is worth while to improve the decaying roads of our great cities and to renew the sewers which are literally collapsing under those cities. I believe that it is worth while, as well as investing in those great capital projects, to employ extra men and women in our social services to provide those aspects of life which make ours a civilised, compassionate and decent society. As well as being worth while in terms of social objectives, such expenditure would have the net result of creating jobs.

The Chancellor still has to defend his stubborn persistence in saying that what money is available will be spent not on job creation but on the reduction of direct taxation. I share the view that there are people at the bottom of the income scale who should pay no tax at all. If he wanted to, the Chancellor could find the money to help them by a simple process of fiscal redistribution.

What has happened during the right hon. Gentleman's chancellorship and that of his predecessor? The major tax benefits have been given to the families living on £18,000 a year or more. I tell the Chancellor, and all those who want hope for the prospects for employment, that even within the parameters of his policy he could spend £1·5 billion on job creation and, via a little redistribution—offensive to the right hon. Gentleman philosophically, but right for the nation as a whole—take the members of the lower income groups out of tax.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Will the right hon. Gentleman be less coy this evening and tell us what he meant when he referred on 15 January, when we last debated unemployment, to the need for "a massive boost in demand".—[Official Report, 15 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 204.]
Can the right hon. Gentleman give us some figures?

Mr. Hattersley: I did so at the time, but I will gladly do it again. I began by making a crucial moral point. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] There are 3,700,000 unemployed men and women who may consider that morality is involved in the situation. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] The moral point is that, according to the Chancellor's parameters as they were before the latest crisis, there was £1·5 billion to be disposed of. I said that I would prefer to use that money to increase the number of jobs rather than to reduce taxation.

I went further. The Chancellor was proposing to reduce the PSBR by £1·5 billion. I said that since our public borrowing was on a smaller scale than that of many of our successful competitors, I did not believe that making that cut—the Chancellor's choice—would be as likely to do the right thing by the economy as would using the money for the other puposes that I have described. I could not have been much more specific.

I believe that the specific question that I have asked the Chancellor — and which I shall continue to ask him between now and the next general election—will not be answered either in general or in specific terms. When are the right hon. Gentleman's policies for reducing unemployment likely to show any result? That is my question. We all know that he will not answer it because he cannot, for the simple reason that the Government propose to fight the next election with unemployment standing at or about 3 million. The new policy on unemployment is to wring hands, counterfeit concern and say that it is not the Prime Minister's fault.

I do not ask the Prime Minister to care about the hardship and suffering that the Government have caused. To do that would be to expect her to act entirely out of character. However, I ask her to accept the economic consequences of the level of unemployment which, in truth, is nearer 4 million than 3 million. I ask her to concentrate especially on one of the consequences—the dissipation of the oil revenues.

Last year, the Government's receipts from oil were about £10 billion. Without them, Britain would have been literally bankrupt. The Chancellor will speculate, as will the House, on what would have happened to the public sector borrowing requirement without the boon and uncovenanted benefit of oil. The House will consider what would have happened to the Chancellor's entire public spending programme had there not been oil revenues on which to rely. I hope he will remember that the cost of unemployment, in benefits paid and tax forgone, was somewhere between £15 billion and £17 billion last year. The whole North sea oil bonus is not so much swallowed up by the cost of unemployment as swallowed up by the cost of the extra unemployment that has been created since the right hon. Lady became Prime Minister.

If the Chancellor responds in his normal fashion——

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: Certainly not. The hon. Gentleman has been notably absent, apart from the shouting parts of our debate, and I do not propose to give way to him. I propose instead to ask the Chancellor to answer two specific questions. First, why does he persistently choose to use North sea oil revenue to pay the cost of unemployment rather than to create the new jobs that would reduce unemployment? Secondly, why is he so surprised, indeed affronted and offended, when he discovers that the international markets regard Great Britain as a one-commodity economy? He was not in his place when two of his hon. Friends said that that judgment was justified and went on, quite rightly, to explain that the significance of oil revenues is not their size as a proportion of national income but our total dependence on them for survival.

Instead of being used to create a buoyant manufacturing industry, the oil revenues have been used as an alternative to manufacturing industry and to compensate for the destruction of that industry which has been planned by the Government.

Mr. Marlowe: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: I think that the hon. Gentleman understands words of one syllable. No.

Under the Conservative Government, by an extraordinary paradox, instead of making us more prosperous, oil revenues have made us more vulnerable. They have made us more vulnerable because the Government have persisted in using them for the wrong things rather than to expand, increase and improve our manufacturing base. Until the Government go, the vulnerability will remain. It will be reflected time after time in the periodic crises such as we endured last autumn and which we have endured again this month. It will result, while the Chancellor remains in office, in panic reaction. Above all, it will result in a panic reaction that requires the Chancellor to take all of the alternatives that conform to his view about monetary aggregates, the public sector borrowing requirement and the demands of the medium-term financial strategy and therefore woefully, cynically and intentionally to neglect and deny the interests of the unemployed. That is why we censure him and the Government tonight.

9.35 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): The debate was opened by the Leader of the Opposition with a speech—the only one of its type that I had ever heard from a Leader of the Opposition—which began with a rambling introduction and went straight into an inconsequential peroration with nothing in between. [Interruption.]

The right hon. Gentleman commented on recent events. He spoke of speculation in the foreign exchange markets and said that it had been exactly the same with the privatisation of British Telecom. He was saying that the 2 million people—2 million of our fellow countrymen, the vast majority of them small shareholders—who had bought British Telecom shares were speculators.

Mr. Kinnock: The Government are selling the country out.

Mr. Lawson: The only people who are selling the country out are the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends. [Interruption.]

In the British Telecom share privatisation small shareholders were given a choice between vouchers for reductions on their telephone bills or a discount, in effect, if they were prepared to hold the shares for three years, and two thirds of them chose the discount and to hold the shares for three years, yet the Leader of the Opposition calls those people speculators. He does not have the first idea—[Interrruption.]

The development of share ownership in Britain by the people of the nation has been one of the most important political and social developments for a long time, building on our success in the encouragement of home ownership through the sale of council houses.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): The right hon. Gentleman has been talking about privatisation and members of the public buying shares. What is his answer to the now well known fact that with the exception of British Telecom, in all other privatisation measures, 86 per cent. of the people buying shares sold them within four weeks of purchase—

Mr. Lawson indicated dissent.

Mr. Ewing: It is no good the right hon. Gentleman shaking his head in dissent. In the case of British Telecom, 40 per cent. of those buying shares sold them in the first week they held them.

Mr. Lawson: To regard the 2 million people who bought shares in British Telecom as an exception must be considered a most strange kind of exception. The hon. Gentleman's figures are wrong and the vast majority of employees in those companies bought and hold the shares.

The link between speculators and British Telecom is clear, at least in the mind of the Leader of the Opposition, because he said that the speculation that had taken place and the turmoil in the foreign exchange markets was all the fault of Mr. Alexander Graham Bell and the invention of the telephone. [Interruption.] That is what the right hon. Gentleman said and he said that the Government had to do something — presumably cut all the telephone wires. [HON. MEMBERS: "Get on".] The Government indeed had to do something, and they did. They acted, raised interest rates, and the market has turned. The right hon. Gentleman and Labour Members are squirming .

The Leader of the Opposition said that if the Labour Members were to come to office, they would reimpose exchange control. [Interruption.] That is what the right hon. Gentleman said and I think I see him nodding in assent. Obviously he has not read what the deputy leader of the Labour party said in The Sunday Times on 13 January. Putting forward his own bizarre programme for confiscating the assets of pension funds—which belong to millions of pensioners—the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said:

"Re-introducing the system amounts to starting again from scratch and is literally impossible."

So perhaps the two right hon. Members, one of them advocating the reintroduction of exchange controls, the other saying that it is literally impossible, ought to get together.

Mr. Hattersley: Even for the Chancellor that is a most corrupt distortion. [Interruption.] If he were to read the introduction and give an honest interpretation of it to the House he would acknowledge that what I am clearly saying is that exchange control is necessary and essential and that has to be introduced in a new form.

Mr. Lawson: The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said:

"Continuing existing exchange controls is a simple enough operation. Re-introducing the system"— that is what is at issue here—

"amounts to starting again from scratch and is literally impossible".

Since the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had no alternative policy whatever to put forward he suggested that we might follow the advice of the Earl of Stockton, who in turn had suggested that we might follow the advice of the United States. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman does not know what is the policy of the United States. Therefore I shall inform him. The policy of the United States — [Interruption.] the right hon. Gentleman will say whether this is what he is advocating — is strict monetary control. They are the most monetarist Government in the western world today because they are the only Government who believe that monetary control will do it all without worrying about the fiscal deficit. The United States is cutting public expenditure and taxation, and it has no Socialist party whatever. That is the policy of the United States and that is the policy the right hon. Gentleman is telling us that we should emulate. There is something in what the right hon. Gentleman says on this occasion.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook who wound up for the Opposition referred to unemployment — as did many hon. Members in all parties

"What comes first? Economic efficiency or social efficiency? This matter has been debated untold times but, believe me, without economic efficiency there cannot be social efficiency. The only way to overcome the unemployment problem is by making firms more efficient. It is simply not possible to reconstruct a company without shedding some labour. If anyone knows of an alternative way to do this, let him say so, because there is no alternative."

The Opposition do not like that, but those are not my words. They are the words of Mr. Gonzalez, the Socialist Prime Minister of Spain in a major economic speech that he made last year. Such matters are well understood by every Government in the western world, whether they be Socialist, Conservative or Liberal. This was borne out very clearly at the meeting of the G5 which I attended in Washington, and the Socialist Finance Minister and Government of France endorse the policy that the only cure for unemployment is to improve the structure of the economy, remove the rigidities and make the labour market and other markets work better. Every single Government who are in office today in the western world acknowledge that fact. The expansion of demand that is suggested by the Opposition would be fatal.

The right hon. Gentleman asked me about the destruction of manufacturing industry. In fact, he went on about the destruction of manufacturing industry. That is grossly to underestimate and run down the achievement of manufacturing industry in a difficult world climate and in the wake of the worst world recession since the 1930s.

Manufacturing output has been growing steadily since the end of 1982 and the latest CBI survey says that that is likely to continue. Manufacturing investment has risen sharply in the past year. It is 15 per cent. up on the previous year. Again, the CBI expects that to continue. Manufacturing exports are up by more than 11 per cent. compared with a year earlier and there was a 40 per cent. increase in the export of manufactures to the United States in the first nine months of 1984 compared to the first nine months of 1983. Manufacturing productivity is up by 26 per cent. over the past four years. It is time that the Opposition acknowledged those achievements.

In contrast to those contributions we have had some excellent speeches from several of my hon. Friends. My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), in an outstanding contribution, referred in particular to the possibility of our joining the European monetary system. Indeed, that has been referred to in a number of other speeches. Of course, that is kept continually under review, as I have told the House on previous occasions.

A number of hon. Members believe — I am not talking about the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) who seems to think that the United States is a member of the European monetary system— that if we were to be within the European monetary system we would be able to get our hands on the reserves of other members of that system. The system does not work in quite that way. There is something called—this must be what is being referred to because it is the only part of the system that is relevant to this — the very short-term financing facility. That enables a country to borrow reserves from another member, provided that it is repaid within three months at the most. What is more, it is permissible to use that facility only if the country is having to use reserves right against the margin. The countries within the EMS have discovered that it is fatal to be right up against the margin because speculators have a one-way option. Therefore, all the intervention in the EMS is what is called intramarginal investment where no very short-term financing facility is available. I hope that that clarifies the matter for the leader of the Social Democratic party——

Mr. Steel rose——

Mr. Lawson: —and for the leader of the Liberal party.

Mr. Steel: May we take it, then, that the Chancellor is disagreeing with the statement of the Governor of the Bank of England yesterday that it would have helped if we had been inside the system?

Mr. Lawson: That is a gross travesty of what the Governor of the Bank of England said. The right hon. Gentleman should read the full text.

My hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) referred to the importance of small businesses. He is right. Indeed, the record has been encouraging. Over the last four years for which we have figures, 1980 to 1983 inclusive, the number of new businesses started in Britain exceeded the number of liquidations — net new businesses—by over 500 a week, every week of the year, every one of those years. Indeed, the trend has been rising in every region of the United Kingdom, and in 1984 the total number of new business registrations reached an all-time record of over 100,000.

My hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) also made an excellent contribution and spoke more good sense about the causes and cures of unemployment than all the Members on the Opposition Benches put together.

It is incredible that the Opposition should have chosen to put down a motion of censure on the Government's handling of the economy based on a rise in interest rates this week. I agree there with the remarks of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). I apologise to him for the fact that I was unable to be in my place when he addressed the House.

The economy today displays a range of symptoms of good health which the Labour party could not have dreamt about when it was in office. It must be something of a record to have a motion of censure on the conduct of the economy when the share index is within 4 per cent. of its all-time high. I doubt whether that has ever happened before.

Inflation is low and has been around the 5 per cent. mark for most of the past two years. Despite the temporary increase in interest rates last July, inflation at the end of the year stood at much the level that I predicted in the Budget. Growth has been continuing at 3 per cent. a year. The recent increase in interest rates will not knock that growth on the head, any more than the increase in July did, and any more than the interest rate increases in the United States knocked American growth on the head.

Profitability in British business has made a remarkable recovery. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about the CBI?"] The CBI estimates that for companies operating outside the North sea, real pre-tax returns were 7·5 per cent. in 1984, which was the highest for many years. The CBI forecasts 9 per cent. for this year, which, if it is attained, will be the highest since the 1960s. Output is at an all-time high and rising, as are investment and exports. The living standards of those in work are also at an all-time high and rising. Employment is rising. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) accused Conservative Members of behaving like football hooligans. I hope that his Back Benchers will take his good advice.

Mr. Lawson: The Opposition are keen on adopting a high moral tone. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, who wrote in Punch the other day about his meeting with Miss Samantha Fox, said that we should adopt a moral approach.

The record on employment of the Labour Government was scarcely something to boast about. The number of people out of work doubled while they were in office. I do not blame them for that and I never have done. They did not wish it. To determine the level of unemployment is more than any Government can do. However, if the solutions were as easy as they pretend they are, would they not have tried them and succeeded then? Why did they not try them?

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North West) rose——

Mr. Lawson: If the answer to unemployment is more Government spending and borrowing, would not the numbers out of work have fallen when the Labour party was in office? When the Labour Government pushed up the PSBR to one tenth of national output and Government spending to a share of GDP higher than it had ever been before or has been since, that did not create jobs; it destroyed them.

Mr. Robinson rose——

Mr. Lawson: As my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) pointed out in an extremely good contribution, where was the morality in allowing inflation to rise to 26 per cent.? The rate of inflation, unlike the rate of unemployment, is a matter largely determined by Governments. The Labour Government's acceptance of high inflation brought misery to the many millions of elderly people who live on their savings. In a few brief years they destroyed the value of money which had been carefully put aside during a lifetime.

The motion complains about the high level of real interest rates. Obviously, the level fluctuates, but during the lifetime of the Government it has been 5 per cent. It was much less under the Labour Government. The level of real interest rates during the Labour Government's lifetime was minus 5 per cent. That was not because interest rates nominally were low, but because inflation was high. That high inflation robbed every saver in the country. We shall not reproduce that. They cheated savers, the elderly and pensioners. Those who paid the price in anguish and in humiliation were the defenceless in our society. The only ones who kept ahead were the members of the more powerful unions—the paymasters of the Labour party.

Mr. Hattersley: The Chancellor has six minutes left. Will he not answer questions about the prospects for unemployment and his plans to reduce it?

Mr. Lawson: I have said many times that the policies that we are pursuing are the best prospects to reduce unemployment. It is a problem throughout the western world.

My hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Hordern) referred to my autumn statement. In it, I followed the convention that was established by my predecessor of announcing what leeway I then foresaw, on some purely conventional assumptions, for altering the burden of taxation in the Budget. That convention arose following pressure from the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee which wished to examine the building blocks available to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in framing the following year's Budget. My predecessor adopted that practice because it was the wish of the House. My hon. Friend was right to say, in his excellent speech, that the convention has some drawbacks and inconveniences. The announcement of the fiscal adjustment either depresses or arouses expectations out of all proportion to what it merits, and the leeway that a Chancellor may believe he has in the autumn is a poor indicator of what he will have in the spring. It certainly does not commit him to a course of action, since that must be a matter for judgment at the appropriate time.

In November's autumn statement I said that, as matters then appeared, I should be in a position to lower the burden of taxation in the Budget. It is still too early for me to judge whether I shall be able to do so. But to put the matter beyond doubt, I should say this: our fiscal policy will determine whether tax cuts are possible; our wish to cut taxation will not be allowed to determine our fiscal policy. If to reduce taxation would in any way—I do not say that it would—put our economic strategy at risk, it would have to be ruled out. If to lower taxation might lead to defeat in the fight against inflation, tax cuts would have to be forgone for the time being. In the Budget I shall set the public sector borrowing requirement at a responsible level that will ensure the continuation of our policies. Then and only then, I shall decide whether I have the scope to reduce taxation, and, if so, by how much.

Whether or not I can cut taxation in this Budget, many Conservative Members believe that an economy that enjoys lower taxation will be more able to foster enterprise and, therefore, to grow and to provide jobs and prosperity. The clear lesson from many countries is that where taxation is lowest, economies tend to be the most dynamic and successful. The lesson from British history is that high Government spending and taxation produce, at best, sluggish growth and steadily increasing unemployment.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook mentioned the coal strike. During the past 10 months and more, the Government have given their full backing to the National Coal Board in resisting the wholly unacceptable demands of Mr. Scargill. The issues have been whether the management of the Coal Board should be allowed to manage the industry, and Mr. Scargill's demand that the taxpayer should pour ever larger subsidies into preserving uneconomic pits at the cost of thousands of jobs in other industries. We shall not do that. It is a striking tribute to the strength of our economy that we have been able to endure the strike for as long as nearly 11 months—we shall endure it indefinitely if need be—with so little damage to the economy. We all know why the debate has been called. It has been called because the right hon. Gentleman had a date with Mr. Alfonsin, the president of Argentina, today. He was so embarrassed that he had to find some excuse to cancel that. That would have been too much.

This debate has nothing to do with the economy; it has nothing to do with jobs; it has nothing to do with the prosperity of the country. The motion should be rejected by the whole House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Mr. John McWilliam and Mr. Austin Mitchell.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House supports Her Majesty's Government in its firm action to maintain the sound financial conditions and medium-term strategy which have brought about the lowest level of inflation since the 1960s, nearly four years of sustained economic growth, record output, sound exports, record investment and record living standards, and which provide the best long-term prospects for a fundamental improvement in the performance of the British economy and for the creation of new jobs.

PETITION

Human Embryos

10.30 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): I beg to ask leave to present a petition for the protection of the human embryo, signed by 7,720 of my constituents. They affirm their belief that the newly fertilised human embryo is a real living individual human being, and they oppose all practices which discriminate against the embryo or violate his or her human dignity or right to live.

The petition concludes:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned).

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Adult Education (Wales)

Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. —[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

10.31 pm

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): The subject that I propose to raise tonight is adult education in Wales. I am concerned primarily with the Workers Educational Association, but I shall touch on the activities of the Open University which is, as I well understand, outside the remit of my hon. Friend the Minister of State. I shall also touch briefly on the provision for adult education made by local education authorities as well as the extramural departments of the University of Wales.

I am not launching an attack on the Government, still less on the Welsh Office. Welsh Office Ministers deserve at least half a cheer for their success in postponing for a year the cuts in the grants to the WEA that have already been applied in England. A year's delay means an extra year of support at the old higher rate, but, even more importantly, the longer advance warning of a coming cut enables the WEA to plan its economies with appreciably less disruption of courses of study.

I shall not argue either—as I might well be tempted to — that there should in these days of sadly high unemployment be a substantial expansion in public expenditure on adult edcuation. It is true that I want to see an expansion of adult education, but I have always taken the view that it is greatly preferable to increase charges to the individual, whenever possible, than to cut services. It follows by extension that I must accept that, at a time when reductions in public expenditure are inevitable, there is nothing inherently wrong in increasing the charges to adults taking education courses or even in increasing the proportion of the total costs of those courses that are covered by fees.

My worries about the Welsh Office's proposals for a cut of 7·5 per cent., phased over the next two years, for the north Wales district of the WEA out of a contribution of £109,000 from the Welsh Office are practical and pragmatic. From the point of the view of the WEA, the cut is substantially worse than it appears at first. Local education authorities normally match the contributions of the Government, although in some cases the matching is pretty meagre, but they will reduce their subsidy correspondingly.

Right hon. and hon. Members are only too well aware that local authorities are coming under pressure as severe as any that they have encountered to find money to pay for nursery education and higher teachers' salaries and to satisfy demands for smaller classes from a budget that is being squeezed by angry ratepayers and a justly tight-fisted Government. The WEA is therefore facing a cut in the money it gets from the Government and a corresponding cut in the not excessively generous sums that it gets from local authorities. In addition, the WEA, which used to get all of the receipts from courses that it ran jointly with the extramural department of the University of Wales, will now, under a new agreement that was concluded last year, get only 50 per cent. of receipts. For the north Wales district, that means a loss of £2,000.

The WEA is responding to the challenge, partly by increasing course fees, in a desperate attempt to maintain its full pattern of activity. It has managed so far to avoid increases in charges to old-age pensioners and the unemployed, but that entails some pretty steep increases for other students. The point has already been reached at which the scale of charges is sufficient to deter potential students. Indeed, some existing students have had to give up their courses.

There is another, and perhaps even more worrying, development. It is cheaper and more profitable to hold courses in substantial centres of population such as Rhyl, Llandudno or Colwyn bay than in remote country areas to which tutors might have to travel long distances and where the classes are likely to be much smaller. However, it is in just those remote areas that the work of the WEA is more necessary. The classes are a vital ingredient in enabling some scattered communities to retain a reasonable quality of life. I fear that we might be witnessing a noticeable and gradually accelerating decline in the numbers involved in WEA classes and a steady reduction of WEA activity in rural areas.

The same need for economy is also limiting the scope of the Open University, which is of special significance in scattered rural areas. For some time I and, I am sure, many of my colleagues in Wales have heard from Open University students in our constituencies that they are having increasing difficulty in meeting the new higher fees, which now amount to very nearly £1,000, to collect the credits necessary for their degree. As a result, some are having to drop their degree courses before completion. In addition, the mounting pressure on local education authorities which are desperate to find economies, means that they have to cut the number of evening classes that they run in schools.

It is not easy to dramatise the case for adult education —it is not headline-grabbing stuff—or to claim that any reduction would bring catastrophic consequences. I have already debarred myself from arguing in principle against any increase in course fees. Nevertheless, it would be a bad mistake to allow the decline in the provision for adult education to gather pace, especially when one considers the derisory sums of public money to be saved. Is it really worth stopping some classes in remote areas, and put at risk the attendance at others, to save the princely sum of £9,000?

It is commonplace to talk about the increased leisure in our society and the need to find rewarding ways of using it. Most of us, I fear, have not faced up to the fact that unemployment, or very part-time employment, will go on for many people for a long time. Human beings thrown on to their own resources in this way will be unhappy, perhaps destructive, people if they have not been given the intellectual skills or manual dexterity to make satisfying use of all the time on their hands.

We in this country—indeed, people throughout the industrialised world — will have to adopt a different attitude towards work, which, however brainless, boring or unhealthy, is always regarded as meritorious; and towards leisure, which, however wisely and constructively used, is regarded as being ignoble—not the sort of thing one should be seen doing on a weekday afternoon.

We must get away from that attitude and away from the idea that education happens to people between the ages of five and 16, or 18 if one is lucky. Education—or, for that matter, training—should be a continuous, almost lifelong, business if we are to have a society able to face the challenges of technological change and diminishing industrial employment.

[Sir Anthony Meyer]

The WEA has been a pioneer in developing those attitudes and changes and it has done so at amazingly little cost to the taxpayer, because so many of those who work for it are happy to do so for material rewards which are far lower than they would get on the open market. There is no danger that an increased allocation of taxpayers' money would be swallowed up in ever larger wage claims. On the contrary, the public gets the kind of value for its money in the operations of the WEA that it gets by its subventions to voluntary organisations; very little public money produces a disproportionate amount of public good.

The Minister will probably tell me of the successful efforts which the Government have made to maintain, indeed improve, standards in education. I do not dissent; this Government, and the Secretary of State for Education in particular, have achieved great things in raising education standards. But if I have tonight drawn the attention of my hon. Friend to the anxieties felt by those who work in adult education, if I have succeeded in highlighting the social value of this form of education, and if I have reminded him of the disproportionate contribution that the WEA could make at small cost, I have not wasted the Minister's or my time.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Mr. John Stradling Thomas): I wish at the outset to compliment my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) on his excellent speech, to which I listened with great interest. I appreciate that this is a subject in which he takes great interest—indeed, almost a vested interest —as he has contributed directly to the adult education movement as a Workers Educational Association lecturer, and therefore speaks with a voice of experience. I am pleased, therefore, to assure my hon. Friend that I, too, want to encourage the development of the adult education service in Wales.

Let me put the matter in context. We have in Wales a long and proud tradition of adult study, beginning with the circulating schools of the 18th century and progressing through the Sunday schools movement to the variety of public and private sector provision which we have today. The demand for adult education remains strong, I am glad to say, both from those who see it as a means of acquiring or improving their qualfications and thereby advancing their career prospects and from those who simply wish to undertake a course of study for its own sake, which in the context of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West is very appropriate. I am grateful to him for setting the kernel of what he had to say tonight in the context of total adult education. It is my Department's policy to seek to ensure that the demand from both of these categories is met, and in the most cost-effective way possible.

My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that this commitment to adult education can be demonstrated in terms of the expenditure which is being devoted to it. Total expenditure—that is, expenditure by the local education authorities and Welsh Office grants to other bodies— amounted to £3,069,000 in 1983-84. The sum is expected to increase to £3,250,000 in the current financial year, and the provision being made for 1985-86 is £3,930,000— not far short of £4 million. A little more than a half of this expenditure is in the form of Welsh Office grants and the balance is expenditure by the local education authorities.

I have already mentioned one of the bodies which receives grant from my Department, the Workers Educational Association. The WEA has of course made and is continuing to make a very important contribution to the tradition to which I referred earlier through the opportunities that it offers to adults to increase their knowledge and personal capability. I recognise and appreciate the work that the WEA does and is doing, and I am pleased that my Department is able to support its work with grants which will amount to £264,000 in the current financial year.

However, my hon. Friend will, I am sure, concede that the WEA is not the only body carrying out useful and important work in adult education. In fact, my hon. Friend acknowledged this during his speech, and I thank him for it. A very substantial share of the adult education service in the Principality is provided by the local education authorities through their adult education centres and further education colleges. In 1983 the local education authorities and colleges enrolled nearly 100,000 people on adult education courses at their adult education centres and youth centres.

This compares with enrolments of nearly 40,000 for courses provided by what are technically known as the "responsible bodies" in Wales. I thought that we were all responsible bodies in Wales. However, that is a technical term. The responsible bodies are the Workers Educational Association, the extramural departments of the university colleges that were referred to by my hon. Friend, and the YMCA.

Other bodies active in this field are Coleg Harlech and the adult literacy and basic skills unit. The National Institute of Adult Continuing Education also plays an important part in co-ordinating provision and staff development on an England and Wales basis.

In addition to providing support for these bodies, the Government have taken some initiatives of their own. Hon. Members will be aware of the Government's professional, industrial and commercial updating programme—known as PICKUP—which is designed to encourage employers to arrange retraining and updating courses for their employees in mid-career. I should also mention the Government's REPLAN scheme, designed to promote the development of educational opportunities for the adult unemployed to improve their employment prospects by giving them new skills and knowledge. My hon. Friend referred to the difficulties that high unemployment can create and therefore I stress the importance of that aspect.

The variety of provision is desirable if we are to provide an efficient and flexible service for adults with widely varying requirements. However, the budget available to my department — my hon Friend described the Government as justly tight-fisted — is limited, and, in order to encourage the development of new initiatives it is sometimes necessary to trim back a little on the support for well-established programmes. That is the situation with the programmes of the WEA and the extramural departments, referred to by my hon. Friend, whose financial allocations from the Welsh Office are being marginally reduced in 1985-86 and 1986-87. However, the reductions in their forward provision are very small. Indeed, in both 1985-86 and 1986-87 the WEA will still receive more in cash terms from the Welsh Office than it is receiving this year. As my hon. Friend pointed out, we have phased that over two years, which is helpful from a planning point of view.

Therefore, the reductions in the Government's level of financial support for both the WEA and the EMDs are in no sense significant cuts. Furthermore it is my belief that the WEA could compensate for the small reductions by making some increase in its fees to students. I noted carefully my hon. Friend's points on that aspect, but the present fees are low and arrangements are always made for old-age pensioners and the unemployed. I hope that that can be maintained, but I noted my hon. Friend's point that that to some extent increases the burden in adjusting fees. I understand that.

The fees charged in Wales are modest, ranging from 60p per class to £10 for 20 lectures. Even so, I would expect the WEA districts to agree fee structures, as they do at present, which provide for the remission of fees to which I referred a moment ago. Therefore, there is scope for the association to increase its income from fees without causing any significant difficulties for adults who wish to attend its courses.

The reduction in the level of grant to both the WEA and EMDs has been made so that Wales can take part in initiatives to improve opportunities in adult education. The financial support to this wide range of bodies means that I have had to effect savings, albeit small, but nevertheless deliberately restricted, to meet the extra financial demands arising from those new initiatives.

The adult literacy and basic skills unit, whose remit has been extended to 1988, continues to perform invaluable work in Wales in stimulating provision for adults who have literacy and basic skills problems. For that reason, in conjunction with the Department of Education and Science, I have increased our contribution to its budget not only in the current financial year but for the next two years.

In relation to the adult unemployed, I am pleased to be able to say that I have agreed to join the DES REPLAN —the adult unemployed programme announced by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science in March 1984. Under the banner of the National Institute of Adult Continuing Education, the institute and the further education unit are managing complementary programmes of development projects.

The institute is employing and managing an advisory team of field officers led by a national co-ordinator. The field officer for Wales took up appointment earlier this week and I envisage that she will be contacting the LEAs, voluntary bodies and other organisations, including the WEAs, about courss and other activities. In the coming year and the next academic year I expect great activity in the setting-up of courses. Apart from the financing of the field officer, my Department is also contributing towards the cost of the development projects. Two of those projects have been agreed for Wales, one in the Mid-Glamorgan and Gwent area to encourage groups to acquire skills and expertise, and to help towards self-sufficiency and the creation of commercially viable enterprises, and another for Coleg Harlech for research into the education needs of the unemployed.

I shall now deal with vocational training. I am pleased that we are now a part of the professional, industrial and commercial updating programme. At local level the PICKUP agents provide liaison between colleges and employers. The PICKUP agent in Wales has been in post since last September, and I know that he has already been actively promoting the scheme in many parts of Wales.

I mentioned earlier the benefits to be expected from a diversity of provision. For some time there has been pressure from adult education interests in Wales for an advisory council to be set up to co-ordinate provision to organise staff development and to offer advice to the providers of adult education and to central Government. I recognise that there are special Welsh considerations in this as in other areas of education, and I have taken note of the views expressed by bodies within Wales and by the National Institute of Adult Continuing Education. The institute has expressed its particular concern about the absence of a Welsh dimension to its work and it has pointed out that it has no specific single point of reference within Wales. A proposal which has been put to me would involve the setting up of a separate sub-committee for Wales of the institute, which would carry out the sort of co-ordinating role that has been suggested and which would provide the institute with the presence that it has been looking for in the Principality. I have come to the conclusion that such a sub-committee could perform a useful function for the providers of adult education and, in time, could lead to significant improvements in the service. I am pleased to be able to announce today that I have endorsed that proposal in principle, and that funding of £11,000 for each of the next three years will be made available by my Department to enable a sub-committee of the institute to be set up for a trial period. My Department will now consult with the institute, the Welsh joint education committee and other interested bodies about how the sub-committee should be constituted and about its terms of reference.

In conclusion, I wish to emphasise that my Department remains committed to the provision of an efficient adult education service for the people of Wales. I believe that there is a strong demand for the benefits that the service is able to offer. The service must recognise, however, that the type of courses that adult students require will change over time. The Government and the Service need to be alert to the changes in demand and must be prepared to adapt the pattern of provision in line with the change in requirements of the students, for whose benefit the service exists.

I have taken careful note of the points that my hon. Friend made. Coming from my background, I understand his points about remote rural areas. However, I still think that we must be cost-effective in adapting to changed circumstances, and I hope that we shall have both demand and provision for adult education in the Principality. I know that it is dear to our hearts and part of our tradition.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 1 February 1985

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Children's Shoes (VAT)

9.34 am

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I beg to ask leave to present a petition against any proposal to end the zero-rating system on children's shoes for VAT purposes and against any suggestion that a positive rate of VAT should be imposed. The petition is from my constituents in Great Grimsby and those of my neighbour the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), who asks to be associated with the presentation of the petition.

The petition reads:

To the Honourable the Commons in Parliament assembled:

The Petition of Her Majesty's loyal subjects living in Great Grimsby, Cleethorpes and round about sheweth:—

That the extension of Value Added Tax to children's shoes will cause hardship to many, and by compelling some parents to buy shoes of inferior quality, inflict irreparable injury on the feet of the next generation.

Your petitioners urge your Honourable House to reject or to repeal, as may at the time be appropriate, legislation providing for such an extension.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

The petition is signed by Mrs. Vera Whiting of 24 Pasture street, Grimsby, who organised the petition, and by 1,547 of my constituents and those of my neighbour the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes.

The petition is aimed indirectly at the Chancellor of the Exchequer to help him in his pre-Budget deliberations, but it also asks the House not to sanction a positive rate of VAT on children's shoes. I hope that the House will treat the request seriously and act on it, if necessary, when the time comes.

To lie upon the Table.

Human Embryos

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I beg to ask leave to present a petition signed by 1,154 constituents of Portsmouth, South entitled "Petition for the Protection of the Human Embryo".

The petitioners affirm their belief that the newly fertilised human embryo is a real, living individual human being.

They

oppose all . . . practices . . . which discriminate against the embryo and violate his/her human dignity end right to life.

The petition continues:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate action to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos . . .

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

St. Jude's Church, Southsea

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of 2,500 constituents of Portsmouth, South. The petition reads:

Petition for the Saving of St. Jude's Church, Southsea.

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled:

The Humble Petition of the residents of the constituency of Portsmouth, South and surrounding areas showeth that we are opposed to the demolition of part or all of the fabric of St. Jude's Church in Southsea in the County of Hampshire.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to revoke the ecclesiastical exemption contained in the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 whereby churches may be demolished without listing building consent.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Sub Judice Rule

9.38 am

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. No Member of Parliament has received more expert guidance from or been shown more kindness and courtesy by the Table Office than me. I do not criticise the Clerks at the Table Office, but we are in a grey and difficult area. This point of order relates to the sub judice rule.

You, Mr. Speaker, may have seen on page 2 of The Guardian this morning, a report arising from the Ponting trial. It states that the report by the Admiral of the Fleet, Sir John Fieldhouse, had been altered without his knowledge. That was denied by civil servants. I therefore tried to table at the Table Office a question asking the Prime Minister——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must stop the hon. Member, because this matter has not yet been brought to my attention. I must confess that I have not seen the report in The Guardian this morning. Will the hon. Member allow me to look into the matter? I shall then get in touch with him.

Mr. Dalyell: Of course, Mr. Speaker.

Orders of the Day

Local Government (Access to Information) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.39 am

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

"'Publicity is the greatest and most effective check against arbitrary action.' That is one of the fundamental rights of the subject. Further, publicity stimulates the interest of local persons in local government. That is also very important."

Earlier it had been said:

"The public has the right, in the first instance, to know what its elected representatives are doing." — [Official Report, 5 February 1960; Vol. 616, c. 1350-51.]

Those are not my words, although I fully endorse them. They are the words of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister spoken during her maiden speech virtually 25 years ago to the day when she introduced the Public Bodies (Admission of the Press to Meetings) Bill which became the Public Bodies (Admission to Meetings) Act 1960.

That Act opened up council meetings. It is of some interest to note that at that stage my right hon. Friend, as she now is, was worried about local government expenditure of what was then £1,600 million. I am advised by Ministers responsible that the equivalent figure now is some £33,000 million. That underlines, above all, the importance of the role that local government plays in the economy and the importance of ensuring that maximum publicity surrounds local government's activities.

The greatest opportunity should be given for local people to be informed about, and, if necessary, to talk to their councillors, before decisions affecting their lives are taken.

May I make my position crystal clear? I am an unrepentant friend and supporter of local government. That is based upon my 14 years as a local councillor. I found that, with all its imperfections, which have been detailed and documented, it still represents the most immediate form of accountability compared with any other structure of service. Indeed, I wish that certain functions, no longer the responsibility of local government, retained the same degree of closeness to the people they serve.

May I equally assure my many friends in local government, some of whom may be worried about the somewhat exaggerated reports of the Bill's effects, that I would not be sponsoring the Bill if I did not believe that it would benefit local government without impeding its ability to take necessary executive action on behalf of its electors. I have been heartened in that respect by the friendly discussions I have enjoyed with the various local authority organisations that, although worried by some of the clauses as drafted, have stressed their strong support for accountable and open local government.

It is becoming fashionable to talk about freedom of information and all that goes with it. Later speakers may, subject to your tolerance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, wish to speak on wider aspects on access to and freedom of information. I have no such intention.

My Bill seeks simply to tackle access to information in local government. I shall in no way be drawn on the relative positions of central Government, nationalised industries, quangos or any other bodies. They all lie outside the scope of the Bill. All have differences in operation, which may strengthen or weaken their respective cases for change and, above all, would allow right hon. and hon. Members to be distracted from the matter under discussion, and might even divide what I otherwise hope would be a virtually united House.

The background to the Bill is, I hope, of some interest to the House. The measure was first introduced here in some form by the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) as an amendment on Report to the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. I contributed to the discussion.

The first draft of the Bill was launched in December 1983 as the Local Government (Access to Information) Bill. It was circulated to 10,000 local organisations and individuals during the first half of 1984. It was also circulated to many authorities. Numerous suggestions were made by individuals and some local authorities, and detailed discussions were held with Bradford, Lewisham, Hillingdon and Derbyshire. The Bill was then presented and drafted by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes)—who is here today, as well as the hon. Member for Bootle—as a ten-minute Bill in June 1984.

Following that, further detailed discussions were held with the various local authority associations, and resulting papers were sent to those working on the Bill. On the basis of those papers plus further detailed papers from another 20 councils, the current Bill was drawn up.

I have held discussions with the district councils, the county councils, the metropolitan authorities, the Society of County Secretaries, the district secretaries and the London Boroughs Association. Seminars have already been held for senior and chief officers of Cambridge, Leicester and Cardiff and more are planned. Inevitably, some of the suggestions have taken time to summarise and analyse, and should the House feel able to give a Second Reading to the Bill today a further list of amendments will be sent for discussion to the various local authority associations.

I hope that that demonstrates two things to the House. The first is the wide-ranging nature of the consultation, which is continuing. That ranges from the large—the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, which represents some 18 million people—to little parish councils up and down the country. I quote from a letter from Idbury parish meeting in Oxfordshire with a village population of under 200:

"The Bill will have the unqualified support of the Idbury Parish Meeting. We would like to thank all concerned for the effort they are making on our behalf."

The second matter that it demonstrates is my willingness to consider amendments which improve the Bill and clarify its intentions. At this stage it would be only proper if I paid full tribute for the real debt that I owe to Mr. Ron Bailey and all his helpers at the Community Rights Project. Without their untiring help and advice over many months, none of this would have happened. I hope that they will draw some genuine satisfaction from the further progress of this measure, although it will involve them in still more late nights.

By now, hon. Members may be wondering what matters are still unnecessarily discussed in private. The answer, I am afraid, is literally thousands and thousands. I shall take, just by chance, one small part of the country, central east England. I could have picked on any other area of the country and found the same thing. I shall mention some of the sub-committees that are held in private. In Broxtowe the twinning sub-committee and the tourism sub-committee meet in private. In mid Suffolk the poultry meat sub-committee meets in private—that is a daring one. In north Bedfordshire the bottle bank donation sub-committee meets in private. In Nottinghamshire the residents' parking sub-committee—there is a lively issue —and the catering sub-committee meet in private. I assure the House that I could quote many other examples. On planning matters, many authorities, including two London boroughs, still hear all planning applications in private.

As for the issues discussed, you will be relieved to know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I do not intend to trot out an almost never-ending list, but let me take just one authority. My eye has fallen by chance on Stevenage, in Hertfordshire. I stress that it is no better or worse than many other authorities. The council's policy on removing or replacing storage heaters and a report on the Housing and Building Control Act 1984, and the Department of the Environment booklet "Your Right to Know" were privately debated by the housing committee. The colour of roses in the memorial rose garden was privately debated in the health and community services sub-committee, and the use of dyed maggots by anglers was discussed privately by the leisure and community services committee.

I hope that that demonstrates that we still cover issues great and small in private. In principle, the Bill is not solely about, so to speak, dyed maggots; it is about the important issues which are unnecessarily taken in private at the moment.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): The hon. Member said, "unnecessarily taken in private". I am sure that he will confirm that there are some matters that it is still right to take in private—personal matters of confidentiality that arise in social services committees and that type of thing — and that in the Bill he is getting at the completely unnecessary privacy which continues in matters great and small. There are matters small as well as great which may need to be kept private because of their content.

Mr. Squire: I fully accept everything that the hon. Member has said. He anticipates me by five or 10 minutes, when I shall talk about the schedule to the Bill in which I have detailed the exemptions which, as he rightly says, must still apply on genuine grounds of privacy.

The best way to sum up the matter is to give the comments that were received from the solicitor to Ynys Môn council. When asked which matters were taken in private, he answered, "controversial issues". I am not sure whether my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment would wish a similar facility to be extended to the Government.

In various ways, the Bill introduces the best practice which is already followed in all cases in other authorities. The Bill has three main principles. The first is to increase the public accountability of councillors between elections by allowing the public closer and more detailed insight into their decisions. Councillors' performance can therefore be more accurately judged. Secondly, in order to improve the quality of decision making, the public will be able to challenge or add to information provided by officers for councillors' decisions. Presenting alternative information or premises for an argument can only be healthy if it adds to the range of views and evidence available to councillors. Thirdly, the Bill will strengthen relations between councils and their electorate and will break down the traditional suspicion, hostility and alienation which local electors often express about local government.

Clause 1 makes two provisions. It opens up sub-committees to the public, in line with the recommendation in the Department of the Environment circular 45/75, while allowing for confidentiality for genuine reasons, as stated in schedule 1. It repeals the provisions of the Public Bodies (Admission to Meetings) Act 1960, which allows secrecy for such non-specific reasons as confidentiality and public interest. Evidence of totally unnecessary secrecy is overwhelming. In future, specific reasons, which are laid down in schedule 1, will have to apply. Many authorities have already implemented that aspect voluntarily.

Clause 2 requires the minutes of all committee and sub-committee meetings to be publicly available. At present the public have a legal right to see only minutes of full council meetings and of committees with recommendatory power. They do not have the right to see the minutes of committees with delegated power — in practice most sub-committees and committees have that these days— or sub-committee minutes. The clause allows councils to publish the minutes of the confidential parts of meetings, as defined in schedule 1, in such a way as to preserve the confidentiality that the meeting has resolved to be necessary. Once again, numerous authorities already implement those provisions.

Clause 3 requires reports that are being discussed at meetings to be publicly available three days before the meeting, unless one of the reasons in schedule 1 requires the report to be kept confidential, and that reason must be stated. There are additional safeguards, in that reports that would otherwise have to be made available three days before the meeting need not be made available if the meeting is convened under the short notice procedure, if an item or report has been added to the agenda at short notice, or if the council's officer believes that a schedule 1 reason requires the report to remain confidential until the meeting takes place. That would be an exceptional circumstance, but it is an added safeguard to meet the sort of circumstances that may occasionally occur.

Clause 3(5) requires a reasonable number of the reports that are being discussed during the public part of a meeting to be made available for the public who are present, thus enabling them to understand what is going on. Many councils already operate in that way.

Clause 4 has attracted more comment than any other part of the Bill, and I hope therefore that the House will permit me to speak at length about it. The concept of the general public having access to certain documents is not new. At present, a variety of Acts grant such access under certain circumstances. The Local Government Act 1972 granted access for the inspection of payments and statements of account. The Town and Country Planning Act 1971 rightly laid heavy responsibilities on local authorities for planning matters. Anyone affected by planning decisions today can inspect the relevant file and the plans. Other Acts have covered such matters as the inspection of councillors' expenses, of plans for sewers and even of records of common lodging houses. There are also many provisions which cover the purchase and renting of property. Therefore, the concept is not new.

The Association of County Councils, which otherwise presented a strong note of reservation about clause 4, pointed out that current good practice—the sort of thing that local authorities are advised to follow—enables a member of the public to have access to a background document that deals with a matter of fact and elucidates an issue discussed publicly. Clause 4 deals with research data, background papers, interim reports and other matters which relate to any item on the public part of the agenda of a council, committee or sub-committee meeting.

Clause 4(1) provides that after the agenda has been published but before the meeting has taken place the public can inspect such documents unless the council officer has reason to believe that any such documents should not be made public for any one of the reasons stated in schedule 1. The reason must be stated on the report or document in question.

Clause 4(2) provides that after the meeting has taken place the public can inspect such documents, unless the meeting itself has decided that any of them should not be available for any one of the reasons in schedule 1, in which case the reason must be stated.

There are, therefore, two safeguards to protect genuinely confidential information. The clause refers only to background papers relating to items under discussion in the public part of a meeting. Even documents relating to items being discussed in public can be kept confidential if a schedule reason applies to such documents.

The wording in clause 4 is based on that used by Bradford council, which is one of three authorities which have operated the entirety of the Bill for the past six months. Bradford, Brent and Derbyshire — two Conservative authorities and one Labour authority—are all happy and satisfied that it has caused them no problems. A further six authorities have publicly stated that they are in the process of changing to adopt the provisions set out in the Bill.

One of the best comments made about clause 4 comes from one of the operating officers. If the problems are as great as some critics of the clause imply, operating officers would feel the most stress. Mr. Jack Feather is the director of housing and environmental health services in Bradford. He said:

"I welcome the most contentious aspect of the Bill, public access to internal documents, because it forces officers prepairing agenda items to file all their relevant background papers carefully. While assisting the public, this is an aid to good management in that it allows committees and chief officers to have confidence in the reports put before them."

I seek to do two things by clause 5. For councillors who are on the relevant committee, the Bill seeks to codify case law, in particular the Birmingham city council v. O case, and grants wide access to all background papers, not merely those which relate to an agenda—the thrust and subject of this Bill. For councillors not on the relevant committee, the Bill seeks to give statutory right of access to all papers relating to agenda items. To the extent that the clause, as drafted, may be imperfect in meeting those aims, I shall seek to make clarifying amendments in Committee.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): For the benefit of the House, will my hon. Friend clarify paragraph (g) of the schedule? Will he explain how he hopes a councillor might be able to prove the fact that information was a reason why he might refer to documents covered by clause 5?

"in connection with his duties as a member"

Mr. Squire: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for intervening. I hope that he will allow me to cover paragraph (g) when I reach it in my speech. I have received some comments about it and it deserves separate attention. I fully accept that everything in the schedule ultimately relates back to the Bill. If I have not covered his point when I have dealt with paragraph (g), I invite him to question me again.

The remainder of the Bill is relatively uncontentious and is widely practised. Scotland the Northern Ireland are currently excluded from the Bill because the appropriate wording to cover the relatively unintelligible activities of the north and west of England and Wales were not in my possession when the Bill was drafted. However, should the House see fit to give the Bill a Second Reading, I shall table appropriate amendments in Committee to extend the Bill to Scotland and, I hope, to Northern Ireland.

The schedule sets out clearly and, I hope, concisely a series of reasons why confidentiality should legitimately be preserved. I hope that it meets the point made by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) about the understandable and justifiable need to retain confidentiality in some circumstances. Paragraphs (a) to (f) are self-explanatory and are based closely on the practices that have been followed by the London borough of Hillingdon since 1978. That authority confirms that they have posed few, if any, difficulties.

It may be interesting for the House to note that, regardless of the absence of legislation, several authorities have made considerable moves towards more public meetings and less use of the power to exclude the public. I give as examples two authorities, one Labour-controlled and one Conservative-controlled. In 1978-79, the London borough of Lewisham excluded press and public from its policy and resources committee on 81 occasions, and from its development control sub-committee on 31 occasions. The figures for last year are four occasions and one occasion respectively. Last year, the London borough of Hillingdon, operating the reasons for confidentiality that are found in the schedule, excluded press and public from its policy and resources committee on two occasions, from its education committee on two occasions and from its social services committee on one occasion. I hope that I have demonstrated that, in practice, such reasons tend to concentrate the minds of councillors and officers, who can then readily ascertain the matters that are genuinely confidential and the many issues that can and should be discussed in public.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): A blemish on the record of the London borough of Hillingdon is that it refuses to send housing statistics to the Department of the Environment. One finds blanks in the return of housing statistics by that borough.

Mr. Squire: The hon. Gentleman would not expect me to comment in detail on the good and bad points of that borough, which I am sure is admirably run. If it is falling short in this respect, to the extent that even in Hillingdon there may be greater publicity in the future, I am sure that more pressure will be brought to bear by the appropriate councillors to ensure that it complies with the intelligent requests of my hon. Friend the Minister.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) rightly highlighted paragraph (g). That paragraph was inserted initially at the request of some local authorities, in different parts of the country and controlled by different parties, which were worried about the need to protect advice given to political groups. I am conscious, from representations made to me, that much concern has been expressed about that paragraph and especially about whether it belongs in legislation at all — certainly whether it belongs in legislation of this nature. In Committee, I shall be willing to discuss the paragraph in detail, especially to satisfy myself that the original reason for its conclusions still holds true. I take very much to heart several comments that have been made about it.

What objections could be raised to the Bill? As I understand it, there may be three. The first is that the Bill will be too costly and that we cannot introduce such legislation at a time when local authorities are watching every pound and must meet targets. The chief executive of Bradford council, Gordon Moore, says this:

"Our three party group leaders have estimated the annual cost at around £2,000 — a minimal sum to pay for democratic accountability."

I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House agree with that statement.

The Bill may be objected to on grounds that it is unworkable, impractical and impossible to put into proper effect. The chief executive of Brent council, Michael Bichard, has said:

"Since we have implemented the provisions of the Bill there has been no administrative difficulty or extra cost, and some initial fears of officers that it would inhibit written communication have not materialised in practice. If this system can work in Brent, where there is an extremely volatile political situation, then I believe it can work anywhere."

That sounded like a call from the heart by the chief executive.

A third reason why the Bill might be criticised is that it goes too far too soon. It may be said, "You have the right ideas, but you are going too quickly and the Bill is too extreme." Three authorities have already written to me accusing me of being too timid: Brent, Hinckley and Bosworth, and Yeovil, whose chief executive says:

"I am sure you will know that in some respects we are going well beyond the policy proposed in the Bill."

I am in danger of being tarred as a moderate because I am trying to steer a course between extreme councils pressing me to go even further, and those which say that I have gone too far.

The national support that has been gathered for the measure extends from the Confederation of British Industry to the National Council for Civil Liberties, and from the National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses to the Consumers Association — all told, about 70 national bodies, most of them voluntary. They are supplemented by more than 1,000 local voluntary organisations and nearly 400 parish and town councils, while 47 local authorities of all colours have supported the Bill in principle. As I said, nine local authorities have implemented or are implementing changes that bring them fully into line with the Bill. Last year, 153 hon. Members from all parties supported an early-day motion on the subject, and during the last two weeks more than 100 hon.

[Mr. Squire]

Members signed a similar motion tabled by me. Few private Members' Bills in recent years can have come to the House with wider proven support in the country.

Ultimately, good practice cannot depend on legislation alone. It must be a shared responsibility of officers and councillors to ensure that their councils' affairs are conducted with a proper regard for the genuine interests of their electors. Most councils will rise to that responsibility, as they have responded to many other changes in recent years.

In her speech 25 years ago, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said:

"The paramount function . . . is to safeguard civil liberties rather than to think that administrative convenience should take first place in law."—[Official Report, 5 February 1960; Vol. 616, c. 1357-58.]

This morning I have demonstrated that the Bill will not inconvenience administration, and that, at little cost and with minimal administrative reorganisation, a new era of openness can dawn, bringing with it the increased accountability that all of us seek, regardless of our political parties. I ask the House to give the Bill a Second Reading.

10.7 am

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): In supporting the Bill, I, too, will try not to be too party political. The Bill has all-party support and was presented in that spirit. The hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) believed that he might be accused of being a moderate. I should tell him that I support the Bill as an extreme moderate, which is the political position that I have always held.

The media will not regard the Bill as meaty or sexy in the sense of legislation such as the Sexual Offences Bill that we debated last Friday, but I hope that the media will pay attention to the Bill because it is important, especially at this time in the history of the relationship between central and local government.

Like the hon. Member for Hornchurch, I do not wish to become too involved in some of the arguments about freedom of information in relation to other activities. I believe in open government not only in local authorities but in central Government, the nationalised industries, water authorities, health authorities, development corporations and quangos. It is no criticism of the Bill to argue that local government is more democratic than those other bodies anyway, and that we should have started to democratise water authorities, health authorities and development corporations before we turned our attention to democratically elected local authorities. That argument has been put to me by many Labour councillors. I sympathise with their view. Those other bodies should be democratised. Indeed, there may be a stronger case for democratising them than there is for opening up the functions of local government through the Bill.

That does not mean that there is not a strong case for the Bill or that local government should not be made more democratic. Indeed, the opposite is the case. Today, when local democracy is under attack from central Government, with rate capping and threats of abolition, democratically elected local government must gather strength unto itself to resist the efforts of central Government to interfere more and more in local affairs. The Bill will help local authorities in that process, for it will enable them to enter into partnership with the local electorate so that the voters, officials and councillors can resist the onslaught.

The Bill cannot be described as an attack on local government. If it becomes law, it will strengthen and support local government. No local authority officer or councillor can criticise the low turnout in local elections and at the same time oppose legislation of this kind. If decision-making is shared among all the local people, more of them will vote in local elections.

It has been suggested that if the local decision-making processes are opened up, councillors and officers will go into a caucus and meet at the Bull and Bush, Red Flag Arms or the local Margaret Thatcher coffee bar to discuss the issues and make decisions. That is a fair criticism. Whatever we do, we will not avoid that sort of activity. Nevertheless, much of the decision-making undertaken by officers and councillors — usually of the controlling group—which now takes place behind closed doors will be opened up to public scrutiny.

Nor will the Bill remove power from councillors. After all, knowledge is power. We want more information about what is happening locally to be given to the press and general public. We also want to give rights to councillors —not only those of minority parties, but even members of controlling groups in local authorities. Frequently councillors who belong to controlling parties cannot get information because the ruling members of their party do not want them to have it, and that has to do with power struggles in individual groups.

In that context, I am told that such struggles go on within the controlling Conservative group in Sefton, of which my constituency of Bootle forms part. Conflicts occur between Conservatives from Southport, Crosby and Formby. In Sefton, power is not just delegated to sub-committees. That authority often has sub-committees of one, and the leader of the council is usually the one who forms the sub-committee and takes decisions in secret.

The Bill will give councillors the right of access to information. Councillors will then be able to get hold of the background documents used by chief officers in making recommendations or policy reports to committees. That is particularly important in these days of corporate management. Elected councillors should have before them all the options and arguments and be able to reach decisions in the light of the best advice and alternatives available.

Under the system of corporate management, the chief executive may call together the chief officers, who can collectively discuss all the alternatives, based on the information in the background papers, hammer everything out among themselves and put forward just one recommendation in a report to the local councillors.

The trouble is that what went into the decision-making —all the information that was before that corporate team of officers—is not before the councillors, who are then, in effect, faced with a fait accompli. In that situation, the chief officers are doing the political job that should be done by the councillors.

I am in favour of corporate management. I am not a believer in the old type of all-powerful departments. It was wrong for individual service or spending departments to act on their own, almost without regard to the consequences for other local authority services. Corporate management can lead to efficiency, but without a Bill of this type, which will ensure that councillors have access to all the background information that is available to chief officers, corporate management can remove power from councillors and place it in the hands of the officers in a way that is bad for local government and democracy.

I accept that some areas must remain private and confidential. For example, details about people's personal lives contained in social service files and so on should not, generally speaking, be made public. We shall need legislation in due course to give individuals access to their personal files, but that does not arise from this measure.

While I accept the need for confidentiality, we must be careful not to go too far in protecting it, particularly in relation to tenders and contracts. There must be some confidentiality to ensure that contractors do not get advance notice of certain facts. We must avoid fiddles occurring. However, we could have much more openness about the way in which tenders are awarded and contracts received in local government.

Had this measure been on the statute book at the time, the web of corruption that was revealed in the Poulson affair would not have been possible. A measure of openness such as this would have prevented the letting of contracts on the nod, time and again, to the same contractors. There would have been the necessary competition to protect local government.

When tenders have been received and studied, more information could be given about the awarding of contracts, together with the figures. Although the Bill allows for the exclusion "of spending estimates for specific items . . . that . . . would be likely to benefit a contractor or supplier," we would have more information about the letting of contracts in a way that would benefit and be healthy for local democracy.

I admit to having been guilty of a degree of great openness when I was a councillor in the city of Manchester. When I was chairman of the housing committee I was often accused of taking too many decisions in public. People in the Labour group and others said that I was publicity-seeking and that certain matters should have been dealt with in private. My view has always been that politicians should not act in a stealthy way. As for publicity-seeking, a politician is failing in his duty if he does not receive publicity because the public have a right to know what he is doing.

I was a member of the sub-committee of the policy committee of that council. It was called the secretarial and services sub-committee and it consisted of every member of the policy committee. It met in secret and its title, "Secretarial and Services Sub-Committee," hid a multitude of sins. For example, it decided what civic receptions should take place and who should attend them. That is why its affairs were conducted in private. It was also why all the members of the policy committee wanted to be on it. If one belonged to the sub-committee that planned the reception, one was certain of an invitation to the reception. Although I have dealt with that point in a light-hearted way, it illustrates the need for this legislation.

The metropolitan district of Sefton, the authority in which my constituency is situated, is perhaps one of the worst offenders when it comes to secrecy. When the organisation concerned with freedom of information and community rights, Ron Bailey's group, wrote to Sefton asking for its views on the Bill — about access to information and the whole question of open government —it received in reply a memo, signed by the chief executive and sent by mistake, saying, "Send the usual reply to this rubbish."

Sefton refuses to give information over the telephone. It will not tell people how many sub-committees there are and whether they meet in secret. It has a system that denies information to the public and a system that denies the system for denying information. Sefton even has a book called "The Scheme of Delegation," which describes how to avoid enabling the public to find out what it does. The book runs to 50 pages and tells us that there are 14 sub-committees made up of just the chairman or the chairman and the vice chairman. It reveals that there are ad hoc committees and others which comprise the chairman, the vice chairman and the opposition spokesperson.

The list of committees that are closed to the public is amazing. It includes those on parental rights, social services, amalgamation of secondary schools, the disciplinary sub-committee, the consultative committee for staff, the school curriculum sub-committee and the standing sub-committee of the education committee. One of Sefton's committees is open—the accident prevention sub-committee. It is open to avoid any accidental giving of information to the public. The press and public were removed from one of Sefton's sub-committees because it was to consider a list of books that should not be allowed in the public library. A list of 100 books was put before the council. I can understand why the council was embarrassed and conducted the meeting in private, because the list included "When the Wind Blows", by Raymond Briggs, "100 Questions on Pregnancy" by Claire Rayner and novels by Norman Mailer and Graham Greene.

Hon. Members would have to be elected representatives in Sefton to appreciate that authority's secrecy. Even the mayoral selection sub-committee meets in secret. I cannot think why, because the Labour party will not accept a mayoralty in the area, so I imagine that the matter is settled in the Conservative group before the sub-committee meets. The practices that I have listed should be ironed out, but I am not making a political point. Although Sefton is Conservative-controlled, and it does me no harm to criticise it, there are Labour-controlled authorities which are not as bad but getting that way. The practices of some Labour-controlled authorities leave a lot to be desired.

I understand that the city of Salford has a sub-committee for everything. He is called Les Hough, the leader of the council, who has been there for about 25 years. I have a vested interest in the London borough of Tower Hamlets as I live there when in London and pay rates there. It takes almost all of its major decisions in secret. It has sub-committees on policy, health, consumer services and social services, all of which are closed to the public. It has often refused to provide the housing emergency office, now Shelter's empty property unit—of which I used to be the chair—with information about planning and empty houses. It has failed to reply to questionnaires from the Town and Country Planning Association, refused to provide information concerning planning matters and declined consultation with the public. Tower Hamlets was alone among the London boroughs in not giving such information. I could go on at length about how it does not fulfil its responsibilities in communicating with the public, so enabling them to participate with councillors and officers.

[Mr. Allan Roberts]

The Bill is about partnership. It defends democracy and supports local authorities. It gives them strength, although some of them do not realise that that is what we are at. At this juncture in the history of local government, they need all the support that they can get.

Mrs. Angela Rumbold (Mitcham and Morden): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on presenting the Bill. Like other hon. Members, I shall endeavour to confine my speech to the workings of local government and not stray into other issues such as quangos and other authorities that might follow the example of local authorities if the Bill becomes law. I am acutely aware that hon. Members can be accused of standing in a glasshouse and throwing bricks. That is a dangerous practice at the best of times.

There is some surprise at the fact that the Bill has to be introduced. Although I am convinced that it will greatly improve the workings of local government, it is a pity that local government has not adopted the suggested alterations and practices voluntarily. I should like to quote the chief executive of Bradford city council, Mr. Gordon Moore. He said:

> "Left to its own devices local government would never voluntarily accept the freedom of information proposals in Robin Squire's Bill because they strike at the heart of the paternalistic 'we know best' attitude which dominates town halls."

I am afraid that that is all too true. Many of us who have spent many years in local government share Mr. Moore's view, probably more than others who have not had experience of the workings of a council.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch said, many of the proposals are unnecessary for many councils that already practise a good deal of what the Bill suggests, but some authorities do not admit the public to their sub-committees. Although such meetings might fall within the exceptions set down in paragraph (g), of the schedule, it is important to clarify the matter beyond reasonable doubt.

The Bill can do nothing but improve the workings of local authorities and the relationship between the council and its electorate. When I was a councillor, I thought that the image of councillors was poor to say the least. A substantial cause of that was the simple inability of local authorities to communicate with their public. That was especially true of contentious issues such as school closures, changes in social services and that awful word that local government and, I suspect, the Government use — rationalisation — which covers a multitude of sins. Admitting the public and giving them the same bits of paper as elected representatives will at least illustrate the difficulties of coherent and sensible policy-making.

The Bill will create one problem to which I draw the attention of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch because he will encounter it at the Committee stage, which I am certain the Bill will reach. For nine years I was the elected member of a London borough. At this point I should say that I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) will not take amiss what I am going to say. In common with many other authorities of both political persuasions — I emphasise that this involves authorities of both political persuasions—there is a committee of this London borough whose membership is restricted to the majority party. These committees are generally classified under the name of leader's committee, consultative committee, co-ordinating committee. For seven years I was a member of such a committee. I believe that it is still in existence as a properly constituted committee under the standing orders of that council. It attracts attendance allowances and officers of the council attend and advise committee members. The committee has agendas. Minutes are taken and its proceedings are reported to meetings of the full council.

The purpose of the committee is to enable discussion to take place of sensitive policy and strategy matters. Therefore it would possibly be included in paragraph (g) of the schedule. However, the agendas are not published, except to members of the committee. During my time on the committee no other council member ever saw the agendas. The minutes were never circulated to members of the committee nor to members of the council. They were simply signed by the chairman at the beginning of each meeting. I do not believe that the chairman ever read the minutes. At least when I chaired that committee I have to confess that I did not read the minutes. The reports to the council merely gave the names of the members who attended the committee meetings and the dates upon which meetings were held. As far as I am aware, all this is perfectly in order. I do not believe that if the Bill becomes law it will be in order, although I can think of ways in which it will be possible to conduct business without the spirit of the Bill being transgressed.

There are both merits and demerits in the system. The merits are that sensitive issues relating to future policy planning, finance, and personnel can be discussed frankly in a small forum and the advice of officers can be obtained. The hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) referred to issues that are brought before local authorities where, of necessity, there is a variety and range of solutions. Some are more palatable than others and need to be discussed at one stage or another. I contend that the possible solutions should be looked at by everybody on the council, not simply by some members of the council. However, they can be aired in a particular forum and a collective agreement between the officers and members concerned can be reached. Early warnings can be given. This is particularly important for those who are responsible for the work of the council, simply by virtue of being in the majority. Warnings of problems that can arise can be given to members, who then discuss them with their colleagues. This possibly helps to facilitate the management and passage of the work of a committee.

However, in my view the demerits are these. Under this system only a few members are privy to the discussions. While my experience was that these matters were always presented to full meetings of the majority party members, privately this system was open to the unscrupulous caucus treatment that was outlined by the hon. Member for Bootle. It is a dangerous practice. Essentially, this committee was a non-executive forum. In other words, it could not make any decisions. It could merely discuss them. Therefore, nothing was ever decided. However, it was held and still is held at the expense of ratepayers because it attracts attendance allowances and takes up a vast amount of the time of officials. Very often I queried whether this was either desirable or necessary. A source of constant irritation was that it provided a closed forum for the expression of both paternalism and prejudice that was not always a true reflection of the views of the members of the majority party, let alone anybody else, and was very much open to misinterpretation by the officers who attended those meetings.

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): Would not my hon. Friend agree with me that one has to draw a very clear distinction between private meetings at which a group of members of a particular party discuss their policy—for example, how they might develop a strategy towards a particular issue—and private meetings where they are made privy to information that is not then made available to the other members of an authority? Is not that the crucial distinction? Ought we not to recognise that there may well be circumstances in which a group of council members will quite legitmately want to meet privately to discuss the formulation of policy and that that should not be excluded? Indeed, paragraph (g) of the schedule makes it quite clear that it is to be included. It is the conceding of information from all members of the authority that we ought to try to prevent.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) for drawing my attention to that point and I accept it absolutely. There is no question but that it is very important for members of majority parties on any council to have the opportunity to discuss policy strategy and the broad outline of what is in the best interests of their ratepayers. My question is whether it is right that there should be these small groups of people who attend properly constituted council committee meetings that attract attendance allowances and that are always advised by officers of the council, thus giving those committee members the privilege of expert advice and information that is not always available to other members of the council—not even to all members of the majority party, let alone to members of minority parties. That I believe to be questionable. I am absolutely certain that paragraph (g) of the schedule to my hon. Friend's Bill covers most of the matters that are undesirable for public consumption, but I query whether only certain elected council members should have access to information, in the interests of better local decision-making. This is an exceedingly important point to which we must turn our attention.

On the availability of agendas and notices of meetings to the public, I make a plea that comes from the heart: that the language used in agendas, reports and even notices of meetings to the general public ought to be in the kind of language that the average man or woman can understand. Local government has its own special language. In education, for example, unless on understands what initials stand for—I cite the CLEA, the AMA, the RTA, the NAS/UWT, the NATFHE—one can be in very considerable difficulty in reading a report. In my very first year on a local council I remember reading agendas and papers wondering what on earth certain words meant. I came across the word "varnd" which I had never met before. I dared not ask either an official or a colleague what it meant in case I was thought to be too stupid for words—which I probably was. Therefore I looked up the word in a dictionary, but that did not help me very much—at least, not in the context of the use of that word in agendas and reports. It was a long time before that word meant anything to me. It is important that those who write reports, notices and agendas should ensure that they can be understood by the average person if they are seeking to inform the public of what is going on.

I chaired a committee for a year and there was always at least one item on the agenda that I never understood. Explanations were given to me, again in terms that I could not understand. I never believed that the people who read the agendas and attended the committee understood such items. However, we always got through the agendas and the items were always passed. I often wonder what happened to those decisions. They cannot possibly have meant anything much to anyone.

I am not surprised that the Association of Metropolitan Authorities has some reservations. On clause 3, I received a letter which said:

"Additionally, a further exemption might be required to cover cases where reports are simply not available three days before the meeting takes place."

That is yet another area of aggravation for many people who work in local government.

Mr. Squire: My hon. Friend may be interested to know that one of the amendments that has already been suggested, which I did not discuss in detail in my opening speech, relates to that point. There is a suggestion that an additional clause should be submitted which would have the effect of covering items which, for exceptional reasons, were not available in three days. If that were the result of sickness, for example, the reason would be noted on the face of the book.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. It is important, because many reports and agendas require more than three days for the people involved in the decision-making to have an opportunity to understand and consider them and if necessary research their responses.

On clause 4 the same briefing from the Association of Metropolitan Authorities said:

"The Bill provides that a large number of documents will be confidential and therefore excluded from public scrutiny,"— that is right—

"but this means that in future every document will have to be examined and a decision made as to whether one or the other of the 'confidentiality' reasons applies. This task will be time-consuming."

That caused me concern. Of course it will be time-consuming, but is not that a great argument for the people who write reports having the discipline of thinking carefully about the length and nature of what they write?

Mr. Allan Roberts: I have heard the same criticism from the AMA, but that is the case now, anyway. Officers writing reports decide whether they should allow them to be available to the press and public. They stamp them and make a recommendation. Two agendas are produced. Agenda B is dealt with at the end and taken in secret. The officers decide which report should go in part A of the agenda and which in part B. Much of what is put in part B is put there for the wrong reasons and would not be there under this legislation. It would not be any more time-consuming, as that task is performed now.

Mrs. Rumbold: I agree. I hope that clause 4 will be put into effect so that officers' minds will be concentrated on the essentials that need to be included in order to facilitate sensible decision-making.

I fully understand that there are areas in local government which can, for one reason or another, never be discussed at a public meeting. Such areas relate to the personal lives of employees and people who live within the authority and whose business comes before local authority committees. There is no intention here to obstruct the sensible working of local government. The Bill will enable people who live in the area governed by a local council to understand with much greater clarity what is being done and how it is being done. That is essential if we are trying, as I hope we are, to improve the relationship between the general public and local government.

It is only by doing that that we can possibly attract people with broader interests, but less time than is presently required of such people, to stand as members of local government so that they can give the benefit of their time, attention and possibly greater experience to the matters that come before local councils, all of which affect our lives in one way or another and all of which are vital. That is in no way intended to be derogatory of the many men and women throughout Britain who devote an enormous amount of their time, expertise and lives to the good running of their local authorities.

Clause 6 asks the local authority to publish a list of the names and addresses of all members of the authority. I should want to couple with that a list of the wards for which those members are the representatives and the committees on which they serve. I do not want to deny local ward councillors their effectiveness, but unfortunately it is a fact of life that many people do not know who their local representatives are on the council. It may be true that not many people in a constituency know who their local Member of Parliament is, but at least the local Member of Parliament has the opportunity, if he so wishes, to rectify that by seeking to inform people through letters, publicity and so on that he exists and what he stands for. The local councillor seems to be rather more obscure and it is important that local communities know who represents their ward.

It would be wrong not to mention my local authority of the London borough of Merton before I sit down. Every meeting of its council is open to the public and I pay tribute to it for that. It sets a good example. Would that every borough were so good. I suggest that in the adoption of the Bill, through its Second Reading today, and I hope through its successful Committee stage, all councils will be able to follow that excellent example.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): First, I join in the congratulations expressed to the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on his bravery in using his high place in the ballot for private Members' Bills to choose this Bill with which he had been associated in its previous lives. It is a good thing in a way that he has chosen it because he comes from a background of local government service. He was a former local government leader in the London borough of Sutton. If any hon. Member is able to persuade the, for the time being, majority party of the Bill's merits, it should be him.

It is important to stress, as we have in this debate, that the Bill has always had, in whatever form it has been drafted, all-party support. I hope that the Bill will receive a Second Reading today and will ultimately take its place on the statute book. If that happens, the hon. Member for Hornchurch will have completed the task that was begun by the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) about two years ago. The hon. Member for Bootle lit the torch by bringing the draft of a Bill before the House. I was able to pick up the torch, as it were, and was given leave in June 1984 to introduce the measure by way of a ten-minute Bill. That measure is now before us in a more substantive form. It has been revised and improved and is now even more worthy of general support.

It is appropriate to recognise the efforts that are made to keep the House and the public informed of the desperate need for legislation of the sort that is before us. Mention should therefore be made of the Community Rights Project, which has its headquarters only about a yard outside my constituency in Waterloo road. Ron Bailey is the main worker for the project and he has been assisted in his campaign for this legislation by Daryl Upsall and others. The project has kept us on our toes. It has chivvied us over the past few days, perhaps even over-exhaustively, to ensure that no opportunity is lost and that everyone possible is present to support the Bill.

It is against that background, and on behalf of the Liberal party, that I give full support to the provisions in the Bill, which in their respective and different ways will enable local government to return to the principles for which and on which it was established. Its purpose was to bring government closer to the people and to allow the people to participate in what is done in their name.

The struggle among those who are elected can be generalised perhaps as the struggle between authoritarianism and libertarianism. It is the struggle between those who believe that when they take authority, or, rather, are given it — that is the essence of democracy — for a temporary period they are entitled to impose and those who believe that they should always act accountably in a representative capacity. Those who are elected to act on behalf of others should be accountable, and the more accountable they are, the better. A parallel premise is that information and knowledge are good. Democracy relies on information, and the more information that is made available, the better. Information provides a safety net and is not a danger.

There have been many attempts to open up government and I hope that another attempt will be made in another area of government later today when the House considers the practices of water authorities. The leader of the Liberal party, my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), introduced a Bill last year to get rid of secrecy in national Government. In doing so he followed the excellent earlier attempt of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud). It can be said generally that there has developed an increasingly urgent feeling — this can certainly be said of the Liberal party — that every effort should be made to ensure that government is open. Nothing is more ludicrous than when actions are taken in the name of others at meetings that are closed to the public.

We in this place set a good example. The proceedings of the House and its Committees are open to the public, as they should be. It is that practice that we seek to translate to local government, where over the years, especially since 1960, more and more councils have resiled from the practice of open meetings. They have done so by moving more and more work from committees to sub-committees which are formed by delegated groups of councillors. That has happened since 1960 when the first Bill on this subject was introduced by the right hon. Lady who is now the Prime Minister when she was a Back Bencher, in her first speech to the House. Councils have taken the view that, with the formation of smaller groups they can close their doors on the public. The doors of councils have been closed increasingly and it is only of late that the extent to which they have been closed has been realised, together with the necessity to burst them open.

The hon. Member for Hornchurch has rightly paid tribute to the three authorities of Brent, Bradford and Derbyshire but he was not quite accurate in his description of their political status. It is interesting that there is no overall political control of the Bradford and Brent authorities. Lack of overall political control does not necessarily imply that there is good behaviour in local government, but I believe that it makes it more likely.

Bradford has done an excellent job in opening the doors of the council to the public. The authority has allowed its activities to be reported and written about. A booklet is available entitled "Bradford City Council Behind Open Doors". It has put its officers at the service of this cause and they have travelled to many different areas. They were present when the three party group leaders of Bradford city council came to receive freedom of information awards this month from the Campaign for Freedom of Information. It has produced a code of practice on public access to documents and generally has given a sterling lead.

Brent is another good example. There is no overall political control in Brent, indeed, the party with most councillors is in opposition. The Conservative group rules but only with the support of my three Brent Liberal colleagues. On this issue the three Liberal members of the Brent authority are equally keen to ensure that Brent retains the principle of open government.

The third authority to which the hon. Member for Hornchurch referred was Derbyshire, which is not a split authority in political terms.

ILEA deserves recognition for the steps that it has taken to open its doors to the public. In other respects it can be criticised but in many areas of its activity it has made itself accountable to the public. It has done a good job and has set an example. That has also been recognised by an award for its efforts over the past year.

There are other good examples of open government, especially in local authorities where there is no overall political control. More and more councils do not have single party government and my party believes, as I do personally, that that is in many ways a good thing. It means that the tyranny of the numerical majority, which can often be contrary to the interests of the individual, is stopped. However, the battle still remains to be fought. Many of the provisions set out in the Bill offer a framework for the many and various stages of the battle.

Clause 1 deals with admission to meetings. That is obviously important because without the right of attendance one does not know what is going on. Some authorities allow the public to attend meetings but not to see documents while others allow the public to see documents but not to attend meetings. Some authorities prevent the public from attending meetings and from seeing documents. They are the worst offenders. There is a need for general improvement and the Bill provides ways of achieving exactly that.

Clause 2 seeks to provide access to minutes. Even such a small element of local government activity can be open to considerable abuse. I received a letter in August 1984 from Willie Hamilton, a borough councillor from the east Yorkshire borough of Beverley, which is commonly known as Beverley borough council. He complained about the abuse of the council in its failure to produce minutes of meetings of its committees and sub-committees for verification and signing at the next or following meeting, which is a requirement that is laid down by the Local Government Act 1972. Those who support the Bill believe that that Act was the second step in developing what was done in 1960.

Apparently, the Beverley councillors receive an agenda for each council meeting and a record of what happened at the previous meeting, but only at the very last moment. It seems that they can make alterations to the minutes only by tabling formal amendments to be discussed at the following meeting. This means that if minutes are inaccurate or, even worse, falsified, it is impossible for minority parties to amend them. Beverley borough council was composed in August 1984 of 53 councillors, 36 of them being Tories with 11 Liberals, five Labour and one independent. Since 1974 the Tories at Beverley have been able effectively to prevent any corrections of minutes.

Clauses 3 and 4 deal with access to documents. I received a letter from Mr. Peter McBride of Tunbridge Wells in June 1984. He sent me a copy of a newspaper article from a publication entitled News in Focus of 3/4 April. The article described the Kent war emergency handbook, which has been produced by Kent county council and paid for by Kent ratepayers. It advises on what one should do in civil defence terms if, as it describes, "the bomb drops". It goes on to say, amongst other things, that a nice cup of tea will be needed. That is probably a slight underestimate of the response of most people in such circumstances and of the action that they would find appropriate.

Mr. McBride wrote and asked whether he could have a copy of the handbook referred to in the article. It was denied him on the ground that it was not for general issue and was only for those trained in civil defence. I have not read the handbook, but if one of its major conclusions stresses the need for a cup of tea, a kettle and social amenities in the shelters not much training can be required. Only investigative detective work by a reporter who eventually managed to get hold of the information and put it in a paper which was distributed freely led to the public being given the information that it should have had straightaway.

One could give further and worse examples. One such bad example involves the Labour-controlled Southwark borough council. It overcharged some of its tenants when they exercised their right to buy. It refused to publish or to divulge the names and addresses of those involved and it refused to tell those who had been overcharged. Former tenants had to guess whether they had been overcharged and write to the council. The council said that if they were right and they had been overcharged they would receive their money back. That is ludicrous. The information was made public only when the South London Press published on its front page a list of all the addresses, which meant that the malevolent as well as the aggrieved could discover who was about to receive a windfall, although in reality few people received any cash because the difference was made up using mortgages. It was left to the local paper to leak a so-called confidential document. The public cannot be expected to fully enjoy their rights when this sort of behaviour goes on.

Such behaviour does no good to local government. I hold no brief for the Labour party in Southwark; indeed, the contrary is true. Such behaviour, however, does no good to the status of local government anywhere. I cannot believe either that it enhances the prospects of success for the majority party in such councils.

I shall concentrate on the clause which deals with access for councillors. My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) has direct personal experience from his local council of further instances. The subject has been publicised recently since my colleague, the leader of the Liberal group on Hackney council, took the council to court because it refused to allow him access to information which he said that he needed. I refer to Councillor Gamper, a member of the housing services committee, the public services committee and chairman of the Shoreditch district housing committee. That was his status when he sought to see the minutes of the direct labour sub-committee.

Hackney borough council refused him access to those minutes and to the sub-committee's meetings. On 14 November Mr. Justice Lloyd, in a well publicised judgment, said:

"Hackney London Borough Council had acted unlawfully by denying the applicant, a Liberal councillor, access to the meetings and the documents of the direct labour organisation (DLO) subcommittees in that they had failed to ask themselves the correct question, namely, whether the applicant had a need to know information in order properly to perform his duties as a councillor and by denying the applicant such access the council reached a decision that no reasonable council could have reached on asking themselves the correct question."

That was a trail-blazing decision which has already had repercussions. David Gamper tells me that he has now been able to attend for the first time the direct labour sub-committee which has produced information which is useful to him. It is not all information that he can use to attack the council. For example, he has been able to establish that the council did what it was required to do in the tendering process by submitting 60 per cent. of its work to competitive tendering. He has also discovered that none of the non-direct labour organisations in fact tendered because they would have been required to use some of the restrictive practices operated by the direct labour organisation. In many ways Mr. Gamper is now in a better position to do his job and to advise people.

Mr. Ernie Roberts (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): The Hackney borough council has adopted a policy of decentralising housing management. That information is now readily available not only to all councillors, as it should be, but to the citizens because their housing services and conditions are affected. It is not good enough to argue that a councillor needs information in order to attack the council. That should be no reason for obtaining information. Information should be given for the purpose of assisting the council and the citizens to solve their problems.

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Member is right. I hope that I made it clear that information is needed not only to make an attack on the majority party but so that individuals can be better represented.

Hackney has complied with the judgment and the committee is now open. The same pressure is now on elsewhere. In Newcastle the Liberal leader, John Shipley, acting in the light of the Hackney judgment, told the council that he would take legal action if it kept the policy and resources working group closed to all opposition members. I agree with his claim that he has a right to know. But the leader of the council refused.

The Bill is necessary because some authorities do not consider themselves bound by the implications of the judgment in the case of Mr. Gamper and Hackney even though there are examples of movement, as in East Devon district council, where the council has changed its rules in response to the judgment.

One important and worrying aspect has come to light. It appears that in Hackney there was pressure on the majority Labour group from the Tory group to appeal against the judgment. That is not the only example of conspiracy between the two largest parties to exclude other parties from knowledge. That is dangerous and equally undesirable. I am glad to say that Hackney resisted the pressure. It would be appalling if, to keep Buggins' turn by the two major parties alternating and being always in the know, the smaller parties and independents were denied access to information.

Many councils need a Bill such as this to make them do what we believe they should have done a long time ago to achieve open government. Sutton council is still not perfect even though the hon. Member for Hornchurch is in the vanguard and waving the flag. I am told that a submission from Sutton to the Department of Education and Science about the transfer of a nursery school to a Sutton infants school recently was not made available to the local ward councillor, to the leader of the opposition or to the opposition education spokesman. In Colwyn bay a ward councillor was not allowed to see documents or to attend meetings to discuss a waste disposal site in her ward.

There was a controversial battle in Cambridge for many years over the redevelopment of the Kite, an old part of the centre of Cambridge. The redevelopment scheme was never discussed in the presence of the leader of the opposition on Cambridge council.

The television programme "A Week in Politics", made after the Hackney judgment, rightly criticised other councils as well. It took examples from councils where each of the three major parties has failed. The programme revealed that the redevelopment plan for the heart of Bromley—a major and controversial proposal involving a relief road—was discussed at a meeting attended only by Conservative councillors and employees of the building firm Wimpey. The Tory leader of Bromley council had the effrontery to say on that programme:

"There has been no secrecy."

That was in spite of the fact that the council committee that agreed the town centre relief road document met in secret. That is unacceptable. A member of the Heart of Bromley residents' association appeared on the programme and pointed out that the people of Bromley heard only suspicions and rumours. They were given no facts. That is bad for democracy.

To show my impartiality, I will give an example from the London borough of Hammersmith and Fulham, where Labour is the largest party, but there is a non-Labour administration including two Liberals. The Labour party is excluded from the policy committee meetings that make many of the key decisions in Hammersmith and Fulham. If my persuasive powers have not yet managed to convince my two colleagues and the Conservatives on that council to change their ways, we need the Bill to make them do so.

The Bill is an attempt to correct many of the failures of local government over the years. Secrecy has become more prevalent and there are more tyrants in the town halls. Councillors were not elected to be tyrants. Every time that a decision is taken in secret, there are more rumours and more suspicions. The confidence of the electorate, reflected in turnouts at local elections, is further sapped.

All of us who support the Bill hope that it will have a speedy passage so that the concept that people in local government should be able to think that they were elected to govern in secret will be shown to be unacceptable. The law must make sure that such secrecy will be forbidden.

11.12 am

Mr. Charles Irving (Cheltenham): I apologise to the House for having been absent for part of the debate. My absence was in connection with substantial improvements in the catering Department which I am sure will be welcome to the House. Let us hope that those talks will be as fruitful as we hope that the Bill will be.

I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on having the foresight to introduce legislative proposals that are topical, sensible and, above all, conducive to much more openness in local government.

I had the honour to be a member of the Gloucestershire county council for 33 years and I have been a member of Cheltenham borough council for the past 36 years. So I can claim, with some modesty, experience of the different trends in local government over the years. I am glad to say that in my constituency, as in many others, there has been a vast improvement in the way in which the matters that we are discussing have been handled.

Although there have been many attempts since the 1960 Act to improve and tighten up the rules governing public access to local government meetings and documentation and, more particularly, the rules governing exemption and confidentiality, it is lamentable and, I believe, a self-imposed denial of the very freedoms that, as democrats, we claim to champion, that, in spite of consistent cross-party support, Parliament has failed to open up the functions and operations of both local and central Government.

With the exception of the improvements made in the Local Government Act 1972, the cause of democratic development of local authorities has ground to a halt. Indeed, in the absence of further legislation and guidance in these matters, there has been a temptation and a tendency in councils throughout the country to restrict the accessibility of information, to deny the public access to certain carefully defined meetings and to encourage the evolution of "political groupings" and so-called sub-committees, hidden from the public eye and often off limits to opposition councillors.

Decisions are frequently made behind closed doors and are often founded on information that is not made generally available. Those decisions are then rubber-stamped by committee and council meetings where opposition or even criticism is muted, if only because of a lack of knowledge or information relevant to those decisions.

President Madison of the United States said in 1822:

> "Knowledge will forever govern ignorance, and a people who mean to be their own governors must arm themselves with the power which knowledge gives."

How right those words were and how relevant they are to today's debate.

I am reminded of the ring of confidence exuded by a councillor in a well-known seaside town who devised a novel way of making sure that the public and many of his colleagues were barred. He made all his decisions on the telephone. The committees never met, but the deliberations by phone were reported to the council and approved.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Irving: No, I never do. My hon. and learned Friend may talk to me on the telephone.

Nottinghamshire has 39 secret sub-committees and North Bedfordshire has 16. I do not cast any special indictment on those authorities. There are so many more, but I must not take the time of the House to list them all.

I am glad to say with some conviction that my own borough council has a comparatively good record, though, even there, some of our new committee chairmen find great difficulty in giving a consise answer to a probing question. Of course, that sometimes happens here.

In one authority in Wales, the straying animals sub-committee and the highly confidential slaughterhouse sub-committee conduct their interesting affairs in secret, protected from the outside world's prying eyes.

I do not know what the members of a slaughterhouse sub-committee do, but I imagine that they slaughter. I cannot see why they should have the temerity not to let people know whom they are slaughtering. It might make interesting reading. I am sorry that that is happening in Wales. It is such a lovely place. I do not want to get slaughtered there after making this speech. Perhaps I will keep away for a few months.

There can be no excuse in a modern western democracy for persisting with a cloak of secrecy around so much that need not be secret. We all recognise that there are highly sensitive affairs of state which, in the public interest, must be kept confidential. Those are properly protected in the Bill.

If we are to judge by the turnout in successive local elections, the public appear to be uninterested in who runs their town halls. The reasons behind moves to restrict access to meetings and documents seem in most cases to be extremely tenuous and such moves alienate the electors who feel distanced and irritated by secretative behaviour. That leads inevitably to suspicion and unease, and ultimately to a lack of confidence on the part of the public. Questions arise about councillors' motivations and intentions, and whether council meetings reveal the whole truth.

In supporting the Bill, I welcome particularly the "Reasons for Confidentiality" which form the schedule to the Bill. A clear and comprehensive list of rules relating to cases where meetings or documents should or may be restricted must be of vital importance, and is long overdue. If enacted, the regulations would make clear where people stand, and how far councillors may go in the area of confidentiality. It would remove misunderstanding and suspicion, which are currently the order of the day.

Equally important is the aim of the Bill to open up sub-committee meetings to the press and the public. It is the proliferation of those sub-committees — they may be representative of or confined to one party — that has contributed to the ever-growing facade of secrecy that threatens to develop into a vicious circle or confidentiality trap into which councillors, through fear or mischief, may unwittingly or knowingly fall.

I recollect a letter that was sent to me showing that a certain authority had 34 sub-committees, none of which was open to the public and none of which reported to the council. They produced only unreported minutes. That was not a particularly good record. The proliferation of sub-committees, which may or may not be representative, is a danger. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) referred to one party in that respect. The practice may lead to the exclusion of factions that have a useful contribution to make.

The Bill is moderate and reasonable and should commend itself to most of the moderate and reasonable people in the House. I hope that it will have as much support as possible from the Government. In the long run there is nothing to be gained from secrecy in Government, and for those few areas where confidentiality needs to be maintained for reasons of law, public interest or personal privacy, it is essential that the credibility of local authorities should also be maintained. In my view, the key to that credibility lies in the maximum possible disclosure of the operations and affairs of those authorities.

I welcome the Bill as a measure that recognises the right of citizens in a democracy to learn about the activities of their local authorities. As democratic representatives and as a Parliament we have a duty to defend and promote the public interest. That is why I am more than glad to support the Bill.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I can only echo the well-chosen remarks of the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving), although I shall not echo his refusal to be interrupted, or his propensity to speak on the telephone to the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn), lest any conversation be sexually misconstrued.

I echo the welcome to the Bill given by the hon. Member for Cheltenham, and the congratulations that have been extended by all the previous speakers to the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire), not only on winning a place in the ballot, which requires no great skill, but on choosing to introduce a Bill dealing with access to information in local government. It is an extremely important issue, and the Bill, which is well-presented, deserves to pass on to the statute book.

The Bill, which finishes in Hornchurch, comes to us via Bootle and Bermondsey. Therefore, I widen my congratulations to include the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts). The Bill is important as a matter of principle, because open government is an essential right of our citizens. Obviously, that right applies to both national and local government. Open government —the right to know—is basic to democracy. I should like to see the principle extended to central Government. I regard the Bill as a trial measure advancing the cause of freedom of information in a practical and straightforward way.

The local power élite can be a very closed and secretive organisation; indeed, it can become a self-perpetuating and self-protecting conspiracy against the people. That can happen particularly where majorities are large and where it suits the convenience of the governing party. My remarks cover both major parties in this House.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey suggested that the right to know is encouraged only where there are hung councils. Hung councils operate under many disadvantages, particularly in regard to decision-making. Some rather sordid political manoeuvres tend to be involved, yet I have to admit that the pressure to make information public accumulates in regard to councils where the party balance is close. However, the principle of access to information should apply to all councils as a matter of right.

Local government is often more secretive than national Government, partly because there is not the same insistent pressure for information from the local media. At one time local newspapers were highly competitive in bringing information to the public. I recall the old joke about the visitor arriving in Bradford. Not being sure of the name of the local paper, he approached the paper boy and said, "Unfortunately, I have forgotten the name of the paper"——

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): The Telegraph and Argus.

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentlman. I know the paper only too well. I was referring to my joke character. The visitor went up to the paper boy and asked for one of the local papers whose name began with an A. The lad said, "They all begin with t — there's t' Telegraph, t'Argus and t'Observer". They are now amalgamated into one newspaper. That is taking place everywhere. There is a local monopoly of news which has made newspapers less trenchant, less inquiring and less vigorous. It has had the effect of heightening the secrecy of local government. Information is the fuel of democracy. Therefore, it must be widely and freely available as a matter of right.

The prospects for the Bill appear to be very good and I wish it every success. It deserves to pass and must pass. It has the support of a large number of local authorities. In the document "Secrets File No. 9 — Central and Eastern England Edition", there is an impressive list of local authorities supporting the Bill. It is supported by 150 Members of Parliament. I hope that it will be encouraged on its way by the Government. It is good to have with us today the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), for whom we all have a high regard. So many angels hover around the head of this Bill that I have become a little suspicious. Is the legislation strong enough with that amount of support?

I should have liked the Bill's provisions to extend to the ad hoc authorities that cover many aspects of our lives and subjects of great importance to the citizen. The ad hoc authorities do not have a clear democratic base and, therefore, do not rest on the basis of public support. It is more important to know what the ad hoc authorities are doing and to have access to information about what they are doing. This is particularly the case with health authorities. It has been suspected that political appointments are made to health authorities, and that suspicion arises especially when there is a purge of chairmen and they are replaced by former Conservative candidates. It could be thought that those appointments are made to further privatisation and to stifle the natural discontent that would be ventilated against any Health Service spending cuts or any failure to keep spending in line with the needs not only of medicine but of the population.

Often there is a fetish for secrecy within these ad hoc authorities which is inimical to the basis of democracy. For example, the Grimsby health authority proposed, for no good reason as far as I understand it, to make disclosure of confidential information a dismissable offence and to write that provision into the code of conduct and conditions of employment. It was as though the authority was trying to erect an Official Secrets Act. Such steps are being taken when we at the centre are trying to dismantle an Official Secrets Act which is far too powerful. That legislation is being used as a sledgehammer to crack a nut, and that "nut" can be interpreted in several ways.

I believe that it is totally undesirable to write into the conditions of employment of health authority employees an insistence on confidentiality, without defining what constitutes "confidential information". Is "confidential information" the condition of Mrs. Bloggs in ward 3? Are the internal arrangements an authority can make when allocating scarce resources or making cuts the types of matter that are best discussed publicly? Those matters are best known publicly so people can check on the authority's exercise of power. One cannot help but feel that the desire to insist on confidentiality in such a way is due principally to a wish to suit the convenience of the organisations and their officials. That is not right. We are using a blunderbuss when a slap on the wrist is all that is necessary.

The right to know about the activities of ad hoc authorities is as crucial as the right to know about the activities of elective local government. Unfortunately, the Bill does not deal with ad hoc authorities. It deals with elected local authorities. Indeed, if we go on at length talking about these elected authorities, we shall frustrate an attempt later in the day to open up the activities of the water authorities, and that opening up is certainly desirable.

The Bill poses no problems to people in Grimsby. I was happy to see Grimsby borough council's response to the "Local Government Access to Information Survey" carried out by the local government and health advisory group. According to the council's reply, and as I know from experience of the council, access to information is exactly what one would like it to be. There are open committees, and sub-committees are closed only on grounds that are permissible under the schedule to this legislation. That is the most for which we can ask. On the question about public access to minutes, the town clerk replied:

> "There is no provision under Standing Orders relating to public access to minutes, etc. A copy of the monthly minutes is, however, lodged with the Central Reference Library and is available for inspection on request. Additionally, copies may be had from the Town Clerk on request, on repayment; in fact, a substantial number of copies are supplied to regular subscribers on this basis. Copies of agendas (but not reports) are supplied to all members of the public attending meetings."

There is access to information and availability of information in the way required by this legislation. I am glad that this system operates in Grimsby and that the legislation's proposals will cause no problems to the town.

I support the Bill's basic principles. As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey said so eloquently, secrecy breeds uncertainty. Secrecy breeds rumours, circulates trivia and leads to suspicion, which is harmful to good and efficient democracy. Openness forces authorities to make better, more responsible and more clear-cut decisions. The most important aspect is the simple principle that democracy implies a right by the people to know what their representatives are doing on their behalf.

Providing open access to information might be an awkward task for councillors or, indeed, for the Labour party in local government, especially when Labour has a huge majority. I can imagine that open access to information would be frustrating for an incoming Labour Government if this legislation operated nationally, because powerful pressure groups would use that right to gather ammunition against the Government, just as awkward individuals and pressure groups are likely to use the right to know to gather information against a councillor or party of which they disapprove for political reasons. That will not be abuse of the legislation. It is an inevitable consequence, because we have to put up with and accept this principle which is so important, right and central to democracy.

I hope that other hon. Members will make briefer speeches than I have, because we shall have the opportunity today to strike two blows for open government. In a sense, Friday is the Back Benchers' playground, and words can expand to fill the available space. If they do so, we shall frustrate an important Bill on the water authorities. I do not wish to do so. If we are succinct and sharp and back this Bill to the hilt, we shall be able to achieve two major advances in one day.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): This is one of those rare and agreeable occasions when there appears to be general agreement among all parties about the desirability of a measure. On looking back over some 50 years in public life, I am convinced that excessive secrecy is a major enemy of good government at any level. It militates against the development of a responsible democracy. As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said, it leads to suspicion, to misunderstanding and, perhaps most important of all to the communities local government serves, to bad decisions.

The Bill is concerned with access to information in local government. Reference has been made to the effect of excessive secrecy on central Government. I recall particular instances in my political life when central Government have inflicted great injury on the national interest and even on the national honour as a result of Ministers and civil servants keeping Parliament and, therefore, the people in the dark.

I have in mind two appalling cases where the deliberate suppression of facts had devastating consequences that could have been avoided — as those who took the decisions knew — had Parliament been made aware of them. One was the enforced deportation of hundreds of thousands of Soviet citizens at the end of the war and for two years after to certain death or slavery in Siberian prison camps. Parliament was kept completely unaware of what was done and the civil servants responsible minuted that there would be a row if Parliament were told.

The other case was the knowledge of Cabinet Ministers that oil sanctions against Rhodesia were being breached and the concealment of that. The Royal Navy was made to stand guard in the Beira straits which gave the world the impression that we were doing our duty and preventing oil from reaching the rebel Smith Government when, of course, it was coming from elsewhere. As a result, the rebellion continued and led inevitably to a bloody civil war the consequences of which are perhaps not yet ended. I can think of other examples.

The Bill is not concerned with great questions of external policy, but the principle is the same. If we suffer from the British disease of excessive secrecy at the top, it is not surprising to find it throughout the administrative structure and operating at local government level.

The Bill has been needed for a long time. I shall not go over the case that was put so eloquently by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) and in the excellent speeches that followed. I am in broad agreement with everything that has been said so far. The best and most responsible people in local government in all political parties, dedicated to the service of their communities would also agree. I am delighted to find that three local authorities are already implementing the spirit of the Bill before it has been enacted by Parliament. The Conservative leader on the Bradford city council, Councillor Ronnie Farley, has said:

"Local Government should have nothing to fear from public accountability. Only the incompetent and prejudiced need lose any sleep over the Bill."

The Labour leader of the same council has said:

"I look forward to seeing Bradford going beyond the Bill and allowing the public, in certain circumstances, the right to speak at meetings in the near future."

In the rather odd circumstances in which Brent council finds itself — it is now Conservative-controlled — the Conservative leader, Councillor Bob Lacey, has said:

"Particularly where there is a large ethnic minority population, it is essential to have open government and easy access to files in order to allay people's fears that they may be discriminated against. We see the opening-up of files as a logical extension of democracy."

To show how impartial I am in all this, permit me to quote Councillor Bill Lithgoe, the Labour group secretary in Derbyshire:

"As far as I am aware the move towards formalising our position on open government in line with the Bill has produced no administrative headaches, practically no costs"— that is a bonus—

"and no inconvenience in the first six months of implementation, and no request from a member of the public has made the transition unworkable."

Here is local government moving ahead of Parliament. We should recognise that and pay tribute to it. I am asked to say that Essex county council warmly welcomes the Bill. I am not surprised. I have been an Essex Member for about 35 years, and our county has been under both Labour and Conservative control. The council is extremely well and prudently managed. I am not saying that from time to time it is not open to criticism, because all local authorities are, but it has never been criticised by any Government for the management of its affairs or the way that it looks after its ratepayers.

Thus, the best of local government and the most dedicated of its elected representatives are asking us to pass the Bill. Of course we shall need to look at the Bill in Committee. I was delighted when my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch told my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold), in respect of a point upon which the Association of County Councils was critical of the Bill, that that was a matter that was already engaging his attention and that he was sure it could be dealt with in Committee.

There are other measures to be brought before us today and other hon. Members who wish to speak so I shall not detain the House. We are grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch for using his good fortune in the ballot to introduce this timely and welcome measure. We are all agreed that this is one of the most important measures for the improvement of democracy at the grass roots that could have been brought before us.

The Bill will make for healthier and more open local government and, most important of all, it will encourage greater public participation. I hope that it will have a swift transition to the statute book.

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): It is plain from what right hon. and hon. Members have said, and from the way in which they have nodded in agreement with various remarks, that the comment about information being the fuel of democracy is generally accepted. On that basis, it would be a welcome change in local government for the Bill to receive a swift Second Reading and to be enacted fairly quickly.

I speak with some experience of local government. I am still a member of Portsmouth city council and Hampshire county council, and have been since 1971. Portsmouth's motto is "Heaven's light our guide". The city has made great play of that, but the people of Portsmouth and Hampshire might as well look to the heavens for more information because they do not receive it from Portsmouth or Hampshire.

Those two councils are classic examples of a gradual but nevertheless progressive decline in the amount of information that has been forthcoming to the people of that city and county. The reason is that the city and the county have been run by pint-sized, mini-dictators. They see it either as an opportunity to boost their egos or to carry through matters that they have not been successful in doing in their various business enterprises. As a result, the city has suffered irreparable damage.

Information is not forthcoming. Hampshire county council has a committee called the land sub-committee. It sounds as innocuous as some of the committees that hon. Members have mentioned. That committee runs virtually all the affairs of the county council. It has direct control over all the assets of the county council and makes most of the major decisions. The committee is held in private, which has been the case since 1974. Its membership consists of all the chairmen of the county council and two or, sometimes, three members of the minority parties. The minutes of the committee are sometimes not available for public debate for at least two months after the committee meeting. That is ludicrous because on many occasions many of the items it considers deal with the substantial land holdings of the county council, in the form of homes and schools, which are of obvious interest to local residents.

For reasons best known to that committee — the standing orders of the county council have been engineered to make secrecy acceptable — information about those homes, facilities and resources has been denied to the people who must foot the bill and bear the responsibility for the decisions when they are implemented.

The same is true of Portsmouth, where ludicrous positions also arise. When decisions are being made whether to proceed with road schemes or to demolish homes, the last people to be told of such a proposal are those who live in the homes. I make no apology for saying that during the 15 years that I have been involved in local authorities I have deliberately given information to both the press and the people involved. I believe that they have a democratic right to know that things are being done which will affect their lives, properties and futures. Yet they are often the last to be told. If I had not disclosed the information, it would have been months before those people heard about the suggestions. In some instances, if the scheme had been dropped, they would never have known that their properties had been under threat of blight or even demolition.

All hon. Members must be worried about that. All hon. Members must want to expose and change that. We would be kidding ourselves if we were to suggest that everything going on in local government could easily be overturned by this measure, because it will not. I hope that this will be the first of many attempts to open up meetings, reduce secrecy and make information available.

I shall give one classic example concerning housing in Portsmouth. Three elected representatives of a large council estate had the temerity to ask for a report about the condition of the houses on the estate. The matter was of universal concern to everyone living on the estate. The report was produced at the instigation of the housing committee. One of the three elected members for the ward was a member of the housing committee. When the three representatives asked for the report, they were refused access to it on the ground that it would not be in the public interest for them to have it. It is ludicrous that a local authority can produce a report and refuse it to three members, albeit of a minority party, who needed it to act in the interests of the people who elected them. That is only one of many examples of what goes on in Portsmouth. I am proud to represent part of Portsmouth in the House.

There have been many such instances during the past decade. I am not proud to say that secrecy has become more acceptable in those two authorities because of the lack of will of some elected members to get involved. From what I have witnessed, it appears that the majority of the majority party on both councils are happy to pass the buck and the responsibility to a few members. They are willing to sit back and allow the chairman to assume an almighty powerful position, or the leader of the council to assume that he has a god-given right to negotiate on behalf of the whole council and to expect his decision to be rubber-stamped when he deems it the right moment to make it public. That is ludicrous.

I am the only member on Portsmouth city council who represents the alliance party. The council's standing orders were recently changed to prevent me from being able to move a notice of motion, which would have enabled me to prise out more information from the local authority. It was done along the lines suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). There was a conspiracy between the Labour and Conservative groups on the council. They did it because they genuinely like this cosy position, which allows them to carve up matters and to keep secret matters that they wish to keep secret. Recently, they changed the standing orders to prevent members who are in a minority from gaining access to information that they need to do their job.

I do not believe that an elected councillor has a roving commission to examine every file on every issue. However, I have a democratic right, which was given to me by the electorate, to examine any information that I need to enable me to vote and make the right decision. Time and again decisions are made by members who are totally ignorant of the facts. Portsmouth is to be rate capped. Most of the decisions about how Portsmouth will get itself out of the mess that the Government have put it in have been taken behind closed doors. The people will not hear the options that were considered by members of the council or of the officer corps.

In Portsmouth it is ludicrous that the chief officer's group considers a long list of available options to cut expenditure, while the councillors receive only the amended list. When councillors have the cheek to suggest that they have a right to know what was on the original list, we are told that it is of no interest or importance. How more stupid can it get than for a local authority to say to its members, "You are not entitled to know what each chief officer, whom you employ on behalf of the ratepayers, is talking about on behalf of the citizens of the city."?

Mr. Norris: I am sympathetic to the hon. Gentleman's point. Those of us who have been and still are in local government recognise the circumstances that he described. Does he recognise that there are genuine difficulties in setting the parameters for publicity, especially in relation to the work of officers? Unless we are extremely careful in Committee, one of the difficulties that will arise from the Bill is that officers will not feel that they have the liberty to examine all the options. We would not want to deny them that. The hon. Gentleman should address himself to circumstances in which it might be desirable that officers at least should feel that they can discuss among themselves how they should approach a policy or initiative.

Mr. Hancock: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point. Officers must accept that they are as responsible to the citizens of the authority as elected councillors. They must be seen to stand by what they say and do as much as elected councillors. I am sick to death of the way in which local government officers want to hide behind the coat tails of elected members. They want to talk about matters and suggest that matters happen, and when they believe that the time or the political climate is right they want to expose their ideas to the inner caucus of the star chamber and say, "We believe this is in the interests of the city".

In the end, a stupid, small-minded council leader will say, "I will expose that to the public and take all the credit for it." What he does not understand are the inner thoughts of the officers behind it, who have no direct responsibility.

I am sick to death of the suggestion that local government officers are a breed apart and that they are above being criticised by the people who pay their wages. I have seen too many examples of lethargic, lack-lustre local government officers being allowed to reach the top in local government because they have been shielded for too long by the willingness of council leaders to accept that that is what happens in local government. I am sure that other hon. Members who have experience of local government are also sick of it.

On behalf of the people who elected me in Portsmouth, I hope that the Bill will be passed. It may not do much to help in authorities such as Bradford and Derbyshire, which have already accepted that information is critical to democracy, but it will go a long way to improving what I consider to be the dangerous position in my city and county. I hope that it will go a little way to exposing those pocket-sized dictators who believe that leading a council is something that they can do for ever without being exposed to public criticism.

With other hon. Members, I pay tribute to local newspapers and radio stations, which work tirelessly in trying to expose many of the incidents about which we have talked. Reports in my local newspaper, The News, have often been the first and only opportunity for local people to know what their council is doing. The newspaper could do that because people like myself, who are sick of the secrecy, allowed it to have reports that we were given by officers who were far from happy with what was happening.

I urge hon. Members to support the Bill.

12.1 pm

Mr. Piers Merchant (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): For 10 years before my election to the House I worked as a journalist, and for most of that time I specialised in reporting local councils. In the mid-1970s, as municipal correspondent of The Journal in Newcastle, I reported on nothing else. Therefore, I have some experience of this subject and expecially of the inadequacies of present arrangements. I have no hesitation in supporting the Bill and in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on the work that he has done. My only criticism is that in some areas the Bill does not go far enough. However, given the trend towards liberalisation and freedom of information, I accept that the boundaries of the right to know can be pushed forward at a later date.

We should not underestimate the cunning and deviousness of vested interests in local authorities, which may be eloquent in public in support of freedom of information, but which in practice use every device to prevent contentious, embarrassing or even innocuous matters from being put before the public gaze.

In that context, I was not surprised to read the brief on the Bill from the Association of County Councils. It is headed, "Memorandum of Views", which should be translated as the case against. Paragraph 2 states:

"The Association has noted with interest the work of the Campaign for Freedom of Information and its broad objectives", which I interpret as meaning that the ACC does not like what is being done. Paragraph 3 reads:

"The Local Government (Access to Information) Bill represents, therefore, one part only of the work of the Campaign"— in other words, the unacceptable part. The end of the paragraph states:

"Considerable anomalies would be created by the enactment of legislation in only one area"— in other words, please look elsewhere first.

Paragraph 4 states:

"The decision-making processes of local government as a whole are demonstrably the most open and publicly accessible of any Government or public sector body."

In other words, the association rejects the need for change. The paragraph continues:

"It is therefore, to some degree surprising that the first initiative has not been to tackle other areas where these procedures are not so well followed."

That is a clear attempt to persuade us to avert our gaze.

Paragraph 5 states:

"The Association has therefore suggested that, rather than the legislation proposed by this Bill, the better course might have been to prepare a Code of Practice which would be an effective means of securing the implementation of current good practice by all local authorities."

It will not have escaped the attention of the House that a code of practice has already been enshrined in a circular from the Department of the Environment some years ago. Nor will it have escaped the attention of the House that the code of practice puts no onus on local authorities to abide by its requirements.

Paragraph 6 states:

"However, the Association does not oppose the concept of this Bill, which is seen as being worthwhile."

It supports the concept, but, of course, it does not want the Bill to become legislation.

The memorandum ends with paragraph 8, which states:

"Finally, the Association would wish to draw attention to the fact that the precise meaning of the Bill may not be without doubt in some instances. If the Bill proceeds, it is urged that it should be considered in detail by the Parliamentary draftsman so that any ambiguities or obscurities may be removed, while preserving the intention behind the drafting."

Those acidic comments are the ultimate kick in the teeth. In code language, the ACC is saying that the Bill is meaningless and has been drawn up by amateurs.

That is the sort of language to which one is used in local authority documents, especially if one has reported local authorities for some time. It is an admirable example of bureaucratic obfuscation, but I am sure that it will not succeed in obscuring the issue for hon. Members. In any case, I draw some comfort from those remarks. The protestations of the ACC are a clear sign that the Bill would be effective and that it has county councils on the run.

Similar to the ACC brief was a letter that I received a few months ago from the chief executive of Tyne and Wear county council urging me to support the freedom of information campaign. I do not know whether the letter was sent tongue in cheek, but in reply I pointed out swiftly that more than 30 sub-committees, panels and working groups of that council were closed to the press, that every committee meeting was preceded by a meeting of the ruling group in order to make decisions, and that the history of the council was even worse. I did not receive a reply to my letter.

Such bodies will always support the principles of open government with their mouths, but we must not be fooled into believing that they will do so willingly in their minds. To illustrate the point, in 1975, Department of the Environment circular 45/75 was sent to local authorities advising them on how to behave with the press and public. It was a welcome, healthy and liberal circular which most local authorities proceeded to ignore. In addition to the statutory obligations which many councils only grudgingly followed, that enlightened circular advised authorities to throw open the doors of all sub-committees unless there was an overriding reason for not doing so. It especially told local authorities to make available minutes and agendas before meetings.

At that time I was reporting on Durham city and county councils, and later on Northumberland county council, Tyne and Wear county council and Newcastle city council. I also covered the Northumbria police authority, the water authority and the regional airports committee. Comparison of the approaches of those authorities was interesting, and showed the marked inadequacies in the law and the shortcomings of codes of practice and mere advisory circulars. Some authorities took their responsibilities on information seriously. They had a principled stance, not only complying with circular 45/75, but going further. Northumberland county council was especially enlightened at that time. To show that I take no party political line on this matter, may I say that Durham county council—at the other end of the political spectrum from Northumberland — was also co-operative. With both authorities, most meetings were open, papers were made available in advance and chief officers were open and contactable.

I often felt that, on the latter point, Durham county was the most enlightened of the lot, possibly because it had no press office or public relations department to act as a buffer or screen. I often think that it is the supreme irony that many councils should find it necessary to build up huge press departments and then spend, in total across the country, millions of pounds of public money on telling the public what they think the public should know about the council's affairs, when it should be the public who are telling the council, through the democratic process, what the council should be doing, and the council should be responding to public demand rather than the reverse.

The period to which I have been referring so far is 1974 to 1980, but I no longer have the same close working knowledge of day-to-day practice in those councils. I accept that there may have been changes for the better, but the very fact that individual councils change their attitude on information supply from year to year is an illustration of the fact that the legal base is inadequate, and the onus of responsibility tends to rest on whim rather than on clearly defined approach.

It also unfortunately leaves councils free to punish the press by changing their policy if a line is taken by the local press with which they do not agree. During the years to which I have referred, the authority with the worst record was Tyne and Wear county council. At one stage—it was about 1977—I was able to produce a list of over 50 of its subsidiary bodies that effectively met in secret. Not only did they meet in secret, but it was even a secret where they met, and in some cases a secret that they even existed.

Yet some of the most vital issues which directly affected people in that area were discussed in that atmosphere, including the progress of one of the most important projects in the north-east for many decades—the metro rapid transit system—and only leaks revealed where faults were arising within the management of the construction of the metro project and on other areas of concern to the public.

Matters of local civic scandal or misconduct, too, emerged only through leaks rather than through the correct accountable process of committees and sub-committees. Press reporters discovered that the only way to find out about these anonymous and secretive bodies was to creep down committee room corridors, listen at doors and snoop around the printing and committee support units where agendas were collated.

No agendas were issued in advance, so it was difficult to know even if a major committee was meeting, let alone what it was discussing. Often, if one could find out, the committee closed itself to the press within a few moments of starting business and discussed reports that were then not made available. Many, in fact most, reports were stamped at the top "Confidential" and were produced on pretty coloured paper, and with monotonous regularity they were enticingly waved in front of the press before being locked away for ever.

So paranoid were the leaders of Tyne and Wear at that time that I experienced on more than one occasion the farce whereby copies of reports were painstakingly collected from councillors before they were allowed to leave a meeting for fear that one guilty member might become incontinent and leak the document to the press. The adverse publicity that such actions necessarily inspired served only to drive the council deeper into the fox holes. Newspapers which dared to print something in advance were punished by the discriminatory withholding of a press announcement at a later date. The war of nerves that followed illustrates exactly why it is not conceivably in the interests even of local authorities to behave like that.

Tyne and Wear got such a bad reputation that most press reports were unsympathetic. That reputation persisted and was not unconnected with later moves in support of the council's abolition. To put the matter in more direct language, I should say that failure to communicate and the withholding of information convinced many that the whole structure should be radically reformed. A more open approach from the outset would have engendered an entirely different atmosphere, so that that council would have been seen to be a positive force for the good of people in the area rather than—as it was widely regarded, and still is—a negative force. Thus, freedom of information is not just in the interests of the press and the public, though obviously it is. It is also in the overriding interest of the councils.

I am glad to say that the position partially improved in regard to Tyne and Wear, but that was thanks only to a persistent and highly effective campaign masterminded by Mr. Stuart Garner, then the news editor of the Newcastle Journal, which continually highlighted the secrecy of the council, and the council was eventually shamed by the public into reforming some of its procedures, which it did most unwillingly. Agendas slowly began to appear in advance and closed meetings, at least in some cases, began to be open to the press and public.

So far I have dealt with illustrations from the past, albeit the recent past. This year there have been three, even more concerning, examples of the results of secret government involving intimidation and threats. In two cases they involved Labour councillors within the ruling group of Tyne and Wear, so in highlighting those I cannot be accused of crossing the political barrier.

The first councillor, John Hodgson, was disciplined and threatened because he leaked to a Conservative colleague on the council, a Mr. Martin Callaman, a document about proposed increased council funding of the so-called Newcastle centre against unemployment. That subject should have appeared, and been discussed in full, before a public committee, but it was discussed only in secret, with strict instructions that the matter should not be divulged and should not reach the ears of the public. He was told that his views should have been made known only behind closed doors, and he was disciplined for not abiding by that request.

[Mr. Piers Merchant]

The second councillor, George Elsom, was given similar rough treatment by the strong-arm leaders of his group who were trying to railroad policy through the council at that stage. Mr. Elsom had expressed some misgivings on the miners' strike.

One of the motivations behind the suppression of information preventing the public from finding out what has been discussed behind closed doors is the fear that political parties have — I do not point at only one political party because, varying from one area to another, all political parties have been guilty of this — that the public may discover that there are disagreements between councillors within that group, and the leadership, possibly from an underlying feeling of insecurity, is afraid to reveal to the public that there are disagreements on policy.

That is an incredibly short-sighted approach to take because it redounds to the credit of political parties and leaderships that there is informed discussion, debate and, at times, disagreement within the group. For the leadership of a group to try to suppress all signs of disagreement merely belittles the reputation and standing not just of the leadership but of all the members of the group, who are then believed by the public merely to be vote fodder and toadies rather than people who are capable of thinking in the interests, and representing the people, of their areas.

The third example is rather different, although it involves the continued harassment and intimidation of another councillor, Ken Buckingham, an independent who has fought persistently for freedom of information. Both Mr. Buckingham and a former councillor, Mr. Chambers, have even claimed that they were subjected to physical violence because they were prepared to speak to the press on matters about which the ruling group felt they should not speak. Such desperate acts are bred in an atmosphere of secrecy which can grow when no law defines clearly the responsibilities of local government on free information.

I do not pretend that the council that I have mentioned is the only or worst offender. Nor do I claim that there are not other bodies which are equally guilty of holding back information which should properly be discussed in public and by the public. Those guilty might include the Government. However, I do not wish to imply that all councils are as unresponsive as Tyne and Wear. Many are open and sincere in their desire to be more open with information and policy decisions. As in so many spheres, it is not sufficient, unfortunately, to rely on those with a generous spirit. The full power of the law is needed to give a shock to those who are lagging behind. I therefore support the Bill fully and wish it a swift and safe passage into law.

Mr. Ernie Roberts (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I support many of the proposals in the Bill, although it is a sad commentary on present day society that we should have to consider such elementary democratic principles, which ought to have been put into operation many years ago. However, it is perhaps understandable that we should have to discuss basic democratic principles when the Government are prepared, at a stroke of the law, to wipe out local government in the form of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. We have a long way to go to impress on the Government the need for democracy in local government.

Everyone has a right to know. I have received many complaints from constituents about secrecy over their medical records. I helped one woman fight to get information about her medical records for many years. I have received complaints from parents who have been unable to get records on their children and from homeless people who want to know why they cannot have a house, why they are where they are on the housing list and how the housing list is made up. I have also received complaints from people who cannot find out what planning proposals there are for their street. Most recently, I had a complaint from a person who could not discover the proposed location of caravan sites.

I was chairman of the Coventry city council finance committee for some years. There was far too much secrecy in drawing up budgets. Ratepayers have a right to know about budgets, as it is their money which is being spent. They have a right to know why and how their money is allocated. There was far too much obstruction from bureaucrats working on behalf of the council. I opened up information about tenders but insisted that information about how decisions were taken was made available only after the job had been given. It is perfectly true that some people take advantage of information to get rich quick at the expense of others. That is the nature of our society but it is no excuse for secrecy. People still have the right to know. If people behave wrongly, the law should take care of them.

There are many Committees of the House that are open to the public and they often deal with more sensitive issues than are considered by many councils in secret. The press and other media often have access when the public do not, but the media are not the public. They might claim to represent the public but nobody has elected them. They represent only their newspaper owners and the political views of their newspaper. If the press is allowed into a meeting, so should members of the public. The result would be much more accurate news.

Local authorities are the biggest employers in the country and should set an example in industrial democracy. In its exclusions, the Bill mentions:

"disclosure of terms . . . likely to prejudice negotiations . . . with trade unions".

In negotiations between the employer, the local authority, and its work force, trade union representatives, the facts should be put on the table. Both sides should have the information on which a decision must be taken. It is wrong that only council officials have information on the issue under discussion. The Bill will help that process and give a lead to private employers. In spite of what Conservative Members sometimes say, workers are not greedy, selfish and grasping, like some entrepreneurs.

I learnt about industrial democracy from my trade union. All of its members have the right to know everything. The rules provide that members can get any information and find out how anyone voted on any issue. They have real democratic control. There is much to be learnt from how trade unions such as mine operate.

Hackney borough council, part of which I represent, has decided to decentralise all matters relating to housing. It has opened its committees to the public so that they can hear for themselves what is being decided. Hackney is determined to have open government for the good reason that it wants people to be aware of the difficulties facing it as a result of rate capping and other policies that the Government have forced on it.

It is right that people should be able to attend meetings. By doing so they will be able to see who is telling the truth: whether it is the representatives of the Government or the council and its local Government representatives. I hope that the Bill will have a fair hearing and a fair discussion and that many of its proposals will come to fruition. It will be another step forward in the interests of democracy in this country.

12.30 pm

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I seem to be making a habit, as a lone Scotsman, of opposing Bills that the English unwisely foist upon themselves. I am glad that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) is in the House. He said that the Bill was conceived and parturated by angels. There is a saying, "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." But since in this case the angels are so anxious to tread all over it there is a new saying: "Wise men rush in to stop angels from their folly." I modestly claim the cloak of wisdom.

I notice that all the angels and archangels who have spoken in favour of the Bill say that they welcome it in its entirety. I am glad that they do, with the exception of the sponsor of the Bill, because I welcome more heartily than I can say on behalf of all my countrymen clause 8:

"This Act shall not apply to Scotland".

I caution my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) not to try in Committee to extend the application of the Bill to Scotland. It would be extremely unfair. My colleagues who represent Scottish constituencies have not been forewarned about any attempt to extend the application of the Bill to Scotland. I should regard that as constitutionally improper. It would be a most unfortunate precedent in terms of a private Member's Bill.

Mr. Squire: My hon. and learned Friend heard my explanation of the reason for Scotland's temporary exclusion. Will he nevertheless accept that the whole House will have the fullest opportunity, should the Bill proceed through its subsequent stages, to reject the inclusion of Scotland, if the Committee so determines? In doing so, all of my hon. and learned Friend's countrymen may mass and assemble in the way that they normally mass and assemble.

Mr. Fairbairn: With the greatest respect I do not accept that explanation, although I wish to pay credit to the civility with which my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch has replied to the criticism of his measure, which I make for the sake of England. I had no idea that anybody would attempt to put this curse upon archangels. If, however, the English wish to put a curse upon our heads they can always outvote us by 11 to one on the Goschen formula. I repeat that I believe that it would be quite improper if this measure were to be extended to apply to Scotland. Since I am the only Scot in the House today, undoubtedly there will be no Scots on the Committee. Therefore, it would be quite improper if the Bill were to be so amended in Committee.

The first point that I wish to make to the Government before I make my points to the angels—the Government are an archangel; I see that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby thought I was falling into a trap—is this. As I hope to explain during the course of my remarks about the details of the Bill, it would have massive manpower implications for local authorities. Very large, indeed impossible numbers of people to calculate, would have to be added to the work force of local authorities. Secondly, the financial implications of the measure are, as I hope to demonstrate, incalculable but inevitably huge. Here we have a Government struggling with the leviathan of public expenditure, which good-intentioned people such as the angels, the harbingers of the Bill, created in the welfare state and cannot control. It would not matter if there were a Labour Government. They would have the same leviathan which they struggled to control when they were in office and could not do so. Although they do not help us to do the same, they should, even in secret, understand the problem.

The second matter which I wish to put to those who propose the Bill in the liberal and democratic name of freedom of information is that the Bill is far from giving freedom of information; far from reducing the secrecy of which my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant) spoke. I do not take the view that to relieve the frustrations of a reporter is a good motivation for legislation. I thought that reporters liked secrets that they could unmask. That certainly is my recent experience. The interests of journalists — I mean reporters; I am a journalist—should not be taken into account.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby gave an example. If we were to have a meeting of the local health board — that is not covered by the Bill although the hon. Gentleman thought that it should be—to decide who should be appointed to it, it might decide that it had found a gentleman—to reverse the hon. Gentleman's example — who was good at scuppering any attempts at privitisation and who was good at increasing the staffing levels of unnecessary clerks. The announcement of that Labour council, as it would be, would not be that three people were interviewed, that the board realised that Dr. Obstinate was the guy who could frustrate the purposes of the Tory Government and therefore it had appointed him to the health board. It would say that three people were interviewed and that the unanimous decision of the health board was that Dr. Obstinate should be appointed. In other words, the genuine reason would be inevitably hidden.

I wish to expound that by looking at the implications of each clause. Let me make it plain to the House and to the Bill's sponsors that I am not in favour of secrecy but I understand the benefits of confidentiality and trust. I do not think that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby meant it, but he suggested that somebody who had leaked information had done nothing wrong. A breach of trust is always a serious matter. Whether that trust ought to be there in the first place may be disputed, but a breach of trust is a serious matter in all circumstances.

I do not wish to frustrate the debate in any way and I hope that no sponsor of the Bill will think that, if I pay attention to its consequences in some detail, I am attempting to do so. I am not.

Clause 2 deals with the minutes of proceedings. It is essential, as all will agree, that there should be a right to prevent parts of certain minutes being available to the public. For instance, suppose a committee or sub-committee of the local authority were discussing the adoption of baby Cotton. I am sure that there will be minutes of that matter in the relevant local authority. Nobody will suggest that those discussions should be open to the public. Therefore, the question immediately arises of what should and should not be open to the public.

Mr. Ernie Roberts: Why should information not be given in the baby Cotton case?

Mr. Fairbairn: Perhaps baby Cotton is not an especially good example. So far we do not know the name of the parents, and nor do I think we should. In all adoption procedures the purpose of ensuring the anonymity of the real parents is to prevent the traumatic event of the child, in later life, discovering who its real parents were and the reason why it was discarded, if that is not too brutal a term, by its real parents.

I could give the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Mr. Roberts) 100,000 examples or reasons why certain matters should be kept confidential. The real reason for decisions being kept confidential when they involve members of the public is not to hurt those concerned. For example, if two school teachers discuss a pupil and the pupil is able to read what the teachers have said about him, it would be deeply distressing to him in some instances. However, two teachers should be able to make a genuine assessment of a child. The discussions of lawyers and clients seem to have a holy grail of protection for reasons that we understand, but there are many circumstances in life of the simplest sort in which people will not be frank with one another if they know that anyone can discover what they have been saying.

I shall give an example. If I told my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) what I genuinely thought of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, I would not have to say, "By the way, that is confidential." I would assume, on the basis of ordinary human trust, that she would not repeat my remarks. She would realise that they were so complimentary that to know about them would embarrass the hon. Gentleman. There are so many facets of human exchange, especially for those who have to take decisions and sit in judgment, that demand that the concept of confidentiality should be maintained.

Mrs. Rumbold: Has my hon. and learned Friend studied the schedule in detail? It seems that paragraph (d) of the schedule would cover adequately that which he is putting before us.

Mr. Fairbairn: I have studied the schedule in detail and one of the characteristics upon which I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) in preparing the Bill is that one is introduced to its horror in stages. It becomes worse and worse and the schedule is the worst part.

Clause 3 provides three days of notice. What will happen at Christmas time or new year, for example? Are we talking about dies non? Are we talking about Sundays or other days when the council does not meet? What is the notice that we are proposing to give? The complication is huge. Unless the council is prepared to go to the expense of sending minutes and reports to councillors by special delivery, councillors will receive such documents only after the press and members of the public are aware of their contents, including groups of disrupters, activists and who knows what. That would be unfortunate.

Clause 4 is appalling and execrable in every possible way. Those who support the Bill should understand its real implications. It is all very well saying that everyone should see everything but let us understand the real difficulties that will be faced by local authorities. The views which I am about to express have been put to me by the association that represents all Scottish local authorities and which is Labour-dominated. The House should consider its views with serious concern. What does clause 4 mean? Does it mean that any person has a right to search for documents or that he has a right to see a specific document that he can name? Does it mean that a person can say, "I want to see the housing file for 1948 to see whether I have been prejudiced in the way that my housing application has been handled"? Or does it mean that the person need only say that he wants to know why he has not been given a house?

If a person has smashed the last three houses that he lived in, has 19 convictions for robbery with violence and the importation of cocaine, and the housing manager has dared to put that in his file, the person could take the case to the European court on Human Rights and question whether that information should have been taken into consideration.

Mr. Squire: My hon. and learned Friend is pursuing a false hare on clause 4. Personal files are exempt from the Bill's provisions and even if they were not, the trigger for clause 4 is the appearance of a document on the agenda of a further committee so anything that dates back and is not on a future agenda is not covered.

Mr. Fairbairn: I did not mean to use my illustration to challenge the retrospective element, but in the year 2020 what happened in 1985 will be relevant. My hon. Friend's point is even worse than his Bill.

I shall read to the House a paragraph from the document composed by what is known by some as COSLA. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden that all initials should be banned and the use of them made a criminal offence. If my hon. Friend puts that in the schedule I shall certainly vote for it. I never know what anyone is talking about. The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) will know better than I the tragedies and dangers of initials. We were on a Select Committee together and we never stopped using initials which nobody understood. I had to use initials to make words, such as COMEOFFIT — and rather better examples which I shall not give today for fear of frustrated reporters.

COSLA states—this is the point that I wish to put sincerely to those who believe that the Bill will end secrecy or clandestine behaviour—

> "It will mean the end of officers engaging in frank and meaningful written exchanges of view if they are to be the subject of public scrutiny. No officer is going to give a completely open opinion on a matter if he knows he may be called upon to justify his view in public or even in court."

My hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving) complained of a committee which always did its business by telephone so as not to commit its opinions to writing. My advice to every English local authority if this wretched Bill is passed is never to commit anything to writing—always do business on the telephone. The Bill will increase secrecy and cause nothing to be recorded even if it should be.

Let us take another example. Let us suppose that the planning department, the roads department and the public amenities department have tripartite talks about whether a certain planning application should go ahead. If those interdepartmental committees report and their files have to be laid open to the public certain people will be at a great advantage.

Imagine what would happen about the Stansted development. By the way, if we all flew from Edinburgh and Glasgow, there would be no problem. I hope that Stansted is listening. Imagine how the objectors at Stansted would benefit if they could read week by week opinions expressed by officials in departments about the rights and wrongs and difficulties of various proposals. That is a good example of what could happen.

People could examine the work of the planning committee of Little Underhighbury and claim that it was at odds with the planning committee of Little Overhighbury. Wreckers would be given a special advantage.

Suppose that an officer said that a council had three options — to refuse planning permission, to list the buildings so that the owner was prevented from demolishing them, or to grant planning permission, subject to the condition that the owner did not demolish the buildings. If I were an unscrupulous owner I would read the minutes and demolish the building before it could be listed.

Such difficulties arise if we have the grand concept that confidentiality — what some people call secrecy — is wrong. I can think of several planning applications in Perth and Kinross district council that would have been affected in that way and many historic buildings — large and small, simple cottages and high streets of great value— would have been pulled down if the Bill had been on the statute book.

If advice to party political groups is to be exempt from scrutiny, surely some protection must be given in respect of similar advice to other groups. What is a party political group? If I want to get an exemption so that information can be fed to the public, all that I shall need to do is to ensure that someone in the room is not a party political person. The group would then cease to be a party political group.

Decisions would have to be made by an official or a committee on the status of internal papers in relation to the schedule of privileged documents annexed to the Bill. Let us think about that for a moment. Every document of every council in the land will have to be scrutinised to see whether it is legally permissible to publish the information or whether the information is defamatory or could give rise to a claim against the council. Who will do that work? Will it be a legal officer on £28,000 a year?

Hon. Members may not think that I am much of a lawyer. Perhaps I am not, though the sovereign thinks different—she made me one of her counsel learned in the law. But I would have the greatest difficulty if I were asked to write an opinion of counsel on which sentence and which document fell within any provision of the schedule.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): The hon. and learned Gentleman has just lost a lot of work.

Mr. Fairbairn: If the Bill goes through, I shall gain a lot of work. I should tell the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser), who has gratuitously removed my practice, that I do not like complicated law and I do not think that complicated statutes add to the liberty of people. On the contrary, they subtract from it. I believe that the Bill, well-intentioned as it is, will have that absolute effect.

May I say——

Mr. Hanley: In conclusion.

Mr. Fairbairn: I do not know why my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) should say "In conclusion". He is obviously in favour of the Bill. Not one hon. Member has pointed out the difficulties in the Bill, and the House should hear why the Bill is wrong. There is no need for my hon. Friend to give the baby another pat on its bottom; it already has 100 obstetricians delivering it.

A mother might go to a council because she wants to know why her child cannot be taken on the bus to school. A protester might go to a council and attempt to cause trouble. He might want to prevent the council from demolishing a building and erecting another one. In any such confrontation, an officer has to be competent to say which bits of which document the person concerned may see. He will have to be a fully trained defamation lawyer if he is to interpret properly the schedule to the Bill.

The manpower and cost implications of the procedures set out in the Bill must be considered. If files have to be separated, so that the relevant documents are not in numerical order, and with letters and replies spread over three different files, the council clerks will have great difficulty. My hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden referred to the difficulty that clerks have in writing reports in clear English. What a time they will have in writing reports in English that is good enough to get round the schedule. That is a matter at which the House should look with the greatest possible care. A filing system with separate categories such as "confidential", "doubtfully confidential" and "open", would be completely unworkable.

There is a ridiculous provision concerning the minutes of meetings. A council will be in defiance of the law if it does not provide copies of the agenda and reports to every member of the public attending a meeting. They have to be provided three days before the meeting. If I wished to interfere with the business of the council, I would get 3,000 of my friends to come to a meeting and complain that only eight copies of the agenda were provided. They could complain that, in regard to 2,992 of them, the law had been broken. The next week the council might feel it necessary to publish 5,000 copies. In that way the council could be forced to waste money, thus defeating the Government's attempts to curb local government expenditure. Economic policy could be frustrated in that way.

The Convention of Scottish Local Boroughs says:

"No organisation, whether a public body, Government Department, company or private business, could operate if the burdens associated with clause 4 were placed upon them."

I think that I have said enough. [Interruption.] I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch muttered the word freedom. I urge him not to confuse freedom——

Mr. Squire: In response to my hon. and learned Friend's suggestion that no organisation could possibly operate in such a way, I muttered the words, "Three do."

Mr. Fairbairn: I beg my hon. Friend's pardon; evidently I misheard him.

[Mr. Fairbairn]

It would be easy to drive a horse and cart through any of the paragraphs of the schedule from (a) to (g). The words of paragraph (c) are:

"the disclosure of spending estimates for a specific item would be likely to benefit a contractor or supplier".

I know of no spending estimates that would not be likely to benefit a contractor or supplier. So that strikes out all spending estimates.

Paragraph (d) states:

"that disclosure would give access other than to the persons concerned to personal information or files on individuals".

Why should the "person concerned" be allowed to see confidential information about himself? I would be absolutely appalled if I thought that I could go to my doctor and see his file on me. Imagine what would happen if a mentally ill person were allowed as the "person concerned" to ask his doctor whether he could see a file which said, "This nitwit is a schizophrenic, and is likely to remain so. His paranoic fantasies are interrupted by moments of sanity when he sees the lunacy of the Local Government (Access to Information) Bill." I would be very upset if I were allowed to see a teacher's assessment of me which was hostile. It does not matter how unjustified or justified the assessment is.

I do not believe that people should be able to read on file what officials doing their duty have written for the benefit of those who are elected to local government. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby said that those who are elected should exercise their power accountably. I agree that they should do so. The Bill will make it impossible for them to exercise their power accountably, and that is why I oppose it on principle. As all the obstetricians gather around this moribund—I hope—child, I say please do not foist this on Scotland as foster parents.

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): Despite the blandishments of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn), I remain convinced that the House should congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on his luck in getting this measure placed so high on the list of private Member's Bills. My hon. Friend brings to us a measure which is, despite the suggestion by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross, about the sustenance and enhancement of democracy and the democratic process.

Surely we do not need reminding that democracy is not simply a concept that we can trot out on election day once every three, four or five years. It is a concept that embodies a continuous right to know how decisions are taken, who is making the decisions and, most importantly, what facts those taking the decisions employ in their armoury when they decide on our behalf.

I am disappointed by the fact that the Conservative party has not as wholeheartedly supported the freedom of information campaign generally as it should have. Freedom of information is vital to the democratic process, and all parties should embrace it wholeheartedly. As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said, that sort of information and type of freedom are often inconvenient to councils. However, we should never allow ourselves to believe that on that basis we should ignore freedom of information measures.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) referred to the disdain that is clearly evident among the public in their attitude towards local councils. That attitude is reflected in the pathetic turnout at local elections, despite the importance of the decisions that are made on electors' behalf. Surely all hon. Members have asked themselves from time to time why, when a county council, district council or London borough can make more relevant decisions about government than a Back Bencher, there is such a pathetic turnout at local government elections. That is due in no small measure to the fact that the public say, "What is the point?" The paternalism and the we-know-best attitude, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) referred, are so prevalent that people feel that there is no point in bothering to try to influence decisions which they know will be taken by a cabal or caucus behind closed doors.

I am a member of Berkshire county council, one of the local authorities on the list of those that support the Bill. We feel there, I think unanimously, that we have always endeavoured to use the schedule of reasons for confidentiality as the benchmark of whether items should be in part 2 of our agenda. I believe that that has stood the council in good stead and has improved the quality of its decision making.

There is more that Back Benchers can contribute on this occasion than merely, as my hon. and learned Friend the member for Perth and Kinross suggested, a further pat on the bottom on a baby who is already obviously assured of many admiring godparents. We have an obligation to study some of the more involved aspects of the Bill because there are items about which we should be careful. One is the matter to which my hon. Friend the Member for Morden and Mitcham referred briefly and on which I intervened—whether there is a place for confidential meetings of party groups.

I should be surprised if we did not all share the view that the arrangements for councillors' remuneration in local government are unsatisfactory, to say the least. We neither agree to pay them a realistic salary nor accept the idea that there should be no payment. Those options have a number of difficulties that we should not debate today. One of the results of that was that Berkshire county council, by a majority—by no means a unanimous vote—decided that there should be standing sub-committees of the policy committee, labelled for convenience A, B and C which, because they are official standing sub-committees, are eligible for allowances. They have the services of the officers of the secretariat and of any other chief officer whose attentions might be needed.

Those arrangements are solely to enable those party meetings—because that is what they are—to take place in a more organised framework than would otherwise be the case. They are sub-committees which meet in secret now and which should able to meet in secret in the future because of the kind of decisions and discussions that will take place at such meetings.

There are Liberal, Labour and Conservative group meetings. They all work in the same way. That stresses the importance of distinguishing between discussions about how to develop a policy and discussions on facts. With respect to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross, who has now left, that was a distinction about which he was not entirely clear. Discussions will take place among individuals of the same political persuasion as to how they will tackle political or other problems. It is utterly naive to imagine that such discussions will not take place in private, however we legislate. Of course they will, and it is entirely appropriate that they should, and it will only further democracy if such discussions can take place between people of like mind. That is one side of the argument.

On the other side, we have the magnitude of the events to which my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) referred, the possibility — albeit he was referring to Government circumstances many years ago —that important matters of information and fact will be denied to members of the public or, worse, to minority council groups because such facts and information are regarded as inconvenient. That is wholly indefensible, and the Bill strikes at the heart of it.

Let us hear no more of the nonsense that the Bill will prevent discussion, or of the nonsensical idea that as a result of the Bill it will not be possible for groups of Labour, Liberal, Conservative, SDP or any other councillors to talk amongst themselves about how they wish to tackle an issue. Let us nail once and for all the appalling concept that we should allow to continue a system whereby one group of councillors can deny information and knowledge to their colleagues on the council or to the general public.

Despite the blandishments of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross, it is evident that all that is needed to make the Bill work is a change of heart and mind. I say that secure in the knowledge that three councils already utilise the provisions of the Bill and, surprise, surprise, are able to live with them. They have recognised that intention and bona fides will make it work.

It has been suggested that one could circumvent even the schedule relating to confidentiality. That is an important point, and it is true. I should be surprised if a local government officer or an astute local government group leader could not find a way of ensuring that almost every item on the agenda either prejudiced

"the Council's position in negotiations concerning land, property, goods or services or with trade unions", as provided in paragraph (a) of the schedule, or would be likely to have an effect on a contractor or supplier if someone wanted to talk about what the council thought it would spend on a particular project. It would be easy to hide behind paragraph (f) of the schedule and say that the disclosure of an employee's salary or conditions of service would infringe personal privacy. If a council wanted to bury a quite proper discussion about why a particular officer was in its employ and what on earth he was doing there, it would be easy to do so. Let us not fall into the trap of imagining that the Bill will, of itself, prevent any of the abuses which some councils appear to be hell-bent on continuing, because it will not.

I hope that the Bill will be enacted, and I hope that we shall come to see it in the same context as other pieces of legislation, such as the Race Relations Act 1976 and the equal opportunities legislation. On all sides it is accepted that those pieces of legislation have established a benchmark of standards and made it clear what the criteria of local councils should be. That is the value of the Bill.

We should ask ourselves as local councillors and hon. Members whether there is a good reason why the interests of ratepayers or constituents will be prejudiced by the disclosure of information or the opening up of a discussion. There is all the difference in the world between the public interest and the interest of the public. We would do well to bear that distinction in mind.

My final point is on the detail of the Bill. It may be better considered in Committee, but it is one of which I have experience and which I hope to draw to hon. Members' attention for future reference. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross said that there would be a large cost element in the Bill. I am not sure that I see it as a huge and major cost element. However, clause 3(1) refers to for agendas and reports. Clause 4(1) refers to members of the public copying "at their own expense". In other words, the elector would be charged by the local authority or would use his own photocopier. Given that it is unlikely that he would bring his own photocopier into the building, he will probably want to use the council's. Although the point may seem small, I have seen it arise in two other contexts—in the Consumer Credit Act 1974, and in the Data Protection Act 1984. Both Acts embody requirements about the fees that members of the public should pay to companies and statutory bodies for information about them.

"payment of a reasonable fee"

In the Consumer Credit Act there was a clear acceptance that such charges should always be moderate and reasonable so that it would never be a bar to the acquisition of information that it was likely to cost too much. If I am right—my hon. Friend the Minister, who I am sure has the figures in his head, will correct me if I am wrong—the present fee under the Consumer Credit Act is £1 for every submission. Interestingly, when the Data Protection Act comes into force, if a member of the public wishes to see an extract from his personal file, he will have to pay a fee of eight or nine times as much.

I counsel my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch to ensure in Committee that proper account is taken of the fact that it would be possible for a local authority to demonstrate that the cost of providing information on a complex issue ran into hundreds of pounds. It would be unreasonable to ask a member of the public to pay that sort of fee, even if the local authority could say, "We must employ so many people for so many hours photocopying documents and researching, and at their current rate of salary, it will cost several hundred pounds to get together the information."

An option that my hon. Friend must bear in mind is the idea that there should be, as under the Consumer Credit Act and the Data Protection Act, although the latter is a larger sum, a standard maximum fee which members of the public must pay on every occasion that they wish to acquire information. If that is done, it may be necessary to consider the impact of such an arrangement on the financing of local government. We must be careful not to ensure that local authorities, whose resources are already under considerable pressure, are put in an even worse position as a result of the Bill by having to provide many more services and much more information out of their existing budgets.

None of my reservations about the practicability of the schedule of reasons or about costs is a reason for opposing the Bill—far from it. The Bill is a small brick in what all of us hope will be a large building. It points the way to a new and much healthier attitude in local government that might, in part, lead to local government restoring its credibility and prestige, the lack of which the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey and others mentioned.

I welcome the Bill. I am sure that its passage through the House will be rapid and expeditious, and that we shall come to regard it as a benchmark for standards by which local authorities will not only be able to judge themselves but will have advanced the cause of those whom they represent.

1.17 pm

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on his luck in the ballot and on his wisdom in choosing this measure. I also congratulate those who have sponsored the Bill. My hon. Friends the Members for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) and for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) — the Opposition's local government spokesmen — who are attending a local government conference in Birmingham starting later today, wish me to say that they too, support the Bill. I assure the hon. Member for Hornchurch that his Bill has unanimous support from Opposition Front and Back-Bench Members.

I am glad to note the resolutions of unconditional support that have been received from the Greater London council and the Association of London Authorities. Conservative Members may allege many things about the GLC, but they cannot allege that it has not been open. Indeed, it has probably opened itself to much criticism by being so frank.

One's endorsement of the principle of the Bill and wholehearted support for its Second Reading does not mean that every detail of the measure is correct, as the hon. Member for Hornchurch has recognised. For example, he agrees with the mild criticism of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities to the effect that the Bill should not prevent the urgent conduct of business at short notice and in good faith. I emphasise "in good faith" to ensure that urgency is not used as an excuse for secrecy. It is clear that matters should go on the agenda if they are topical, even if they come up at short notice.

An example of that occurred in my constituency. Last weekend we read about a siege at a house in Streatham. Police surrounded the house, in which was a man who was wanted in connection with a number of armed robberies. It was clear that the police regarded him as a dangerous criminal. The street was cordoned off, as a result of which a number of people who had gone to work in the morning found that they could not get back to their homes at night. There was splendid co-operation between the Metropolitan police and the London borough of Lambeth, and homes were provided overnight for more than 100 people.

If there had been a meeting of the social services committee—or even if there had been a sub-committee meeting open to the public the next day — it would clearly have been in the interest of topicality that that urgent item of business should be reported, with what had happened on that occasion being made known to the citizens of Lambeth. It would have been only right for the matter to be discussed by a Lambeth borough council committee. I am sure that the hon. Member for Hornchurch would not want to exclude such matters of urgency and topicality.

We need a comprehensive definition of a member's interest, as provided for in clause 5, because I understand that there are differences between authorities in that respect. The sooner there is a simple and comprehensive definition of "interest," the better.

Based not on personal experience, but on the experience of some of my local councillors, I have a nagging reservation about the provision in clause 6 relating to addresses. I am in favour of the names of councillors being known and the wards that they represent and the addresses where one can communicate with them. I have been a councillor in Lambeth for six years and have been told that on occasions councillors there and elsewhere have had their privacy invaded in an unacceptable way because their addresses were known to the press and other organisations. There have been occasions in my borough when councillors have been picketed outside their homes because of decisions that they had taken or were likely to take in relation to their public duties. There have been other examples of harassment, with the daubing of councillor's houses and so on.

It is difficult to find a balance between public accountability and the desire of most councillors to have their addresses known, so that people can readily communicate with them, and the activities of those who, unreasonably, use the public knowledge of councillors' addresses to harass them and even do damage.

Mr. Squire: The Bill does not say "domestic address," and I do not know whether I need say more. It is a matter into which the Committee can look. At that stage we can consider whether the measure should specify "domestic address," though as advised, I understand that it would not necessarily have to specify that.

Mr. Fraser: I am grateful for that assurance. The point needs to be made clear so that the interests of the public can properly be balanced against the need for privacy and security of those who hold public office.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Some of the disturbance about which my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) has been speaking, which is absolutely monstrous, arises often from the monopoly of the local press when a newspaper conducts a deliberate vendetta against a local council—for example, The Standard's vendetta against Islington. Perhaps the Bill could improve the situation by shifting the focus on to important information about the way in which the council works and the decisions it takes and making that available, rather than by leaving the situation as it is, with it being focussed all too often on trivia and personalities.

Mr. Fraser: My hon. Friend is correct, though I must emphasise that, in the cases in Lambeth about which I have been speaking, there was harassment not by the local press but by anarchist groups and the like. Some incidents affecting local councillors have been quite unacceptable.

Following the passage of the 1960 Act, with access to council committees, there has been a tendency on the part of some local authorities to shift business to sub-committees to avoid the need for public presence and scrutiny.

There is always a danger that decision-making in local authorities could be further removed by committees or sub-committees delegating matters to the chair's action, which would not be covered by the Bill. Decisions that are delegated to a chair, and therefore the information involved, can be just as important as those reached by the committee. There is something to be said for important decisions that are reached by chairs, when authority is delegated to them, being announced publicly. For a while, I was a sub-committee of one of the Lambeth borough council's planning committee. I thought that was a desirable arrangement, because it meant that I could expedite planning applications. There is far too much delay in processing planning applications—it holds up builders and developers. I used to sit with a few council officers deciding on those fairly trivial applications, but there were hundreds of them. I would have been happy to have made those decisions in public. There is something to be said for considering that aspect.

The case of baby Cotton has been mentioned recently. When the matter came before the court, the President of the Family Division of the High Court properly deliberated on personal and private matters in his chambers, but he made himself accountable to the public by reading his judgment in open court on the following Monday. There is no reason why chairs who reach important decisions that have been delegated to them should not do so in a way which allows for public access.

The Bill is entitled "Local Government (Access to Information) Bill", but it does not cover every aspect of access to information. A large part of my work as a Member of Parliament is involved in dealings with Lambeth borough council. People who have waited between six months and one year for a decision about the granting of housing benefit are entitled to have access to information on why those decisions are taking so long. I should like the Bill to be extended to afford access to information in those cases.

In October 1984, a constituent came to see me after she had spent seven months as a single person in homeless accommodation. She believed that she had rights under homeless persons legislation. She felt that seven months was far too long to be in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. I wrote to the homeless persons unit of Lambeth borough council on 30 October 1984 asking when she might get a reasonable offer. I received no reply. I wrote again at the end of November 1984, sending a copy of my previous letter, and received no reply. I wrote again on 10 December — 10 months after the lady went into homeless persons' accommodation—and again received no reply. In January, I wrote again to the housing allocations section, and received no reply. I then wrote to the director of housing in Lambeth asking for a reply to my three previous letters, but received no reply. Indeed, we no longer have a director of housing in Lambeth. I wrote to the chair of the housing committee towards the end of January and, so far, have received no reply.

In case the Minister thinks that things are at all amiss at Lambeth borough council, I must tell him that, on the whole, I get extremely good, conscientious and constant service from most parts of that housing department. However, the fact remains that the lady who came to see me has now waited almost 12 months to learn her status as a homeless person. It is worth adding that the bed-and-breakfast accommodation is costing a lot of money. If, as a Member of Parliament, I cannot obtain access to information about that person's rights as a homeless person, she is even more disabled when trying to obtain that information. I believe that a Bill which deals with access to information ought to deal with individual cases —people who want to know about their rights.

Another example is the correspondence for six months with my local authority about the inter-borough nomination scheme. After five months I received a letter which said:

> "The situation outlined above has unfortunately led to the accumulation of a backlog of outstanding members' inquiries. Consequently the answering of members' inquiries from central allocations will be actioned on a date order basis until the backlog has been reduced."

I should have been a little more reassured if I had not discovered subsequently that the letter had been printed on a word processor and that the same letter was being sent in answer to all sorts of inquiries something like six months after they had been made. Matters relating to homeless persons under the inter-borough nomination scheme cover the legal and administrative rights of citizens who are entitled to information about those matters.

In general, I am in favour of the Bill. I should like its provisions to be extended. In the words of the Maud report, the more the proceedings of an authority are open to public scrutiny, the more obvious will be their probity and the more difficult it will be for any irregularity to remain hidden. Only if the procedures of an authority are reasonably visible and intelligible to the public can there be real public confidence. That requires much more than observing the letter of the law or the admission of the public to meetings. A centuries-old slogan is that there should be no taxation without representation. I believe that there should be no rating without the right to be present at meetings of committees and sub-committees, to listen to the decision of the chairman and to hear how individual applications are proceeding.

The Bill is so deserving, beneficial, obvious and just that we do not need to waste a great deal of time upon discussing its contents. I hope that as soon as possible we shall be able to give a Second Reading to it.

I hope that the principles of the Bill will also apply to water authorities—a matter that the House will have an opportunity to discuss later today. The principles enshrined in the Bill certainly ought to apply to urban development corporations. The London Docklands Development Corporation exercises many of the functions of a local authority. It has planning and land acquisition functions and a housing investment programme allocation that is about three times as large as the allocation of the surrounding authorities. It stands at present at £73 million, as against one quarter or one third of that figure in the case of some of the surrounding authorities. It reaches extremely important decisions about the lives not only of those who live in the area of the development corporation but of those who live on the edges of its area. Therefore, I believe that the same principles that apply to local authorities ought to apply with even more force to the development corporation. At one time the leaders of the three surrounding local authorities were appointed as ex officio members of the development corporation. With the passage of time, only one of those leaders now serves on that corporation. At the very least its proceedings ought to be open to the appointed leaders of the surrounding authorities. Indeed, it ought to go much further than that: the proceedings ought to be opened up altogether.

I wish to comment upon the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). I thought that his opposition to the Bill was synthetic and that he was discourteous to the House. Having spoken as a Scotsman upon a Bill that does not concern Scotland —having spoken for over half an hour—he ought at least to have had the courtesy to stay and listen to the speech of the hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Norris) who followed him.

The hon. and learned Gentleman's argument against the Bill in principle had no substance. He mentioned its manpower and financial implications which, he said, were of incalculable proportions. The answers to his questions are to be found, in part, in those local authorities which already put the provisions of the Bill into practice and which suffer no adverse financial or manpower consequences.

As for personal privacy, the hon. and learned Gentleman had only to read paragraph (d) of the schedule to the Bill to see that his fears were groundless. The hon. Member for Cheltenham referred to what was said about secrecy by an American President. Perhaps I could adapt for the benefit of the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross a quotation from Abraham Lincoln, who said:

> "His argument is as thin as the homeopathic soup which was made by boiling the shadow of a pigeon which had been starved to death."

Perhaps it might be the shadow of a grouse which had been starved to death. There was very little substance in the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

I support the Bill because secrecy at its worst is the sponsor of corruption, oppression, injustice, inefficiency and deception. We have seen that from as long ago as the Star Chamber up to the decisions of post-war Cabinets. There have been disgraceful Government decisions, such as that to hide from the House of Commons, as the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) said, the deportation of people to Soviet Russia. We have also had recent disclosures of the hiding of expenditure on and the implications of the development of the hydrogen bomb. No matter what feelings may be about those issues, those issues should be open to public scrutiny.

The hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross said that the Bill will inhibit officers in writing reports which might be open to public scrutiny. That is the test of conduct. If it is known that decisions and what is written on a factual basis will be open to public scrutiny, writers will think of the interests of the entire community and write in a way that can be justified to all those who are likely to read what is said and be affected by their decisions.

Openness makes for efficiency and removes corruption and oppression. I wholeheartedly support the Bill.

Mr. Merchant: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I draw to your attention a matter which may constitute an abuse of the customs of the House? While I was in the Chamber earlier I was passed an envelope by one of the Messengers, which I believe was one of a number, containing a duplicated letter headed "Northern Liberal Party", from an obscure address in Cleveland and signed with a squiggle, "pp Mrs. Fletcher". The messenger service is hard-pressed at the best of times to pass messages between hon. Members, and I should be grateful if the matter could be looked at because the acceptance of large batches of duplicated letters from outside the House overloads the system and constitutes an abuse of a custom.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I shall have the hon. Member's point looked into.

1.37 pm

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): I do not wish to detain the House long. First, I apologise to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who is not in the Chamber, for ruining his joke earlier. He said the line with such seriousness that I honestly thought that he was in difficulty. I could not believe that someone could arrive at Bradford and not know the name of the local newspaper. That should ensure me reasonable coverage at least.

Bradford has a proud tradition of firsts in many things. For example, it was the first authority to have free school meals, to promote an industrial and urban area as a tourist area—something that it is doing successfully—and to have amended, in May 1984, its standing orders to allow for the provisions of the Bill. In November 1984 the Bill's provisions came into effect and since then Bradford has advocated the very thing that the Bill is aimed at—freedom of information and open government. I am proud to say that it was a forward-thinking Conservative administration that introduced that, with all-party support —much like the Bill which is introduced today by a forward-thinking Conservative Member with all-party support.

Bradford started from the admirable position that one should take the view that all meetings and documents should be open unless there is a good reason to the contrary —not the opposite view, which has so long existed in local authorities, Government and other public authorities, that everything should be hidden unless there is a good reason why it should be made open.

The system is operated in Bradford by agendas being made available in seven libraries throughout the city. On the agendas is the name of a person whom a member of the public may telephone to find how to obtain access to reports relevant to items on the agenda. The papers can be inspected and photocopied at the expense of the member of the public. That is an important point. The estimated expenditure of the Bradford open government policy is estimated to be a mere £2,000. Some of the fears of hon. Members are therefore somewhat exaggerated.

Another factor to be taken into account is officer time. However, it is the council's view, and mine, that the time that is spent by officers informing members of the public of the council's decisions is worth while. Bradford has tried to market its open government policy. It has made the public aware of it through the press and by issuing brochures. The public are used to council secrecy and are suspicious about what goes on behind the large closed doors of city halls and council offices. It will take time for them to become accustomed to access to meetings and documents. The open government has been operating for a mere two to three months in Bradford and as time passes I am sure that the public will become more aware of it, will become used to the idea and will make greater use of the facilities that have been made available.

A woman came to my surgery last Friday on behalf of a number of tenants living on a council estate. The tenants were objecting to a planning proposal to erect a community centre on some green land opposite their homes. They did not know that the planning sub-committee was meeting on Wednesday to discuss the proposal and that they could attend the meeting, listen to the arguments there advanced and read the background papers. They attended the meeting and I am sure that they read the background papers. The sub-committee's decision may not be any more to their liking but at least they will know why the decision was taken and why the project was proposed. They will be in a position more effectively to argue their case at subsequent meetings.

Bradford has been operating a freedom of information policy and it has worked. The city has not suddenly become ungovernable. Some officers, through natural conservatism, have tended to label more documents "restricted" than perhaps was necessary, but through the pressure of other officers, council members and members of the public I am sure that their approach to the marking of documents will be relaxed and that more and more documents will be derestricted. When documents are restricted there is provision for members of the public and councillors to make an appeal for the documents to be declassified and made available to the public.

The citizens of Bradford have true open government and I am sure that the council's policy will go a long way to abolish suspicions that undoubtedly exist among the public towards local authorities. They regard local government as a monolithic institution. Perhaps they perceive it as one that is trying to conspire against their own interests. All these myths and cobwebs can be blown away in Bradford and, once the Bill is enacted, in local authority areas throughout the country.

I have the honour to represent part of a city which has been forward-thinking enough to implement the policy that is advocated by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire). I commend the Bill to the House and I look forward to the day when other cities can have the same system of local government that Bradford is fortunate to possess.

1.43 pm

Mr. Michael Knowles (Nottingham, East): One of the criticisms which has been expressed by a local government organisation contains a germ of truth which those who support the Bill—and I am one of them—will have to take on board. The criticism is that there is no greater practitioner of the mushroom approach to the supplying of information than the Government when dealing with Back Benchers on both sides of the House. The lack of information in local government is as nothing compared with that in central Government. We have heard several examples of what has happened in national Government over the years.

The Bill is designed to try to make authorities justify secrecy and confidentiality, and secrecy is endemic in our system. That is certainly true of our governmental system, both local and national, and in our social systems as a whole. It has bedevilled industrial relations on occasion. Decisions are handed down in the absence of any discussion.

This secrecy affects many people and not only the employees of local authorities. When I was the leader of a local council I tried to have printed in the newspapers the schools examination results. That seemed to me to be a straightforward policy.

I thought that that would be of interest to parents who were deciding where to send their children to school. The teachers fought me tooth and nail for the same reasons that others fight for secrecy—paternalism and the belief that they know best. It is the attitude of the nanny state. Pupils are the children of teachers' paymasters. The ratepayers pay teachers' salaries. Regardless of that, the teachers said that the results had nothing to do with the parents and that they knew best. I confess that we did not win the battle.

The same attitude can be found in most professional groups in local government—the teachers and the social workers. No one is allowed to interfere with what they want. Possibly the worst is the education lobby, which believes that it has a divine right to ransack the public coffers. That belief has been around for the past 30 years and has had some success.

We are not only tackling local government in the Bill, but we are taking on a wide aspect of our society which affects all kinds of relationships. A cost is involved in breaking down that system. I do not mean a monetary cost, but society will be changed. The "Nanny knows best" attitude has grown up over 500 or so years. It is the inheritance of an agricultural society with the lord in his manor and the peasants being told to do as they are told. That attitude still bedevils many of our systems.

If we are to change it—I believe that we should—we must accept that we shall change many other things. We are after changing people's hearts and minds. Three councils may already practise that which is proposed in the Bill, but that means that 450 do not. Many councils will see the Bill as another pain in the neck shoved on them by unfeeling parliamentarians who do not practise what they preach in their own place of work. That will be the reaction.

If we do not convince people that we want to change society, that reality of power which has gone from committee meetings to sub-committee meetings will disappear into working groups. Caucus meetings have already been discussed. Unless people are convinced that that change is for the good of society, no matter how many Bills we pass, it will make no odds.

Many problems are the result of local government being given too much to do. The machine is not suitable for the tasks imposed upon it, particularly in the post-war era. The massive growth in spending has caused its own problems. With that growth came a change from the old-fashioned relationship, which one could liken to the American constitution with the officers acting as the executive and the councillors acting as the legislature and keeping an eye on them. With the growth in democracy came a belief in a more parliamentary style of system so that the majority party in a council runs that council in the way that the Government run Parliament. That means a hard and fast division on party lines.

The savagery of politics in many local battles makes this Chamber look tame. The bitterness and depth of feeling is often much greater than it is in the House.

Mr. Norris: And that is only among Conservatives.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, only among Conservatives. We have not spoken about the others.

Corporate management has been mentioned. Local government has inherited a medley of federal structures. To turn that into more of a unitary system and to enforce management disciplines on those entrenched professional groups has caused many a long battle in many a council. In the first 18 months after I became leader of Kingston council, 12 of the 13 senior officers left the council for one reason or another. That is not an unusual story. Such things have happened throughout the country.

It has been claimed that many virtues will follow from the passing of the Bill. I believe that it is right in itself. It is said that the Bill will help to avoid another Poulson case, but the system in the United States is much more open than our system, yet is the local government less corrupt? I believe that generally it is more corrupt. The Bill is justifiable in itself. It is a good thing.

Reference has been made to insane little committees in local government. I remember that when I first went into local government my council had a sub-committee on books. Some pressure groups wanted to ban books. When I was leader of the council I toured our public libraries to make sure that there were Noddy books in every one. We got rid of the books sub-committee. It was not only councillors who wanted to ban books—"Read it one more time and then we'll ban it"—because many other groups with crackpot ideas try to bring pressure on councils.

It has been claimed that if information is made available the public will be convinced of the rightness of decisions. I am not sure that that follows. If a council wishes to close a school, no matter how rational and justified the decision may be, parents will not accept it. The idea that making documents available to the parents will convince them is mistaken. However, people may come to realise that hard decisions and hard choices have to be made. It is difficult to get that message across in politics, and it would be a good thing if we could bring that home.

My hon. Friends the Members for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) and for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) mentioned political group meetings and how they are tied into the official structure. That presents difficulties. The group meetings could be made sub-committees of the council, but that would bring worries in its wake. There could be a one-party committee, as we had in Kingston, with no executive powers, but there are obvious dangers in that. Alternatively, there could be a system in which there was no link between the officer structure and the majority party and councillors in general. The two worlds would be separate. I do not think that that would be acceptable either. We face hard choices, and anyone who says that solving those problems will be easy is deluding himself.

I support the Bill, but I do not share the belief of those who think that it will bring a host of solutions to other problems in its wake. It is justifiable in itself.

1.53 pm

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on his good fortune in the ballot and on presenting a Bill that has great support across party boundaries and throughout the country.

My hon. Friend is following the precedent of our right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) who introduced a similar Bill 25 years ago, and who can say what will be the status of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch in 2010? Perhaps he will be leading the nation then. If he is ever in a position of patronage, I hope that he will remember what I have said today.

I welcome the Bill wholeheartedly, not only because I believe in any sensible attempt reasonably to remove the veil of secrecy in government, both local and national, where those secrets are unnecessarily classified as such, but because I believe that knowledge is power and secrets are the building blocks of that power. However, secrecy is often an abuse of power and tends to show evidence of a lack of self-confidence by Governments and authorities which, paradoxically, reduces their standing in the eyes of those for whom they have a responsibility. Strength can come from a self-confidence in one's own policies that openness of government helps to produce. The Bill will be a valuable but modest step towards the desirable openness that I hope will become more prevalent.

The Bill is supported by many disparate groups—local authorities, trade organisations, local groups and Members of Parliament. My local council of Richmond-upon-Thames fully supports the Bill. Indeed, in several respects the council is already acting in accordance with the provisions of the Bill, including the opening to the public of sub-committee meetings, and the specification of the reasons for committees or sub-committees conducting the whole or part of their proceedings during the exclusion of the press and the public. The chief executive and town clerk informed me this morning that, while it will be necessary to consider the Bill and all its ramifications in much greater detail—by, no doubt, the whole council—at the general purposes committee on 29 January the principle of the Bill was accepted nem. con.

My hon. Friend mentioned some of the local authority meetings that are held in secret. He mentioned the Stevenage decision as to the choice of the colour of roses. That meeting was held in secret, as was a meeting dealing with the colour of the dye for maggots acceptable for fishing. Of course, both such matters should be discussed in public. Wars have started over the colour of roses, and the public need information of impending warfare. So far there have been no wars following the choice of the colour of maggots, although wars followed the Diet of Worms.

On a serious point, what is more essential to those who go fishing than to know the nature of the dyestuffs? Some of them are rumoured to cause skin cancer among those who handle the maggots. Therefore, fishermen should be able to hear such discussions so that they can judge rumours for themselves. It is vital that such discussions should be open to the public.

In reply to the criticisms of the Bill, I point out that the cost is minimal in comparison with the value; indeed, with a change of system some savings might be possible in certain councils. I do not believe that it is a matter of too far too soon, or too little too late. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch I believe that the Bill is basically very well constructed, with occasional tiny blemishes, and wholly necessary for the good of democracy.

1.58 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): It gives me very great pleasure to say that I have enjoyed the debate. There was a colourful contribution by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn), who has asked me to say that he has an urgent engagement north of the border and that is why he is not present.

It cannot be disguised that there has been near unanimity in the debate. What I have to say will not seriously disturb that unanimity. The Government welcome the Bill. They welcome particularly the spirit in which it was moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire). I congratulate him, as others have done, not only on his good fortune in the ballot but on his choice of subject and on the way in which he has presented the Bill.

I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend has been realistic about the complexities of some of the issues involved. I think that it is right for me to put on record some of the doubts and matters which will have to be discussed seriously in the Committee stage that I hope that the House will grant to the Bill.

We are often teased by the fact that what are always described as the "Conservative-led" Association of District Councils and the "Conservative-led" Association of County Councils have criticised some measure introduced by the Government. The position has been a little different today, in that the objections of those two bodies have been brushed aside with a great deal of forthrightness by some of my hon. Friends and by some Opposition Members. I shall remember that in future in other contexts.

I remind the House that the ACC and the ADC have serious doubts about clause 4. That clause is wholly unacceptable to the ADC, while it is merely unacceptable to the ACC. Those matters must be seriously discussed in Committee. I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch said that those issues must be examined properly.

Unfortunately, in the time available to me, I cannot comment in detail on all the admirable speeches that have been made, but I shall try to touch on some of the main points. We need to examine clause 4 and paragraph (g) of the schedule. My hon. Friends the Members for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) and for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) have given the reasons why we should examine that paragraph. My hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden said something that cannot be true. She said that the schedule could cover all the interests of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross. I do not believe that all those matters could possibly be written into a schedule to any legislation.

A serious problem arises in clause 4 and paragraph (g) of the schedule. For the first time, we will write into legislation provisions giving greater protection to the information going to party groups and to officers serving such party groups than will be available to officers serving the properly constituted committees and sub-committees of the councils. I do not say that that would be wrong in all circumstances, but I believe that we should note what was said by the hon. Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles), because he has great experience in this regard. Perhaps these measures are correct, but let us not charge too lightly into a move to include for the first time in legislation provisions about which many people have serious doubts. Hon. Members have expressed those doubts today.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced the establishment of an independent impartial inquiry into the procedures of local government in the modern age. I hope that he will soon announce the names of the members of the inquiry. A number of hon. Members have said that the great growth of local government, the wider range of tasks local authorities perform and the much greater discretion they have, make local government a different animal from what it was. Perhaps it is right that some of those practices should have grown up, but we should examine them carefully before building into an admirable Bill provisions that may not have been fully thought through. I hope that the Committee will consider those aspects seriously.

The Committee should also consider a number of lesser matters. With respect to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross, I think that we should consider whether the Bill's provisions should be extended to Scotland. I believe that the Government would welcome that move. Unfortunately, there were no Scottish representatives in the Chamber today to urge that course on us.

It is unlikely that the provisions written into any schedule in any one year to define limits and exclusions will remain in that form for the rest of time. I suggest that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should have the power by order to amend the schedule from time to time. I believe that the Bill's sponsors should consider that point.

A number of other practical and sensible points were brought home to the House. I believe that hon. Members and the members of the inquiry which my right hon. Friend will set up will want to read the speeches of my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East and of the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser), who made a positive and interesting speech.

The hon. Member for Norwood and my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) said that the load placed on hon. Members in extracting information from local authorities — that is the duty of all hon. Members — might be lightened if we managed to get across to people the idea that direct access should be more readily available in the first instance. That would benefit us all.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Norwood for welcoming the Bill in general terms. He pointed out some of the matters that must be examined carefully.

I was alarmed to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch say that he was a moderate. He was then followed by the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), who said, somewhat unconvincingly, that he was an extreme moderate. The final superlative came when the Bill was supported by a member of the Liberal party.

The Bill has genuine cross-party support. That is why I am pleased to say that the Government broadly welcome it, with the proviso that we must study clause 4. Some hard things have been said against it by the local authority associations. We must also look hard at paragraph (g) of the schedule.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch rightly said—this point was re-emphasised by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) — that secrecy in central Government is a separate issue. No one would suggest that the House or its Committees should go into secret session, except in time of war. My hon. Friend made it clear that the issues have different origins.

I was proud to note, when the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) said that there had been three crucial steps on this subject—the Prime Minister's Act in 1960, the Local Government Act 1972 and now this Bill—that all three steps have been led by the Conservatives. That is something of which the Conservative party can be proud.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby made a point with which I sympathise. It is a matter about which he can speak with some authority—that the Bill's success for the public will depend upon the behaviour, capacity and skills of the local press and how it presents the measure.

There has been a terrible degradation of journalistic standards since Watergate. No journalist now thinks that any story is of interest unless it has been leaked. It is becoming a well-known joke in Whitehall — and doubtless in local government—that the only way to get the local press to pay attention to anything is to say that it is secret and to release it. The matter is then put on the front page. If it is put out as a press notice, no interest is shown. I make what might have sounded like a frivolous point in all seriousness. The success of the Bill will depend upon the hard slog of ordinary, professional journalism, not the type of journalistic pornography that relies only upon the excitement of leaks and betrayals.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) made a powerful speech. We all listen to my hon. Friend when he speaks on such matters.

I hope that the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) will not feel that I am being patronising or rebuking him, but there was a feeling in his speech that the subject of information and the importance of being beastly to bureaucracy had recently been invented by him in Portsmouth. When an hon. Member is speaking in the presence of someone like my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point, it is worth remembering that some have been at this game for a long time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant) put the journalists' point of view forcefully. He showed how difficulties could be put in the way of serious journalists. He spoke about his news editor conducting and following through a serious campaign about information in local government. The Bill relies upon that type of serious approach.

Other hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South paid glowing tributes to their local newspapers. That may not be unrelated to their reporting of this debate. I join them in paying tribute to the Bristol newspapers which cover local authority matters seriously.

I hope that I have shown that, although serious doubts have been put forward—the ACC and the ADC, which I have quoted, have voiced their doubts—strong voices have said that something along the lines of the Bill can be made to work. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) described what is successfully taking place in Bradford, under outstandingly able Conservative leadership. That should encourage us all, as should the news that it can be done without excessive cost.

I hope that the progress started in 1960 by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, and carried forward by the Government of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) between 1970 and 1974, will be taken a further step forward, thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch. I do not wish to minimise the volume of work that he and the Committee still have to do. To make the Bill practical and acceptable the Committee will have to tighten up the drafting and deal with some of the points of principle that have been raised. If that can be done, there is no reason why a satisfactory Act should not reach the statute book.

The difficulties should not be minimised. The matter is not over bar the shouting today. It is necessary to get round the problems in clause 4, the difficulty in paragraph (g) of the schedule and what appears to my legal advisers to be a problem in clause 5—that the clause may diminish existing rights of councillors under common law. The Hackney case, referred to today, reminds us of existing rights under the common law. It would be sad if, inadvertently, we narrowed them in any way. Therefore, we must get that point right. I see my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch nodding. I know that he is taking those points on board.

With those serious, but not terminal, provisos, the Government welcome the Bill.

2.10 pm

Mr. Squire: I wish to make the briefest of responses because I am aware that hon. Members have gathered for a subsequent debate. I warmly thank almost all hon. Members who demonstrated a great depth and range of knowledge about local government, on which I hope the Committee will be able to draw during its deliberations. It was generally agreed that no one party can claim that all councils controlled by it are free from any of the allegations of excessive secrecy. I hope, therefore, that we can approach the Committee stage in an all-party atmosphere.

I particularly thank and accept the point made by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), which I should have made in my speech. I thank the officers of Brent and Bradford council who have spent and no doubt will spend considerable time travelling the country and explaining how the system works in practice.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) has perhaps made the most serious possible charge against all Scotsmen. The gist of his comments was that while English and Welsh councils can operate the Bill at a minimal cost, and have said so publicly, the Scots, of all people, are faced with spending lots more money. He has thus dented for ever their reputation among those of us from south of the border for the careful way in which they husband their resources.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

Water Authorities (Meetings) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

2.12 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill is short, its terms and conditions are summed up in three clauses, and it has considerable and widespread public support. Clause 1 provides that the Public Bodies (Admission to Meetings) Act 1960 should simply apply to the water authorities. Hon. Members heard comments about that Act earlier today. Clause 1(2) repeals part of the Water Act 1983, which made the right of the press to attend water authority meetings discretionary. Therein lies the history of the matter. From 1960 water authorities happily held their meetings in public and both the public and press could attend. There was nothing secret about them, and information was readily available. The provision of information lies at the heart of this and other Bills. I have never understood the need to be secretive about whether an authority wishes to put a sewer down Smith street in Browntown, for the sake of argument. I do not understand why such a decision must be cloaked in secrecy.

Until 1983, water authority meetings were open and there were no problems. However, schedule 5 of the Water Act 1983 provided that the reconstituted water authorities should have the discretion to exclude the press. The nine English authorities and the Welsh authority met. The Welsh authority did not worry about the press and the public attending its meetings and said, "We shall carry on as before." To its eternal credit, its latest decision has been to continue the policy of open meetings. There are no problems with regard to secrecy in the Welsh water authority. Journalists can turn up, find out what is going on, ask questions and receive answers.

However, the English authorities decided to meet behind closed doors. Almost every newspaper in the land has thundered against that decision, because the public have a right to know what happens at water authority meetings. We are told that water rates will increase by an average of 12 per cent. this year. The North-Western water authority has said that there will be a 40 per cent. increase during the next three years, and the Thames water authority has said that water rates will increase by 29 per cent. during the next three years. But the public do not know why.

The English water authorities argue that they provide adequate briefings, and that after each board meeting a member of the board, usually the chairman or his secretary, will chat to the press. The authorities seem to believe that that is adequate consultation, but journalists can ask questions only about what they have been told will happen. Journalists are not mind readers. They cannot know what has happened behind those closed doors, and if they hit upon the right questions, it will only be a matter of luck. The Welsh authority does not have that problem, and has no difficulty in communicating with the public.

I hope that we shall have time today to hear the Minister state the Government's attitude to the Bill. I have my suspicions as to what it will be, but I should tell the House who is in favour of the Bill. It is not only the press; we seem to have gathered a bandwagon of supporters——

Mr. Donald Thompson (Calder Valley): A water wagon.

Mr. Bermingham: It may prove to be a water wagon that drowns the opposition to the Bill. We have support not only from hon. Members on both sides of the House, but from the other place, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of District Councils and the Association of County Councils. For once, councils at all levels are united, because they believe strongly in the Bill, as do trade unions such as the National Union of Public Employees, the National and Local Government Officers Association and other major unions. We are also supported by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, the Country Landowners Association — a Bill that is supported by both NUPE and the Country Landowners Association has about as wide a spectrum of support as one could achieve—the Institute of Journalists, the National Union of Journalists, the National Federation of Old Age Pensions Associations, the National Federation of Anglers and the National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses. Every sector of society supports the Bill. The only body that has spoken against the Bill is, believe it or not, the Association of Water Authorities. I wonder why?

To hoist the Home Secretary on his own petard, I remind the House that recently, in the Select Committee on Home Affairs, in answer to a question from me, the right hon. and learned Gentleman agreed that a lack of knowledge gave rise to speculation, often ill-informed speculation, that in a democratic society things should be open and above board and that it should be one's right to know. On that occasion the Home Secretary was speaking on the more controversial subject of the special branch.

Today we are talking about water authorities, which are taxation-raising bodies. They can raise taxes from every householder with a water supply, so that their activities apply to 99·9 per cent. of the population. Yet for some unknown reason there is a desire for those bodies to meet behind closed doors. Why? What has happened to the water industry since 1983? We are told that it has changed its format and shape and that it is more like a nationalised industry which has undergone a reduction in the size of boards, the members of which have a more managerial type function. That is all a load of baloney.

The water industry is a national asset which is divided into nine areas, and those areas are arbitrary in their format and layout. Before 1983, local authorities had an input into those boards by way of the members they appointed or sent as representatives to their meetings. By that means we had a degree of accountability and knowledge.

At the heart of this issue lies a simple principle. If an organisation has the right to raise taxation—call it rates or whatever—it must be accountable. The only way it can be accountable is by being open, honest and above board in its dealings with the public. That means letting the press and public know what is being done. If decisions are justified publicly, there can be no ill-informed speculation and people are saved unnecessary worry. Against that background, I commend the Bill to the House.

2.22 pm

The Minister for Housing and Construction (Mr. Ian Gow): I congratulate the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) on his success in the ballot and on the way in which he moved the Second Reading of his Bill.

The question of the admission of the press to meetings of the boards or water authorities was discussed fully on the Floor of the House and upstairs in Committee during the passage of the Water Act 1983. It is all very well for the hon. Member for St. Helens, South to call in aid the Home Secretary; my right hon. and learned Friend supported the provisions of that Act.

These issues were debated thoroughly at the time, and the hon. Member for St. Helens, South rightly acknowledged that, since the passing of the 1983 Act, the boards of water authorities had become much more streamlined. Because they now act as executive boards, the necessity that some hon. Members thought used to exist for admitting the press and public to their meetings is no longer justified.

The new streamlined water authorities contain members, all of whom are appointed by Ministers, who in turn are accountable to this House for the appointments they make. Every member of a water authority is appointed by my right hon. Friend. In addition the authorities are subject to ministerial direction and financial controls, a matter to which I hope to return on Thursday. We have created boards that are executive in style, like those of other nationalised industries and private sector companies. The hon. Gentleman referred to the ability of water authorities—he did not mention it but the same is true of water companies — to levy charges that are payable in law by their customers. The same is true of those who impose telephone charges and charges for gas and electricity.

We recognise that the press and the public have a right to know about the activities of water authorities and the decisions that they take. That is why we have provided safeguards. The hon. Gentleman did not refer to the code of practice which has the approval of the chairmen of water authorities. It sets out in para 1.2 the information that must be provided to the press and says:

"A list identifying items for discussion at the press conference will be circulated in advance."

Section 7 of the Water Act 1983 requires each water authority to draw up proposals for representing consumers' interests in their areas. This was a new departure for the water industry but it has been a success. A further safeguard was provided in the code of practice.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Gow: I have only five minutes. I shall gladly give way to the hon. Gentleman in Thursday's debate.

The water authorities have found that their ability to meet in private——

Mr. Rooker: Chicken.

Mr. Gow: I promise to give way to the hon. Gentleman on Thursday.

Mr. Rooker: But that is a quite different debate.

Mr. Gow: I shall not give way now.

The chairmen have told me that their boards are now able to hold much more searching discussion of issues. They have found that their freedom to discuss matters in an untrammelled way without being inhibited by the presence of the press or the public has helped them to get to grips with difficult issues without being tempted to play to the gallery. Some water authorities have from time to time reconsidered their decision whether to meet privately. They have concluded that the advantages to business efficiency of meeting in private, and hence the gain that accrues to their customers, outweighs any disadvantages that some press commentators read into their actions.

Mr. Rooker: Will the Minister give way on this point?

Mr. Gow: I have just told the hon. Gentleman that I shall not.

The chairmen believe that those advantages would be diminished if they allowed the press into their proceedings. The water authorities' chairmen do not hold those views because they wish to hide behind a veil of secrecy. On the contrary, they have assured me that they wish to be as open as is consistent with the proper running of their businesses. They have told me that they have been pleased to find that the journalists who attend their press conferences are now better informed on water matters then when they were simply able to attend board meetings.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): If the water authorities think that journalists are much better informed, do the journalists agree?

Mr. Gow: More journalists turn up to press conferences held by chairmen after the meetings of boards than used to turn up to the meetings of the much larger boards.

During the past few months we have done our utmost to ensure that there is much more open debate about environmental pollution issues as well, through the implementation of part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974. We have provided for public involvement in the granting of discharge consents. From yesterday, all new discharges having an appreciable effect on the receiving waters have to be advertised. There are now opportunities for public representations and there is power for the Secretary of State to call in applications.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Gow: No.

Last autumn, we undertook public consultation with a view to requiring water authorities to maintain, with effect from 31 July this year, public registers of effluent discharge and consent conditions attached to them. We intend to proceed with the proposals and I expect to lay the necessary regulations before the House shortly.

The material on public registers will be comprehensive and will be available immediately. The Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution, when considering confidentiality in its recent report——

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I beg to move, That the Question be now put.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am not prepared to accept that motion.

Mr. Gow: The opening of authority meetings to the public is an irrelevance——

It being half past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Friday 22 February.

Dreadnought Seamen's Hospital, Greenwich

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): I am grateful for the opportunity in an Adjournment debate to raise the subject of the Dreadnought seamen's hospital. This is not the time to speak at length of the fine tradition of service of this hospital, stretching back into the last century, towards British seamen and seamen from overseas. Suffice it to say that we in Greenwich are proud to have this hospital in our borough and that nearly 300 people are currently dependent upon the hospital for jobs. However, it has had to face uncertainty about its future over almost the whole period that I have had the honour to represent the constituency of Greenwich. It faces that threat today from the proposal that is currently out for consultation that the facilities should be moved to St. Thomas' hospital and the Dreadnought hospital should be closed down.

At the outset I should remind the Minister of the commitment that was made by the then Minister for Health on 10 June 1981:

"The Government is committed to retaining the Dreadnought on its present site as a separate hospital for seamen and its future is in no way threatened".

The proposed transfer arose as a result of a request from the National Maritime Board. Consequently, the future of the hospital has again been thrown into doubt. The National Maritime Board has a specific responsibility—to ensure that proper facilities for seamen exist. As I understand its position, its members have never been happy ever since the decision was taken, when the National Health Service was reorganised in 1974, that the seamen's hospital should become the responsibility under that reorganisation of the regional area, or, later, the district health authority.

The Minister will recognise that the Dreadnought is a national institution with national and, indeed, international functions and responsibilities. It is therefore not appropriate, to say the least, that it should have to compete for funds within the district or the region, whose responsibilities are local and regional. The previous Minister, the hon. Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan), recognised that. On 19 January 1981, when he met the National Maritime Bord, he agreed that the Dreadnought needed a separate and identifiable budget and promised further consultation on that point.

I would at this point urge that those consultations should proceed. The future of the hospital cannot be assured unless and until separate funding is accepted. What is more, extra funds, voluntarily contributed by maritime interests, seamen's unions, or other sources are, to a degree, dependent upon the donors being assured that their contributions are being wholly devoted to the Dreadnought. Whether that is now the case or not is not the point. People and organisations will not contribute unless there is a separate budget and they can see the benefits which their contributions are providing for seamen.

The Minister should be aware that the balance of opinion in the National Maritime Board has changed since that board considered the possibility of the move to St. Thomas'. The board is made up of 50 per cent. shipping companies and 50 per cent. employee organisations. Today, only one employee organisation supports transfer. Nevertheless, I understand that there is a petition in existence, signed by 9,000 members of the Merchant Navy and Air Line Officers Association, in favour of retaining the Dreadnought on its present site. I have heard recently that the Royal Navy Association, particularly the Dartford branch, has formed the same opinion.

But on the employers' side I gather that a number of shipping companies are now concerned about the transfer proposals. I have copies of a number of letters from shipping companies which make it clear that they entertain serious doubts about the viability of the proposed transfer and its effect on the future medical treatment of seamen. I would gladly pass them on to the Minister if he would like that because I am certain that he wants his final decision to accord with the views of the majority of interests which are directly affected.

Why has anxiety been expressed in so many quarters about the proposed transfer? I could speak at length, from personal knowledge, of the unique services which the Dreadnought currently provides and which are geared to the occupational needs of seamen. The staff of the hospital, apart from being dedicated people themselves, have inherited a long tradition of experience in this specialist field. They are experienced in the details of the comprehensive maritime fitness protocols. Their investigation and treatment of patients are established around those regulations.

The proposals for transfer imply redundancies for practically the entire staff and therefore the loss of all that expertise. At no time has the staff at St. Thomas' made any attempt to study those matters and discover whether they are or could become competent to undertake those responsibilities.

Meanwhile, the staff of the Dreadnought have sought independent medical opinion. They approached Sir Reginald Murley, the former president of the Royal College of Surgeons. In a full reply, he says:

"I intend no disrespect to St. Thomas' hospital in stating that seamen are most unlikely to get as personal and prompt a service as the Dreadnought has provided. The medical gain for the small percentage of seamen who may require more elaborate investigation and/or treatment will not compensate for the loss of facilities, geared to their special needs, which the majority of seamen now enjoy."

As I have said, merchant seamen's medical management is a specialist topic. Therefore, it is unlikely to have the attention paid to it in a large hospital with consultants and a rotating junior staff who are all too likely to resent that small group of exceptional patients who do not come into any clear category of management, who are non-medical emergencies, and who yet should have priority over every other kind of patient.

Indeed, it is likely that, within a short time of transfer to a wholly NHS hospital, compromises will be made over the management of those patients, resulting in increased redundancies for seamen, longer periods off work and a dislocation of the routine of the shipping companies and their medical officers. Dreadnought gets seamen back on ship and fit for work. As a result, many of its patients' jobs are salvaged in the middle of their working lives.

The future of Dreadnought is up for consultation and, therefore, it may not be thought an appropriate time to raise this issue in the House. I do so because I think that the Minister should be asked to intervene to get the consultation withdrawn. He will recall that he had correspondence on this subject with councillor Glyn Williams, the chairman of the Greenwich community health council. It has been put to him that under the terms of circular HSC (IS 207) it is necessary for a district health authority, when issuing a consultation document which may lead to a closure, to be aware of the implications that such a change would have for the patients. It is apparent that this was not the case.

Both my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and I were present at the meeting of the district health authority on 13 November when the decision was taken. It became clear that the members had not seen a copy of the operational policy document of the West Lambeth district health authority, though it is conceivable that the chairman may have had sight of it. I submit that the terms of the circular have not been fulfilled and that the consultation document should therefore be withdrawn.

In the letter that the Minister wrote to Councillor Williams, he claims :

"neither the Department nor the Greenwich health authority has been shown a document of the Price Waterhouse Report."

I have been categorically assured that such a document was sent to the Minister. I have mentioned the report in the House and the Minister told me that he was looking forward to reading it. I shall be glad to send him a copy together with a second report, which should be complete during next month, to ensure that their contents are fully understood within the Department. This is by no means the only communication about Dreadnought that appears to have gone astray within the Department.

The first Price Waterhouse report dealt with costs and savings arising from the proposed move. That is a matter of central importance. The Minister accepted the findings of the feasibility study on 6 June 1983 and so initiated local consultation. That study estimated the savings to Greenwich district as £1·2 million. In the latest consultation document the district health authority admits that the savings would now amount to only £690,000. The difference is considerable.

The Minister wrote to the chairman of the Greenwich health authority saying that he agreed with the authority's figure. That is surprising, as the regional health authority stated in the document issued in December 1983 that there would be a £900,000 surplus to Greenwich if the move took place.

It is ironic that we should be considering the possibility of closing a hospital which makes special provision when other European countries such as Holland and Norway are opening them. Apart from our needs as a seafaring nation, we have international responsibilities to fulfil. We should continue to fulfil them in the only hospital that we still possess that is capable of discharging them. Above all, I am worried, as I am sure the Minister is, about the uncertainty for the members of the staff, which is demoralising for them. They are a dedicated staff in a fine hospital. I hope that the Minister will use every effort to bring the uncertainty to an end and ensure that Dreadnought continues to fulfil the functions that it has carried on for so many years.

2.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I am pleased that the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) has secured this Adjournment debate on the future of a long-standing and important hospital. I appreciate the way in which he has raised his arguments on behalf of the staff, the hospital itself, its traditions and, most of all, the patients. When we are considering changes in the pattern of service—old hospitals shutting and new ones opening and services being switched from one place to another —it is terribly easy to lose sight of the purpose that staff and buildings serve and of the needs of patients. I think that the hon. Gentleman kept his eye very much on the needs and interests of the patients rather than on buildings, for example. I agree with the hon. Gentleman about that. The future of the hospital is close to his heart, judging from the anxieties that he has already expressed to my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health and myself and to the Greenwich health authority. I am also aware of early-day motion 94 which has attracted wide support. I understand that 117 hon. Members have signed it.

I join the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to the excellent work that has been done for so many years by the staff at the Dreadnought Seamen's hospital. The staff is backed by the local community, the friends and relatives of present and former patients and the Royal Naval Association.

The anxiety is caused by the Greenwich health authority proposal to close the hospital and to transfer medical services for seamen to a specially designated unit at St. Thomas' hospital. The health authority issued a consultative document on its proposal last November and consultations will continue until 28 February. As consultations are proceeding it is not appropriate for Ministers to intervene. I shall try to explain the reasons, although I do not think that they will satisfy the hon. Gentleman.

I shall first explain briefly the procedures that health authorities must follow when they wish to close or change the use of a building permanently. The hon. Gentleman seems to be familiar with the process so I shall not describe it exhaustively, but I shall put it on the record and explain the arguments for and against the proposal.

The appropriate district health authority is required to prepare a consultative document. Comments on the proposals in the document are invited within three months from such bodies as the local community health council, the local authorities, joint staff consultative committees, family practitioner committees, local advisory committees and the general public. If the community health council objects to the proposals it is entitled to submit to the authority a counter-proposal. If that counter-proposal cannot be agreed and the local and regional health authorities want the closure to proceed the case is referred to Ministers for decision.

I shall not go into detail about the issues in this case, but in my experience it is at that stage that arguments to try to reconcile different sets of figures arise and different facts are debated by those who object to the closure. That is the stage at which Ministers should intervene, to try to weigh up the evidence and to act in the impartial and quasi-judicial manner that all health Ministers seek to act.

We have made it clear that when proposals are made to us Ministers will not agree to closure or change of use unless it can be clearly demonstrated that the closure or change of use is in the best interest of local health services and the community or unless savings will result to finance developments in under-target districts and so enhance the nation's health care.

We take the consultative process seriously. After the consultation process is over and the hon. Gentleman wants to see the Minister for Health or myself he has only to ask. We shall be pleased to see him again to discuss the arguments in detail. That is an open invitation. In this case not only local interests are at stake. The Dreadnought is a hospital with a special dimension.

Successive Governments have long recognised that seafarers have special medical needs, the nature of whose employment makes it difficult for them to join hospital waiting lists. They require quick treatment, rehabilitation and discharge, so that they can rejoin their ship at the right time and place.

We remain committed to the provision of adequate medical services for seafarers. The issue is how those services can best be provided—whether in the existing hospital in Greenwich, which the Dreadnought has inhabited since 1870, when it came ashore from the hulk that it had prevously occupied in the Thames, or in a new facility in St. Thomas' hospital.

The idea of a move came in 1981 from the National Maritime Board, which represents the interests of shipping industry employers and the seafarers' union. A unanimous request was made to the then Minister for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan) that a new site be found for the Dreadnought. Since then, opinions have gone backward and forward, but much of the present situation derives from that request by the NMB.

My hon. Friend the then Minister for Health agreed to consider the request and to look at alternative sites, but the NMB itself entered discussions with the West Lambeth health authority, which manages St. Thomas' hospital, on the possibility of a transfer to that hospital. We asked the South-East Thames regional health auhority to carry out a feasibility study, which was completed in 1982. We accepted the findings of that study and in July 1983, my right hon. and learned Friend the present Minister for Health asked for local consultations to be carried out. They were completed in West Lambeth in January 1984, but are continuing in Greenwich.

I understand that the National Union of Seamen, one of the constituent bodies of the NMB, changed its policy last year, some time after the initial request by the NMB, and now opposes the transfer of the Dreadnought—and we shall have to take account of that fact. I wish to emphasise that the proposal for the transfer was originally made by the National Maritime Board. It has been said that the then Minister for Health undertook in June 1981 that the future of the Dreadnought in Greenwich was secure. However, notwithstanding that undertaking, I do not believe that we could have ignored the request for a move made by the NMB. That would have been wrong.

The consultations on the proposal are in train and will conclude by the end of this month. As the West Lambeth community health council has already opposed the proposal, my judgment is that it is most likely that the matter will be referred through the regional health authority to Ministers for a decision, at which stage all the points raised in this interesting debate can be dealt with.

I cannot give any indication of what our decision is likely to be, but there are arguments for the proposal as well as against it. It is certainly arguable that a higher standard of treatment could be provided for seafarers if the Dreadnought is associated with the specialised facilities of a major teaching hospital. I appreciate the quotations from a distinguished medical source that only a minority of patients would benefit from a closer association with acute facilities and that much might be lost in terms of continuing care, interest, reservoirs of experience and the atmosphere of the Dreadnought. We all know that buildings and hospitals have their own atmosphere and traditions. The balance will have to be struck by Ministers if the matter lands on our desk for determination.

Because of the historic decline in the size of the British merchant fleet, only about half the bed capacity of the Dreadnought is used for seafarers. It is important to make that point.

If seafarers need a unit of about 60 beds—the size of the unit proposed for St. Thomas'—it might well be provided more economically there than at Greenwich. I am not prejudging the issue; I am trying to put the other side of the case as I picked it up by reading the correspondence that I have had with the hon. Gentleman, among others. There are two sides to the question. I am simply saying how difficult it will be for my right hon. and learned Friend to take decisions should the matter reach us.

West Lambeth and Greenwich districts, like other London districts, need to rationalise their acute services. The Dreadnought transfer might help them to do that. The particular needs of seafarers have to be set against the particular needs to rationalise acute services in London.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall consider the proposals in the interests of the Health Service as a whole but bearing in mind, of course, the tradition of the hospital and the particular service that it gives.

2.56 pm

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): I apologise to the Minister, having heard only his last few comments. I should be grateful if he would consider two further points. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) will have put all the pertinent points about the hospital. At the conclusion of his remarks the Minister said, without any equivocation whatever, that there was a need for rationalisation of acute beds. I submit to him that in all the regions, especially the one with which he is concerned here, there is an argument about the need to rationalise.

Bearing in mind the specialties of the Dreadnought hospital, rationalisation could well mean a diminution in facilities. A press report this week spoke of the large number of problems arising from rationalisation where resources are cut. As a result, there is a shortage of certain specialties. When we talk of acute, chronic or geriatric beds, we are giving blanket definitions.

The Minister would appear to be prejudging the case. Although he rightly says that he does not have to judge the case until such time as it arrives on his desk, he also says that there is a need for rationalisation of acute beds in the region. That is an arguable statement. He cannot reasonably say that a case has been fully made out for the rationalisation of acute beds.

I ask for the indulgence of the House, not having been present for most of the debate. I think that the Minister acknowledged that a hospital has its individual personality, ambience, tradition and culture. Too often, on purely financial and economic grounds, after a hospital has developed its own personality and served certain sections of the community for decades, as the Dreadnought has done, it is argued that, provided the necessary technical equipment is available, it does not matter whether a hospital remains as a viable living unit, with its medical and paramedical staff, its culture and tradition. It is entirely wrong that the only considerations should be material ones. I know that the Minister thinks clearly on these matters, and I hope that he will consider the points that I have mentioned.

2.58 pm

Mr. Patten: By leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to respond to the two points made by the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt). I thank the hon. Gentleman for his compliment. We always consider the virtues of particular hospitals and their traditions.

Without trying to introduce a partisan note, I would say only that in my concluding remarks I was not trying to prejudge the issue but simply attempting to set the particular issue of the Dreadnought hospital and its future against the overall context of health care in London. That policy has been advanced by successive Governments since 1976. The then Labour Administration said that acute services needed rationalising and that redistribution of resources should occur. I was seeking to set the particular case of the Dreadnought hospital against the needs of health care in the capital as a whole.

I look forward to getting a chance to discuss the issue further with the hon. Member for Greenwich, who raised this important subject, should it come to my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State and myself for determination at a later stage.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Three o'clock.

DARTMOOR COMMONS BILL

Considered; to be read the Third time.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Association of Metropolitan Authorities

1. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next intends meeting representatives of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): Neither my right hon. Friend nor I have any immediate plans to meet representatives of the AMA. I meet them as necessary from time to time on matters of mutual interest.

Mr. Davies: Will the Minister or her Secretary of State seek a meeting with the AMA? If she were to do so she would find from the urban areas of Britain a reception as hostile as that which she received from the rural areas, particularly Wales, on the proposed legislation on buses. Will she advise the Secretary of State that if such a meeting were held it might provide a convenient opportunity for the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider his proposals, to climb down and perhaps save what little face he has left?

Mrs. Chalker: As I said, I meet the AMA from time to time, particularly its members in the different authorities, and that includes members from the metropolitan county councils, who have been present at a number of meetings where this issue has been raised. I accept that many people are scared about what will happen, but that is a result of scaremongering and the failure to face the fact that competition has always brought about a better standard of service for the passengers. It is about time that we organised Britain's transport on the basis of the needs of passengers rather than of those who would administer it.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: When my hon. Friend meets the AMA, will she confirm to it, as to the House, that although rear seat belts may be desirable, she as no intention of making them compulsory?

Mrs. Dunwoody: That is matter for the House.

Mrs. Chalker: I am surprised that that should arise on this question, but one gets used to any subject coming up. We are studying carefully the Select Committee's recommendations and, as the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) says, whether rear seat belts should be made compulsory would be a matter for the House and not for Ministers.

Mr. Alton: When the Minister meets representatives of the AMA, will she meet the Merseyside representatives and discuss with them the decision to close the link between the Isle of Man and Liverpool, a 150-year-old service, which the Isle of Man Steam Packet Company decided to terminate precipitously and arbitrarily on Friday last, putting people out of work and massively inconveniencing people who live on the island and on Merseyside?

Mrs. Chalker: That is not a matter for the AMA. From my reading of the newspapers, that service is not to be terminated but its destination point changed from Liverpool to Heysham. Obviously that is a matter of concern to everyone in the Liverpool area, but there must be good management reasons for that. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman can draw some of his own conclusions.

Buses

2. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further responses he has received to the White Paper, "Buses", Cmnd. 9300.

7. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further representations he has received concerning the White Paper, "Buses".

15. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Transport what response he has so far received to the White Paper, "Buses".

20. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further representations he has received concerning the White Paper, "Buses".

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I received nearly 8,000 responses to the White Paper and the consultation documents which were issued subsequently.

Mr. Waller: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that those who genuinely wish to make a constructive contribution to the creation of a more appropriate framework for buses are becoming increasingly frustrated and irritated by the exaggerated claims and the distortions of those who are opposed to any change whatsoever? Does he agree that, far from abolishing standards, the Bill, with its many clauses, will reinforce them?

Mr. Ridley: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend and I am grateful for what he said. Standards are important and, now that the Bill has been published, the House will have had the chance to see the statutory provisions that we propose to improve standards. Where there has been total deregulation in the long-distance coach industry, standards have improved enormously because operators realise that if they are to attract more customers it is in their interests to provide high standards.

Mr. Pike: Will the right hon. Gentleman accept the serious concern expressed by many people who use public transport and many who run public transport that if the Bill goes forward as published it will be disastrous for off-peak services, rural services and concessionary fares? Will he take into account the views expressed at the seminar held today by Transport 2000?

Mr. Ridley: I beg to differ. The purpose of the Bill is to improve the matters which the hon. Gentleman listed. I assure him that I would not be seeking to legislate to make services worse. I believe he will discover that the effect of the combination of tendering for services, the rural bus grant and the new flexibility which the provisions of the Bill allow will be that rural services will improve very much. The hon. Gentleman ought to be very careful before suggesting otherwise from his rural area of Burnley.

Mr. Nellist: Is the Secretary of State aware that the Bill —a cowboys' charter—with its proposals to end internal cross-subsidisation, taken with the effects of the abolition of the West Midlands county council and other county councils, puts at risk up to 30 per cent. of services in Coventry and the rest of the west midlands? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his vague promises about the protection of pensioners' bus passes fall on stony ground, because it is no good having a bus pass if Sunday, evening and other services do not turn up at the bus stop?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has gone no further than obtaining a copy of the Bill. He clearly has not read it. If he had, he would know that if off-peak services are not provided by the operator—and I think that in many cases they will be—they can be provided by the local authority, which can put them out to tender in the way described in the Bill. That is also the case with concessionary fares. If those fares end in Coventry, the hon. Gentleman will know who to blame. It will be his own local authority and not me.

Mr. Beith: Regarding the tender proposals, how can a local authority receive realistic tender proposals for a route on which the operator could face competition from another operator who is prepared to take only the profitable part of that route?

Mr. Ridley: It would be a strange competitor who, without subsidy, challenged a subsidised operator on a route which had been genuinely uneconomic and had been put out to tender. The circumstances suggested by the hon. Gentleman seem to me extremely remote. However, if the position outlined by the hon. Gentleman occurred, I suggest that there could be a break clause in the contract and everybody would be pleased to know that part of the route that had been subsidised did not need subsidy, and that would save some money.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: When my right hon. Friend studies the responses to the White Paper, I hope that he will also study the report by Bristol university, which appeared in the papers today and confirmed that the Hereford experiment had been excellent and beneficial to consumers. Does my right hon. Friend agree that as a loss-making publicly owned line in a rural area in my constituency can be replaced by a private, unsubsidised service, that shows that there is plenty of scope?

Mr. Ridley: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right, though I have not yet had time to study the Bristol report. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary talked to well over 60 people on the buses in Hereford and found none who had anything but praise for the new system. Their only fear is that the deregulated system might be taken away from them, to their very great disadvantage.

Mr. Holt: Has my right hon. Friend had any responses from, or discussions with, the Bishop of Durham, who is this week addressing a political meeting in Cleveland at which all Conservative and alliance Members have been refused the opportunity to speak?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Gentleman talking about buses?

Mr. Holt: That is exactly what my question is about.

Mr. Ridley: The dreadful thing is, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. Friend was talking about buses in connection with the bishop. However, if the bishop is interested, I should be very happy to meet him and to take him through the Bill clause by clause.

Mr. Cowans: Might it not be in the interests of the House, and certainly those of the Secretary of State, if he could substantiate his case—if, indeed, he has one—by publishing all the responses and placing copies of them in the Library, so that we could see all those who are in favour of the proposals, all those who are against and the reasons why? The right hon. Gentleman should have nothing to fear if people support him to the extent that he claims.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that if responses are sent privately to me it would be quite wrong to publish them without first gaining the consent of those who wrote them. Anyone who wishes to publish his response to a consultative document is at liberty to do so himself.

Mr. Tracey: I am sure that most people will welcome the policy of added competition if it follows the example of Hereford, as outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) and by the article that appeared today in The Times. However, may I urge my right hon. Friend to reconsider greater competition for hire cars in the London area?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks. I am acutely aware of the point that he raised. It is a difficult issue, with arguments on both sides, but we can debate it at length in Committee. I do not have a closed mind about it.

Mr. Stott: The Secretary of State must be all too painfully aware of the representations that he has received on the content of the White Paper from the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of District Councils, the Womens Institute, Rural Voice and the Taxi Drivers Association. If he had any sense he would listen to them instead of dispatching the Under-Secretary of State to travel round the country wining and dining local newspaper editors in order to create propaganda in favour of his Bill.

Mr. Ridley: If the hon. Gentleman had any sense he would listen to the voices of the consumers, to those of the National Consumer Council and to the people on the buses in Hereford. He would also stop taking the side of vested interests and come down on the side of the customer.

Later——

Mr. Holt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it directed to questions?

Mr. Holt: Directly, Mr. Speaker. May I apologise to you if I shouted and did not make it clear that the public rally to be addressed next week in Cleveland by the Bishop of Durham is exclusively to do with buses and has nothing to do with religion?

Mr. Speaker: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman if I queried his question. I am glad that the matter is now straight.

3. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport what evidence he has for his assertion that safety standards will be improved by implementation of the White Paper, "Buses".

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): The provisions in the Transport Bill reflect the Government's determination to maintain and tighten safety standards.

Mr. Madden: Is not the truth of the matter that the claim that deregulation will lead to better safety standards is as bogus as the claim that deregulation will lead to cheaper, better and more efficient transport services? Is it not about time that the Secretary of State, who is generally seen as a walking disaster area for good transport, tore up the Bill and allowed public authorities the proper level of resources to run improving and expanding public transport services?

Mr. Mitchell: Deregulation itself does not affect the safety level. We have never suggested that it would lead to higher safety standards. We have said that we shall put extra resources into ensuring that safety standards are properly maintained even though there may well be more operators than at present. The hon. Gentleman referred to better and cheaper services, and I should point out that our experience of the test areas is that deregulation produces more, better and cheaper services, and is liked by the customer.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will my hon. Friend confirm that at the last count 60 per cent. of National Bus Company buses had failed the first test? Will he also confirm that Lancashire county council is needlessly worrying many people by publishing figures that will frighten them off the buses? Will he further confirm that many of the representations that he receives are merely in the form of cut-out bits from newspapers that are paid for with £135,000 of ratepayers' money?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend has got the figures slightly wrong. Perhaps I can help her and the House. A total of 60 per cent. of the National Bus Company's buses passed on their admission, but 56 per cent. of the private sector buses passed—slightly less than for the National Bus Company—and 47 per cent. of London Transport buses passed, which is substantially less.

Mr. Strang: Does the Minister understand that his Bill is bound to lead to cowboy operators with clapped out buses driven by part-time non-union drivers racing from stop to stop? Does he agree that that is bound to lead to lower safety?

Mr. Mitchell: The experiment in Hereford and Worcester shows that as soon as unsafe vehicles appear on the road they are put off by Department inspectors. We shall devote adequate resources to ensure that that system continues and is dealt with effectively. The Bill contains powers to deal with racing.

Mr. Gregory: Will my hon. Friend assure the House that under the Bill there will be more safety checks, because 2,300 buses and coaches failed their special inspection test in 1983-84, and at the annual inspection a staggering 21·4 per cent. failed? Will he assure the House that the consumer will have better safety protection?

Mr. Mitchell: We are taking the necessary steps to ensure that adequate resources are available for the task. I have not said that there will be a significant improvement in existing standards, but steps are being taken by most operators to improve the level of passes. There are some unfortunate gaps. A recent chance survey of 5 per cent. of London Transport stock resulted in half the buses being put off the road immediately.

Mr. Stephen Ross: When the Minister visited Herefordshire, did he discuss the many complaints about parking offences, the allegations about wilful damage to coaches and the allegations about coaches operating without proper licences granted by the chief constable? Did he discover why such complaints were not followed up and why prosecutions were not followed through?

Mr. Mitchell: I went to hear the views of the county council, the city council and the users. Their views were clear and emphatic. The county council is well pleased with what it has. The Liberal city council adopts the somewhat illiberal view that it does not like a lot of buses in the city centre. The customers are thoroughly pleased with what they have and do not want to go back to the previous system.

Mr. Roger King: Will my hon. Friend note that some of the buses that we saw in Hereford last week on our recent trip with the independants, were more modern than the equivalent National Bus Company buses? Does he agree that there was strong evidence to suggest that existing safety standards and inspection were biased towards the independants, and not against the National Bus Company, which has been guilty, perhaps, of just as many misdemeanours?

Mr. Mitchell: I travelled on as many bus services as I could and I found better standards in the private sector than on some of the Midland Red buses operating in the town.

Mr. Snape: Nonsense.

Mr. Mitchell: If the hon. Gentleman goes there he will see that what I say is so. Moreover, the customers seem to like the softer seats and the greater comfort in the private sector coaches.

Mr. Park: Will the extra resources to which the Minister has referred enable private operators to purchase buses which have the same ease of entrance and exit as public service vehicles?

Mr. Mitchell: The ability of private sector operators to purchase buses and to dispose of them is unaffected by the Bill. The requirement in law already is that buses have to be submitted for tests and that the operator cannot operate without an operator's licence with all its conditions.

Mr. Maclean: Will my hon. Friend take it from me that private operators come to my constituency surgeries urging that the measure be passed? Is he aware that in view of their high standard of excellence and the high standards of private enterprise activity in my constituency, they resent Labour Members referring to them as "cowboys"?

Mr. Mitchell: I note my hon. Friend's point. I am sorry that the word "cowboy" has been coined, because it seems to be applied only to operators starting up new businesses. I should have thought that the House was interested in seeing more people having the chance to start businesses, so creating employment.

Mrs. Dunwoody: If the hon. Gentleman resents the use of the word "cowboys", perhaps he will say how he would describe a Hereford operator who maintained his buses in a lay-by and an operator who had his licence taken away because 47 immediate dangers were found. How will the Department be able to monitor safety standards when he is reducing the number of people involved in examining vehicles and when the number of traffic commissioners is being reduced from three to one?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Lady is wrong to say that we are cutting down on the numbers. The number of faults found in the case of the Hereford operator to whom she referred is an indication that the system is working effectively. [Interruption] Those vehicles were stopped, were identified as being inadequately maintained and were put off the road. That is what the House should want in the interests of safety.

Trunk Roads (Inquiry Procedures)

4. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his response to the proposals for improving and accelerating trunk road inquiry procedures contained in the recent report on the subject by the National Economic Development Council.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and the Environment are considering the Civil Engineering Economic Development Committee's report and hope to give their response by the spring.

Mr. Hughes: Should not the findings of all public inquiries be published at the earliest possible moment? Why is the Secretary of State sitting on the report on the Severn bridge relating to the proposal to increase tolls by 150 per cent.? Will the Minister take note of the Prime Minister's recent assertion that direct questions need direct answers?

Mrs. Chalker: I shall do my best to give the hon. Gentleman a direct reply. He clearly does not understand the system of or legal background applying to public inquiries; otherwise, he would not ask for the publication of reports at the earliest opportunity. They are often weighty tomes, as we have seen in recent years, and all the elements with which the inspectors deal in them need careful consideration, and that we certainly give to them.

My right hon. Friend is not sitting on any report, and nor am I. The inspector's report on the Severn bridge tolls increase was received in November. We are working on it. When we are ready to make a decision, a decision letter will be issued, followed by the matter being advertised in the local press and the laying of the necessary order signed by the Minister and subject to the negative resolution procedure in this House.

Mr. Higgins: Any move to improve and accelerate trunk road inquiries procedures is to be welcomed. Does my hon. Friend agree that a sufficient number of inquiries need to be completed so that, if additional resources become available, work can go ahead without being held up by planning considerations?

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. In addition to the 55 schemes currently under construction and two at public inquiry, 273 schemes are in preparation, so creating a shelf of schemes which can be brought forward when resources permit.

Long-distance Coach Industry

5. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the percentage increase in passengers that has taken place since the deregulation of the long-distance coach industry.

Mr. David Mitchell: Comprehensive statistics are not available, but the number of passengers carried on NBC's National Express services, which has about 70 per cent. of the market, increased by 45 per cent. between 1980 and 1983. As independent operators undertook very little long-distance coaching before deregulation, they must have increased their carryings by an even greater figure.

Mr. Atkinson: Is it not a fact that deregulation has produced cheaper fares, better services, more passengers and more jobs for the British long-distance coach industry? Is that not evidence enough to suppose that the same will happen to the British bus industry, given the safeguards and standards contained in the Transport Bill?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is perfectly correct in his catalogue of the benefits that have come from deregulation of long-distance coaches. Similar benefits came from deregulation of long-distance internal air services. The principle seems to hold good.

Mr. Dobson: What has been the parallel reduction in NBC services over and above the 42 million passenger miles by which they were reduced in the first year after the deregulation of long-distance coaches came into operation?

Mr. Mitchell: What we have seen has been a change in the pattern. The overall effect has been to satisfy more people because more people are using the services than before to a very substantial extent—rather more than 40 per cent.

Airports Policy

8. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's airports policy.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): When my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Transport announce the decision on the Stansted/Heathrow terminal 5 planning inquiries, we intend also to make a statement dealing with some wider aspects of the Government's airports policy.

Mr. Adley: I welcome that comment. In the light of the rejection by the House of the Eyre report, will my hon. Friend make it clear that in future decisions on airports policy in this country will be made as a consequence of, and not as a motivating factor in, regional and economic planning policy? Does he accept that other transport infrastructure developments such as rail links to Heathrow are part of the environmental price that we have to pay for trying to civilise air transport in this country?

Mr. Spicer: I agree entirely that regional airports should be developed as fast as demand in the region allows. The regional airports have become a great success story. As a whole, they are now in profit and the Government have made capital expenditure allocations of above £30 million this year and next year. We intend to build on that success.

Mr. Alfred Morris: In view of the rejection of the inspector's recommendations on Stansted by so many Members on both sides of the House in last Wednesday's debate, is there any action that the Minister can take to stop cross-subsidisation of Stansted airport by the British Airports Authority? Is he aware that that unfair competition causes not just exasperation but anger among other airport authorities?

Mr. Spicer: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I are very much aware of the representations that have been made and the feelings that have been expressed, but these matters will have to be part of the total decision taken as a result of the report.

Mr. Haselhurst: Will my hon. Friend give an assurance that the current review of tourism policy will not take place in isolation from consideration of airports policy?

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend has made his views on the promotion of toursim in relation to aviation policy very clear and I am sure that his views are being well noted.

Mr. Kennedy: With regard to airports rather further north than Stansted, does the Minister agree that the Government's recent climb-down after their abortive efforts to sell off the civil aviation airports in the Highlands and Islands shows the strength of local feeling and the effectiveness of the CAA's campaign, the level of public support for the socially crucial airports of the Western Isles and the Highlands generally and the fact that blind pursuit of dogma favouring privatisation where it is clearly not applicable makes no sense at all?

Mr. Spicer: We received several offers for those airports but none met the criteria that we had laid down —that the airports should continue to meet the social needs. Nor did they contribute satisfactorily to reducing the current annual subsidy of £3¼ million.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Will the Minister make it clear that there is no question of the House having rejected the Eyre report? Does he agree that it would be tragic if the Government abandoned progress on Stansted and other developments because of a procedural vote representing a minority of the House? Is he aware that many Members of Parliament and many people in Essex would regard it as a tragedy if the Stansted proposals were abandoned?

Mr. Spicer: My right hon. Friends will take into account all that was said in the Stansted debate, but they will have to make their own judgments.

Mr. Snape: Does the Under-Secretary accept that, despite the views of the exiled and Southend-based Scotsman who has just spoken, a majority of the House will not sanction a third London airport at Stansted or anywhere else, but will demand that a greater share of Britain's financial resources be put towards the development of regional airports?

Mr. Spicer: I have already answered the point about regional airports. With regard to the decision on Stansted airport, the hon. Gentleman, I am afraid, will have to wait for my right hon. Friend's decision.

Nuclear Electromagnetic Pulse

9. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information and assistance has been supplied to the shipping, aircraft and motor industries on protective measures against the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulse.

12. Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what advice he gives to local authorities to ensure that their essential transport for emergency purposes will not be affected by nuclear electromagnetic pulse.

Mr. Michael Spicer: A report by an interdepartmental working party on the effect on communications will be available to Ministers later this year. Advice about measures to counteract electromagnetic pulse is given to shipowners by the Ministry of Defence, to airlines by the Civil Aviation Authority and to local authorities by the Home Office.

Mr. Bowden: Will my hon. Friend ensure that there are places available on training courses so that those who are concerned with those matters may have an opportunity to learn about the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulse?

Mr. Spicer: I shall certainly consider that matter and perhaps write to my hon. Friend about it later.

Mr. Councham: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that local authorities which have declared themselves nuclear-free zones in the misconceived notion that they will escape the holocaust will take the advice that is given to them about safeguarding their vehicles?

Mr. Spicer: The advice that local authorities take and the giving of advice to them is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

A127 and A13

10. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the peak hours traffic density on the A127 and the A13 in the latest year for which figures are available; and how these densities compare with those on similar trunk roads in conurbations elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Chalker: Average peak hour flows on the A13 and A127 inside Greater London are 4,000 and 3,700 respectively. Those densities are comparable with those for similar trunk roads in conurbations.

Dr. Clark: Are there any long-term plans for a motorway to serve south-east Essex, bearing in mind the high traffic density on the A13 and A127? Can my hon. Friend assure the House that the dualling of the A13 will be speeded up and that some attention will be given to the London end of the A13 and the A127, where traffic congestion is unacceptable?

Mrs. Chalker: There are no plans for motorways in Essex in the way that my hon. Friend describes. However, we are conscious that until the M25 is fully open there will continue to be usage of the A13 and the A127 by traffic which might otherwise use the M25 and other routes. There are plans to improve the A13 at its junction with the A117. That was added to the programme in May 1983. At the moment we are checking over alternative routes at Rainham on the A13 to try to help the congestion that occurs in the narrow areas of the A13 where it has not yet been dualled. Further than that, we have plans, but they will gradually come together over the coming months, and when the review of the trunk road network is complete I shall have more information for my hon. Friend.

Road Crossings

11. Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department is looking into alternative road crossings to subways.

Mrs. Chalker: Alternative road crossings, including footbridges, pelicans and zebras, are available, and the choice is for the highway authority depending on the local circumstances. The matter is kept under constant review.

Ms. Richardson: Is the Minister aware—I am sure that she is—of the great fears experienced by many people, especially women, when they use subways, where violence, muggings and so on might occur? Will the hon. Lady instigate a survey into the extent of the problem? Does she agree that the provision of surface crossings and the cost of planning and producing them is negligible by comparison with the protection of women and elderly people?

Mrs. Chalker: I share the hon. Lady's concern about what sometimes goes on in subways, where not only women are affected. The policing aspect is a matter for the Home Office. In recent years, we, for our part, have done what we can to improve the design of subways. I shall send the hon. Lady the design specifications for new subways, but I agree with her that the cheapest form of helping people cross the road is an island in the centre of the road, followed by zebras, pelicans and footbridges, all of which work out more cheaply than subways, but sometimes are not a feasible answer in view of the land in the area and the junctions near the main crossing points used by the local population.

Mr. Stern: Does my hon. Friend agree that the fashion for building subways, particularly as pedestrian crossings on busy suburban roads, has now largely passed, but that many local authorities are left with these landmarks to past theory? As a consequence, will she make the advice of her Department available to those authorities which, over the next few years, would like to replace these white elephants but are to some extent concerned about the cost of doing so?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend raises a valid point. Advice on subways already exists, and I shall send him copies of it. Sometimes it is almost impossible to widen the entrances to subways or to straighten existing subways, and in those cases local authorities may need to look at surface crossings, as the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) intimated in her supplementary question.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

North London Polytechnic

49. Mr. Greenway asked the Attorney-General if, pursuant to his reply of 17 January, Official Report, column 191, he has any information as to whether the officers of the students' union of the North London polytechnic have now given any undertaking regarding their readiness to comply with the injunction granted by the High Court on 11 December 1984, restraining them from making or authorising payments from the funds of the students union to striking miners; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): The officers of the North London polytechnic students' union offered to give certain undertakings and at the same time asked for a revocation of the orders made by the court restraining them from doing certain acts and appointing a receiver and manager of the union funds. Their application came before the court this morning. While accepting the officers' undertakings, the court considered them insufficient in the light of the officers' past conduct and it therefore ruled that its previous order appointing the receiver should remain in force for the time being.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. and learned Friend join me in welcoming the restraint placed by the law upon the students union officers of the polytechnic of North London from giving a further £10,000 of public money out of student union funds to the striking miners? Will he use every means that he can to recover the £3,000 already wrongly applied by the same people to the same cause and in defiance of their charitable status?

The Attorney-General: The purpose of my application to the court for the appointment of a receiver was to prevent the misuse of union funds. I prevented the payment of two cheques, each of £5,000, although in one case £2,150 in cash was drawn by the officers from the bank and handed over to a particular miner. Previously, another sum of £1,000 was handed over. It may be that the court will order them personally to seek to repay that.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the Attorney-General not accept that members of a student union or any other democratic organisation have a right to express their support for those who are fighting for their jobs and communities and that there have been an unwarranted and unfair series of press attacks on the leadership of the polytechnic of North London students union because of this matter, not least by the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway)?

The Attorney-General: If, of course, these people wish to use their own money no one will complain, but they are trustees of large sums of public money given to them by the Government, and that can be used only for the purpose for which it was given.

Coal Industry Dispute

50. Mr. Adley asked the Attorney-General how many cases are still outstanding in the courts in relation to offences alleged to have been committed in relation to the miners' strike; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: During the period from 14 March 1984 to 29 January 1985, 7,653 persons were charged with a total of 9,901 offences alleged to have been committed during the course of the current miners' dispute. Of these, 4,874 defendants have been dealt with and the cases of 2,779 remain to be heard.

Mr. Adley: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for those figures. Is it not a fact that had there been no foregathering of members of Arthur Scargill's private army at many of the coal mines, intent on intimidating those who merely wanted to work, there would have been no need for the police presence in the first place? Does he therefore agree with this morning's statement by the leader of the Social Democratic party, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), that this sort of thuggery should have no part whatever in industrial relations organisations in this country?

The Attorney-General: I have no hesitation in agreeing with that. Picketing, as approved by the TUC and as part of the miners' own rules, is limited to six. If there are hundreds or, indeed, thousands of pickets, at best it is a demonstration and, at worst, a riot.

Mr. Barron: Will the Attorney-General tell the House how many of the 4,874 miners who have already been dealt with have been found not guilty? In Rotherham magistrates' court 75 per cent. of cases in which miners have been charged have been dismissed by the magistrates.

The Attorney-General: The total number acquitted by all the courts trying miners is 1,169.

Mr. Spencer: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that recent experience tends to show that those whose cases still remain to be dealt with will get a fair hearing by magistrates or juries, and that, if the evidence is sufficient, there will be a conviction and that otherwise there will be an acquittal? Does he agree that the criminal justice system is sufficiently resilient to deal with violent pressure put upon it, no matter who exerts the pressure?

The Attorney-General: I do not doubt the independence of the courts or the juries which try these cases. Many of the cases still awaiting trial will be heard in the Crown court.

Mr. Mason: Will the Attorney-General, in concert with the Home Secretary, call upon the chief constables in the coalfields to have the fingerprints and photographs of the 1,169 miners who were arrested and acquitted of all charges erased from police records, in order to clear the records, reputations and characters of those miners?

The Attorney-General: I shall make certain that that comment is passed on to my right hon. and learned Friend. It cannot be a matter for me.

Mr. Cash: Will my right hon. and learned Friend assure the House that, as the strike peters to an end, if and when violence increases in certain areas within the coal mining areas, the most vigorous action will be taken to ensure that the public are protected and that the cases that are brought before the courts are dealt with as quickly as possible?

The Attorney-General: Obviously, it is desirable that there should be the least possible delay. It is equally desirable that those who are awaiting trial on cases unconnected with the miners' dispute should not lose their place in the queue. This is a matter entirely for the chief constables, as they are absolutely independent of the Government.

Mr. John Morris: Without having to repeat to the House my view of 19 December, that everyone who breaks the law must be answerable for it, will the Attorney-General consult the Home Secretary about the extent of the damage that has been done to respect for the law in the mining communities, arising from the fact that breaches of the law have not been entirely one-sided, and arising from such things as the operation of restrictive bail conditions and the stopping of innocent travellers on their way to work, which has left considerable bitterness? Will the Government consider how they intend to rebuild confidence in the law in those areas, and will they encourage everyone within the Government to be particularly sensitive to that aspect in handling their legal responsibilities in mining areas?

The Attorney-General: I accept that there will be many wounds that will need healing. I suspect that there will be an equally large number of wounds that need healing between working and striking miners. If one considers the endless demonstrations, which amount to intimidation, and the various charges that have been brought, it seems ridiculous to put any blame for that on the police.

Legal Aid

51. Mr. Dubs asked the Attorney-General what arrangements Her Majesty's Government have made to monitor the effects of the means assessment and contributions system introduced into criminal legal aid by the Legal Aid Act 1982.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): Statistics returned by magistrates' courts will now include details of contribution orders made by the courts.

Mr. Dubs: Although I welcome the decision to begin to monitor these arrangements, will the Solicitor-General tell us in more detail how the monitoring will be carried out, bearing in mind that many believe that means-testing is a waste of time because the high administrative costs involved exceed any savings that may be made?

The Solicitor-General: The principal way in which the monitoring is being carried out is through the more accurate and simpler form of return that has been in use since 1 March last year. The magistrates' courts are returning those forms, but unfortunately we do not yet have all the forms for last year. However, the courts are providing better information. My right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor is also considering the use of survey research over relatively small areas.

Mr. Ryman: Is not an enourmous amount of public money wasted by giving legal aid to wealthy criminals who say that they cannot liquidise their assets between committal and trial? Would it not be fairer to give money to poor defendants, who genuinely cannot afford legal representation, and to force rich defendants to pay for their own defences?

The Solicitor-General: Although I have much sympathy with the underlying thought of the hon. Gentleman's question, it would probably be impossible to devise a legal aid scheme which could be operated with absolute certainty that there was no waste. Since legal aid is as much in the interests of justice because it enables the court to do its work efficiently, we must err on the side of liberality. However, I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's question is brought to the attention of the Lord Chancellor.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

54. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are Her Majesty's Government's plans for long-term development aid to Ethiopia.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): I consider that the World Bank and the European Community, to whose aid funds we contribute largely, are in the best position to provide appropriate long-term development aid to Ethiopia. We shall also be considering what we can do bilaterally, but meanwhile we shall constinue our plans to support education and training.

Mr. Chapman: In view of the still urgent need for immediate help to Ethiopia, does my right hon. Friend agree that long-term funding and sustained aid to that country must remain a foremost priority of our overseas aid programme? Essential to the success of such aid must be the co-operation of the Ethiopian Government. Does my right hon. Friend believe that the Ethiopian Government are providing the necessary co-operation?

Mr. Raison: No one can doubt the need for long-term development in Ethiopia. However, we must recognise that it will not be easy to achieve, partly because of the raging civil war in that country, and partly because the Ethiopian regime has collectivist ideas about agriculture and other matters, alongside which it may be difficult to work.

Mr. Barnett: Does the Minister recognise that often in the wake of famine people who are directly affected are much more likely to listen sympathetically and encouragingly to the idea of development on new lines that will make their position more secure? Therefore, in view of British expertise in tropical agriculture, will the Minister consider seriously the possibility of a well-mounted bilateral programme?

Mr. Raison: Under the pressure of the appalling circumstances in Ethiopia, a more open-minded and receptive approach may develop in its Government. I hope that that will be so. But we must consider carefully how much of our effort can be done bilaterally and how much of it through the multilateral agencies. A large proportion of our aid programme goes to those multilateral agencies.

Mr. Bowen Wells: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if there is to be long-term development in Ethiopia and sub-Saharan Africa the co-ordination of all aid givers will be essential, together with political and economic reform? In that case, does he agree that the World Bank and the special fund for Africa are the obvious means with which to effect that objective? How then can he defend Britain's position in Paris on Friday in not contributing to the special fund?

Mr. Raison: I fully agree that co-ordination and policy reform are essential. We have told the World Bank that we shall make available £15 million a year for five years, which will be used to work closely with its special facility and with exactly the same objectives as the World Bank has.

Mr. Alton: What best estimates can the Minister give about the numbers of refugees who are likely to be in danger of their lives as a result of the continued famine in Ethiopia? What representations have Her Majesty's Government made to the Ethiopian authorities about the firing of shots at refugees trying to flee the country?

Mr. Raison: It is difficult to give figures about the numbers of refugees who might leave Ethiopia in the coming months. When I was in Ethiopia I made it clear to the Ethiopian Government that we believe that they must do all that they can to allow food to reach those who need it. We are also talking to the International Red Cross to see whether it can take steps to bring about some further relaxation of the hostilities which are making the transmission of food more difficult than it need be.

Sub-Saharan Africa

55. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has recently received about further aid for sub-Saharan Africa.

Mr. Raison: I continue to receive many such representations.

Mr. Canavan: In view of the weekend report that as many as 34 million people in 20 African countries are at risk of dying from starvation in what has been described as potentially the greatest catastrophe ever to have visited this planet, and bearing in mind that in response to the Ethiopian appeal the great generosity of the British people was not, unfortunately, matched by the British Government, will the Minister ensure a far more generous response to the World Bank's special fund for Africa, along the lines of early-day motion 323, which has the support of over 100 Labour Members?

Mr. Raison: Nobody would deny the gravity of the situation in central, eastern and southern Africa, although happily in southern Africa there has been an improvement in the rainfall. I wholly reject the suggestion that the British Government have not made an adequate response to the problem. We have given large quantities of aid, both before October last year, when the television films brought to everybody's attention what was happening in Ethiopia, and since. We shall continue to play a full part in this.

Mr. Baldry: Why is it that the Government are prepared to give funds to run alongside the World Bank programme but not to give funds to the World Bank programme? That distinction has escaped a large proportion of hon. Members.

Mr. Raison: Both my right hon. and learned Friend and I have often said that we are anxious to maintain within our overall aid programme a fair share of the bilateral element, and that is essentially what this is about. We are prepared to work for the same objectives, but on the other hand we wish to keep this within the bilateral framework and to make certain decisions ourselves rather than hand them over to the World Bank. We should be able to come up with a successful scheme.

Mr. Anderson: What will history make of a Chancellor who considered the billions spent on the mining dispute as a good investment, but at the same time refused $50 million a year to avert the human catastrophe in Africa? Will the Minister confirm that there is not one penny of new money in the £15 million that he has mentioned, and that we, alone in Western Europe, have not contributed to the special fund?

Mr. Raison: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The arrangements which Japan and Germany are negotiating are similar to the arrangements which we are discussing. As to the new money, in planning ahead in our aid programme we made special allowance for exceptional contingencies and disasters, and we would be foolish not to do so. Whether this is new money or not is an abstraction. The important thing is to provide effective aid.

Sudan (Drought)

56. Mr. Mark Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further action Her Majesty's Government are taking to assist drought victims in the Sudan.

Mr. Raison: Some 15,000 tonnes of our own cereals aid will shortly reach Port Sudan through the world food programme, and we expect the European Community, which has already committed 51,000 tonnes, to allot further substantial amounts from the 1·2 million tonnes agreed at the Dublin summit.

From our bilateral programme £7·5 million has been provided to the international refugee organisations and to voluntary agencies working in the Sudan, either in food or in cash. I have today agreed a further £500,000 to assist the Save the Children Fund, one of the British voluntary agencies working in both east and west Sudan.

Mr. Robinson: I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement. He will be aware, from the television coverage over the weekend, of the problem of refugees coming from Ethiopia into Sudan. Will he consider visiting Sudan to ensure that the assistance being given is used in the most effective manner?

Mr. Raison: I am very much aware of the great public concern about the situation in the Sudan, and I intend to visit the Sudan this month.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the right hon. Gentleman share the obvious disappointment of his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, who said in the House last week that the Foreign Affairs Council had not met anything like the target that it had in mind for helping these areas? Given that view, will the right hon. Gentleman, as a Minister, add his support to the voice of the British public in saying that they will not accept that the food mountains are growing and that we are not making the contribution of which we are capable?

Mr. Raison: The contribution agreed by the European Community is a very substantial one, because 1·2 million tonnes of food grain is a very large amount. What remains to be done is to make sure that that food aid is allocated to those places where it is most desperately needed, rather than be used somewhat indiscriminately, as has sometimes been the case.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the four motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Amendments of the Potato Marketing Scheme 1955, as amended, be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Potatoes (Assured Markets) Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 63) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Potatoes (Protection of Guarantees) Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 64) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Tay Road Bridge (Scheme) Approval Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Opposition Day

[7TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Speaker: We now move to the Opposition Day and the important debate on the coal mining dispute.

Some 43 right hon. and hon. Members have written to me asking whether they may take part in the debate. I propose to invoke the 10-minute limit on speeches between 6 o'clock and 10 minutes to 8, but I hope that all right hon. and hon. Members who speak in the debate will take that as an indication of the length of speeches to be expected today so that not too many right hon. and hon. Members are disappointed.

3.32 pm

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): I beg to move,

That this House condemns Her Majesty's Government for their public and private activities to impede progress towards negotiations in the mining dispute, despite the massive costs to the nation of prolonging the strike; welcomes the decision of the National Union of Mineworkers to seek an immediate resumption of negotiations with the National Coal Board without pre-conditions; and demands that the Government takes a positive approach by urging the National Coal Board to settle this long and damaging dispute forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Orme: It is evident that the Government do not want an acceptable settlement negotiated between the National Union of Mineworkers and the National Coal Board but that they want victory over the NUM and especially over Mr. Arthur Scargill. The Government engineered the situation hoping that today there would be a massive return to work—[HON. MEMBERS: "There has been."] The NCB said that there had been a massive return to work today, but there has not been, and I remind the House that there are still more than 130,000 miners on strike. Despite the Government's engineering, they have not succeeded and they will not succeed. The only answer to end the dispute is a negotiated settlement between the NUM and the NCB.

The role of the Prime Minister in the dispute is evident for all to see. One has only to read her statements in recent days. She now leads the campaign against the NUM. It is a campaign that goes back to 1981. At that time the Prime Minister accepted "Plan for Coal". However, she started then to plan for the present dispute.

We should remind ourselves of why the dispute began. On 6 March 1984, the NCB announced that it intended to cut capacity in the coal mining industry by 4 million tonnes. On 7 March, The Guardian reported that announcement as "The daunting prospect of a loss of at least 21,000 jobs in the next year".

That was the announcement which precipitated this long and damaging dispute. That was the announcement which breached prior agreements with the trade unions and which undermined established and effective procedures, including "Plan for Coal".

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Orme: No. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to develop the case a little. This is an important debate. I want to make my case, and I am sure that all right hon. and hon. Members want to listen to the debate.

The NCB's announcement was a unilateral action which provoked the strike. The NUM had no demands on the table. It was the action of the NCB nearly one year ago that has led to the present circumstances. It is clear why the announcement resulted in the vast majority of miners taking industrial action. They are worried about their immediate jobs and about the threat to entire mining communities which are in socially and economically deprived parts of the United Kingdom. They are worried about their jobs now, about jobs in the future and about mining communities throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Orme: No.

We now have an independent analysis which shows that, if the NCB's policy was carried through, 70,000 jobs and 70 pits would go in less than five years. That represents nearly 50 per cent. of the work force.

The levels of unemployment are already incredibly high in the coalfields. Such areas already suffer the despair and deprivation that comes from the loss of jobs and incomes. I refer to south Yorkshire, Scotland, south Wales and the north-east, where unemployment continues to rise. In each of those areas, two people out of five have been out of work for more than one year. In the face of that, miners and their families have used their only weapon to resist the destruction of their collieries and communities and to save the coal mining industry.

Mr. Rost rose——

Mr. Orme: Offering decent redundancy payments can never be a substitute for guaranteeing employment now or in the future. We hear a lot from the Government about their generous schemes for paying compensation to those who give up jobs in coal, steel, shipbuilding, the motor industry and in the docks, but when will the Government announce that an industry needs an extra 20,000 workers? Where are the new jobs in Merthyr, Barnsley and Fife to come from?

After 11 months of the Government waging a war of attrition, after 11 months of the Government using every weapon in their possession against the miners, the strike has not collapsed. After 11 months, the Government think that the defeat of the NUM is in sight. This is a dangerous and short-sighted attitude, but whatever happens the Government are the losers. Their inflexible attitude has created bitterness among the work force upon whom the nation's energy prospects depend. A bitter, defeated work force is not productive. The Government's desire to humiliate the leaders of that work force will result in rancour and ill feeling towards the management of the industry. However, in my opinion, the Government will not bring about that defeat by the policies that they are pursuing.

Mr. Rost: Would the right hon. Gentleman please tell us whether the official Opposition support the view of the leadership of the National Union of Mineworkers, that no pit should be closed upon economic grounds in any circumstances?

Mr. Orme: I shall answer that central point during my speech. In the last few weeks, the Government have dismissed the prospect of talks with contempt, as a waste of time. A campaign has been mounted and led from Downing street by the Prime Minister's press officer, Mr. Bernard Ingham, that is aimed at personalising the dispute. This campaign has been followed up by Mr. David Hart, who has acted covertly, shuttling between No. 10 and the National Coal Board, attempting to prevent a settlement. However, he has gone public now. An article appeared under Mr. Hart's name in The Times on 26 January 1985. If Mr. Hart has got nothing to do with this dispute, it is interesting that an article appeared in the The Times that has behind it the authority and backing that we know it has.

Mr. Hart said:

"Any true negotiation now would represent defeat for the Coal Board and the nation . . . The time for negotiated settlements is past".

Is that the policy of the Government? Is that the policy of the Prime Minister? [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] Is that what the Prime Minister wants—victory? Is this the Falklands factor coming into play? Is that what the Prime Minister wants? The Prime Minister will not answer. This type of action is in direct contrast with the actions of the Opposition. [Laughter.] Hon. Members can laugh, but the Opposition have argued consistently that this dispute can be ended only by negotiations that produce an honourable settlement that is acceptable both to the National Union of Mineworkers and to the National Coal Board.

Mr. Eggar: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Orme: No. Unlike the Secretary of State, I have made every effort over a period of 11 months to bring about those negotiations.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): They failed every time.

Mr. Orme: I can tell the hon. Member why they failed. The hon. Gentleman's Government made sure that they failed. I am confident that, if negotiations had started with the full executive of the NUM, without preconditions, a settlement would have been arrived at.

But we know the reasons why this has been prevented. The Government and the NCB have taken the extraordinary and unprecedented step of demanding written assurances from the NUM before negotiations can take place. No trade union will go into negotiations having first signed away its right to take action against management decisions with which it disagrees. No trade union will sign a document allowing for carte blanche cuts and job losses. No trade union will sign away its birthright in that way.

I have looked at the precedents. The last time that happened in Britain was in 1922, when the engineering employers locked out the engineering unions for nine months. They were then forced back to work on the terms that the Government are asking for at present. No trade union will make such a concession before negotiations have even started.

Mr. Eggar rose——

Mr. Orme: When one looks at statements made during the dispute by the chairman of the NCB, it is even more extraordinary that the NUM's proposals for the resumption of negotiations without preconditions have been rejected. I remember Mr. MacGregor saying to me on one occasion that he was ready for negotiations without preconditions, and the Secretary of State said the same. He is on record as saying the same. Now that is apparently no longer acceptable. Why?

I think that we have the answer if we turn to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said on 30 October 1984:

"The House should be in no doubt whatever but that the Government are prepared to pay the cost of resisting this strike, however long it lasts".—[Official Report, 30 October 1984; Vol. 65, c. 1184.]

That is the British taxpayer underwriting the cost of the fight that the Government are putting up against the NUM.

That sums up the Government's attitude throughout—they are prepared to pay the cost. The direct cash cost to the Government of this action is now about £2·4 billion. It is estimated to be running at £80 million a week. That is mostly made up of extra costs to the CEGB of burning oil, losses to the NCB, lost taxation and losses incurred by British Steel, and the costs of policing and social security. The Government are indeed willing to pay any price to break the strike. That is evident from their present attitude.

Mr. Mark Robinson (Newport, West) rose——

Mr. Orme: Will the Secretary of State confirm those figures? If not, will he give the Government's figures of the present cost to the nation? It is the taxpayer who will have to bear the cost. Already the dispute, created and prolonged by the Government, has played a major part in the removal of a surplus on the balance of payments as expensive oil is burned instead of coal. There is also a direct link with the collapse of the pound and the rise in interest rates. It is obvious that foreign speculators have seen the continuation of the mining dispute as a major factor in the confidence in sterling. That was confirmed the week before last by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) during the debate on unemployment.

We all know and recognise that the Government's attitude to the dispute has little to do with energy policy—if the Government have one. The strike has exposed the fact that they are without any strategy or consistency in their approach to the nation's energy resources or needs. Commentators have become increasingly aware of the lack of any planning or foresight. One has claimed that he went looking for Britain's energy policy and found that there was not one. That he described as the Secretary of State's "pipeline to nowhere". That is the Government's approach during the whole of the 11 months' dispute.

If the Government had an energy policy, they would be eager to find a settlement to the dispute. Indeed, if they had an energy policy that recognised Britain's long-term needs, there would have been no demand for the cuts in capacity that the NCB outlined last March.

Mr. Mark Robinson rose——

Mr. Orme: I have given way once, but I want to spell out our case and I know that many hon. Members wish to take part in this important debate. Therefore, I shall give way only to Ministers.

The House of Lords Select Committee has judged that, by the year 2000, coal demand in the European Community will have risen to more than 400 million tonnes and that reserves of coal in the United Kingdom will last for 260 years. A report from the Policy Studies Institute and the Royal Institute of International Affairs forecasts that Britain could be importing up to 40 per cent. of its energy needs by 2000 unless our coal production expands. All that coal—yet we face the prospect of importing nearly half our energy resources. Surely even the Secretary of State can see that it makes sense for us to have a thriving coal industry.

The Secretary of State is more likely to be interested in today's balance sheet than in the survival of our resources for the future. However, even his approach to the balance sheet is short-sighted and faulty. We have argued that there is no case for closing pits on the narrow, short-term criteria used by the Government and the NCB. Even those narrow criteria are being challenged by leading academics.

The Financial Times world accounting report said:

"The profit and loss accounts of the UK's coal pits are too arbitrary for the National Coal Board to be able to know from them which are its 'uneconomic' mines. This is a startling conclusion since plans to close 'uneconomic' pits are at the centre of a dispute between the NCB and the National Union of Mineworkers".

The report continues:

"Assuming the . . . analysis is generally correct then either the NCB's accounting information has been used to identify the pits to be closed and thus the decisions are based on inaccurate information, or alternatively the closure decisions have been made on grounds which have not been made public and the accounting information has simply been used to publicly legitimise the closure decisions."

The NCB has loudly criticised that article but has failed to answer any of the points in it.

The argument about whether a colliery can be deemed economic has raged on, but there has been a notable absence of informed public debate. My hon. Friends know that in this argument, investment—particularly in old pits—oil prices, the exchange rate and many other factors have to be taken into account.

Let us look at the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers agreement. The Prime Minister said:

"Unless the NUM is prepared to discuss the closure of uneconomic pits in accordance with the NACODS agreement, the next round of talks will founder as well." — [Official Report, 31 January 1985; Vol. 72, c. 436.]

First, there is no reference in the NACODS agreement to uneconomic pits. As the Secretary of State knows, a large part of the agreement was about working conditions, the closed shop and many other factors. There were discussions about the 6 March proposals and the five pits, but it is important to note that the union reserved the right to oppose pit closures if the new advisory machinery failed to get an agreement between the unions and the NCB.

The Secretary of State will also be aware that the NACODS executive met last Friday afternoon and sent a deputation to the NCB to see Mr. Spanton this morning. It told Mr. Spanton, in effect, that if the NCB went ahead and demanded a written undertaking from the NUM about pit closures, the NACODS agreement would be valueless. That is what it said.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): Is the right hon. Gentleman willing to recommend that the NUM should accept the NACODS agreement?

Mr. Orme: This morning, Mr. Spanton was asked a question—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] This morning, Mr. Spanton was asked a question by the general secretary and the president of NACODS. They were not speaking on behalf of the NUM, but he was asked whether the Coal Board would still demand a written undertaking on uneconomic pits if the NUM said that it would accept the NACODS agreement as a basis for talks. Mr. Spanton refused to answer that quesion, and that is the answer to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Peter Walker: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether or not he is willing to make that recommendation?

Mr. Orme: This morning, NACODS asked the NCB to withdraw the preconditions in order to allow talks to proceed. Indeed, NACODS said that, if the NCB would not do so, it would be violating the NACODS agreement, and consequently that agreement is not worth the paper that is is written on.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): My right hon. Friend has touched on an important point. Will he invite the Secretary of State to say in his speech whether he can answer the question that Mr. Spanton failed to answer when he was asked it this morning by the NACODS leaders? Does not the Secretary of State recognise that No. 10's insistence on the conditions now being applied to the NUM can be interpreted only as a breach of the agreement reached with NACODS?

Mr. Orme: I hope that the Secretary of State will answer that point, as it is central to this issue. At the moment, the NACODS agreement is in jeopardy. This morning NACODS told me that because of the lack of assurances from the NCB, it now felt that its agreement would not be acceptable within the industry. NACODS has raised this point, and until we receive some clarification we will not answer the Secretary of State's question. It has nothing to do with the matter. You are the Government, you are the Secretary of State——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Orme: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of State is responsible, and he must answer that point.

The NUM has been asked to sign a statement before negotiations begin that will allow the NCB to close pits that it classes as uneconomic. Furthermore, NACODS has evidence that the NCB and the Government are trying to rewrite the NACODS agreement. What price then the value of such an agreement? On that basis, I shall not underline or underwrite an agreement until the Secretary of State answers that question.

I come to the second round of talks on the agenda. The original talks between Mr. Heathfield and Mr. Ned Smith led to an agenda that was acceptable to both sides and could have led to direct negotiations. It was an agenda and not preconditions for talks or a written undertaking. They both took that agenda back to their respective bodies. Indeed, I have seen the agenda. [Interruption.] I have seen the agenda of the talks between Mr. Heathfield and Mr. Ned Smith. Can the Secretary of State tell the House what happened between those talks and the further talks between Mr. Heathfield and Mr. Spanton? Why did the coal board suddenly change tack? Why did it not go for negotiations?

The centre of the issue is the changing role played by the coal board—in my opinion carrying out the Government's policy—in recent days. Direct negotiations could have been started last week. If the Government believed that the NUM was not genuine, they and the whole nation could have tested whether it was. However, the Government refused to allow the negotiations to go ahead.

As the Financial Times explained this morning, the Government are preventing talks on the basis of the coal board having a written undertaking that it is free to close pits, irrespective of negotiation and in contradiction of the NACODS agreement. The NUM is prepared to go to talks without preconditions. That means that any aspect and any subject can be discussed, including uneconomic pits. The NUM has a valid point. It also wants to discuss social factors. It wants to discuss investment, employment and all the central issues. Why should it not be able to discuss those issues? Why should it be faced with a counter-productive ultimatum?

We believe that if talks and direct negotiations were started a settlement could be arrived at. The union's decision to talk about the issues that I have mentioned on an open agenda is positive. The full executive would be present. Mr. MacGregor has said to me that he wants to talk to the full executive. This is his opportunity. Genuine negotiations could take place and we could achieve a settlement of this tragic dispute.

The miners have been out for 11 months. Families have suffered in the interests of what they believe to be the preservation of their communities and their industry. They have fought gallantly and they will not be forced back on their knees. They will not accept that.

If the Government would allow direct negotiations, the matter could be settled. The Secretary of State used a different emphasis at Question Time the other day. He said that he wanted a negotiated settlement. Every sensible person knows that a negotiated settlement is the only way out of the dispute. If the union were to ask its members to go back after 11 months on the basis of non-co-operation there would be chaos and anarchy in the industry.

This is an industry which the nation needs. Its people have served the nation over a long time. We need the wealth from the mines, now and in the future. We need the jobs in the mines, now and in the future. We need the miners with their skill and dedication, now and in the future. That is the reason for the Opposition motion today.

4.4 pm

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"deeply regrets the damage done to the coal industry, miners, miners' families and the mining communities by the unnecessary industrial action of some sections of the National Union of Mineworkers; recognises that this action is totally unjustified since this Government have provided more capital investment for the industry than any previous Government, far in excess of that provided by the last Labour Government, and substantially exceeding the scale of investment envisaged in 'Plan for Coal'; recognises it is also unjustified in the light of the National Coal Board's extremely generous offer on pay, early retirement and voluntary redundancy terms, and on the creation of a scheme designed to bring new enterprises and job opportunities to mining communities; notes the acceptance of the Board's offer by the industry's other two unions, and the refusal to strike by those sections of the National Union of Mineworkers which in that union's normal tradition decided to hold a ballot; deplores the Opposition's failure to persuade the National Union of Mineworkers both to arrange a national ballot and to use methods of picketing complying with National Union of Mineworkers and Trades Union Congress guidelines on picketing; regrets the National Union of Mineworkers leadership's intransigence, displayed in seven rounds of negotiations, including with the Advisory, Concilliation and Arbitration Service whose compromise proposal was accepted by the Board but rejected by the National Union of Mineworkers; and expresses the hope that this intransigence will now cease so that a realistic settlement can quickly be achieved which recognises that the cost of production is an important factor in securing a good and prosperous future for the industry."

I am sure that the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) is sincere when he says that he wants a negotiated settlement. Like most right hon. and hon. Members he very much regrets the appalling 10 to 11 months of misery that the industry has suffered. However, the impression that he tries to create, that this is a dispute that the the Government required or relished, is totally contradicted by all the facts.

The tragedy is that 11 months ago there could have been a settlement without any form of industrial action. Let me remind the House of the proposals made by the National Coal Board at the beginning of March. The proposals that it sought to have discussed first at a regional level were open to further negotiations and discussions and they included proposals for higher investment and new marketing initiatives. But the National Union of Mineworkers decided to manipulate a national strike, not by a ballot and not—as we know, now that the facts of the meeting have come out—with the approval of the majority of the executive.

The right hon. Member for Salford, East knows that, had the NUM acted in accordance with the normal tradition of that union, had it acted as the Leader of the Opposition suggested privately and quietly that it should, the need for mass picketing, for mob violence and for any of the ghastly impact of the dispute would not have arisen.

Let us also recall that when Mr. Scargill decided to handle his executive in such a way that there would be no ballot, one third of Britain's coalfields decided in the normal tradition of the union to vote. Let the right hon. Gentleman never forget that the 68,000 miners who decided to vote last March voted overwhelmingly against strike action. However, they never had any support from the Labour party for the way in which they voted. In areas such as Nottingham, where the majority voted not to strike without a ballot, the deputy leader of the Opposition said that he would go against the majority of the voters and support the strikers.

What has been the basis of the strike? It has certainly not been a strike over pay. As the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) knows, this Government paid miners rather better than he did when he was Secretary of State. It was certainly not a dispute over investment, because, as the whole country knows, in our first five years this Government invested not only much more than the Labour Government but much more than was envisaged in "Plan for Coal." In the negotiations last March the miners knew that another £3 billion of investment was to go into the industry. It was certainly not a strike about the guarantee that there would be not one compulsory redundancy in the industry.

The reason for the strike—and the only reason given by Mr. Scargill—was his demand that there should be no pit closures on economic grounds. That has been the basis of the strike from beginning to end. Mr. Scargill made that the reason because he knew that no Government and that no coal board could ever accept that proposal. We have known throughout, from the remarks of previous general secretaries of the NUM, that in the past no leader of the mineworkers' union has ever made such a demand.

[Mr. Peter Walker]

We know from "Plan for Coal" that it was clearly envisaged that there would be closures of pits on economic grounds.

If one wants to be absolutely certain of the position of the last Labour Government, one cannot do better than look at their Coal Industry Act 1977, the sponsor of which was the right hon. Member for Chesterfield. One of the main operative clauses of that measure reads:

"The Secretary of State"—

at the time the right hon. Member for Chesterfield—

"with the approval of the Treasury may, out of money provided by Parliament, make to the Board such grants as in the opinion of the Secretary of State will further assist in the re-deployment of the manpower resources of the Board and the elimination of uneconomic colliery capacity."

[Interruption.] Those words appeared in the one major Act on the coal industry of the last Labour Government.

To bring ourselves up to date, we have the words of the Leader of the Opposition last week, when he said:

"As always, you must include commercial considerations in deciding on pit closures."

Not once during this dispute has Mr. Scargill said, "You must take commercial considerations into account when considering whether to close a pit."

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): I am sure that the debate, if not the right hon. Gentleman's case, will be assisted if he quotes me in full. I said:

"I want an honourable settlement; and I want one which will ensure that foolish decisions about colliery closures are not taken. That they're taken on the proper grounds of exhaustion and safety, yes, including commercial considerations, has always been the fact before under the colliery review procedure; always will be in the future. But it's got to be an honourable settlement, because a blank cheque enabling people to close down whole communities on the basis of one or two years' accountants' figures, simply isn't a proper way to regard Britain's basic energy industry."

If only the Secretary of State would apply the colliery review procedure—if only he would value coal properly —this question would simply not arise and we would continue, as Mr. McNestry said last week, as we always have, successfully.

Mr. Walker: That is the most total contradiction of the Scargill case that we have ever heard. [Interruption.] At last during this phase, when clearly the majority of miners are going against the strike, we welcome the conversion of the Leader of the Opposition, although it is rather belated.

When the history of this matter is written, the lack of leadership by the right hon. Gentleman throughout the dispute—[Interruption.]—will be remembered. It will be remembered how he agreed to the change in the voting procedures on having a ballot, and then did not say a word when Mr. Scargill failed to have a ballot. His humiliating appearance at Stoke will long be remembered, when throughout he listened to the demands of Mr. Scargill saying, "We will never agree to a pit closure on economic grounds," and that remains the position of Mr. Scargill today.

Rather than any reluctance to have talks, there have already been seven rounds of talks, all with no preconditions. There were talks at ACAS, with an ACAS compromise proposal. Then there were the negotiations with NACODS, and the House will have witnessed the manner in which the right hon. Member for Salford, East failed totally, as the Labour party has always failed, to say that they considered that the NACODS agreement should be acceptable to the miners.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): The Secretary of State said that the Leader of the Opposition was sticking to the Scargill line. It seems that the Minister, and many of his supporters, are not aware of what the NUM is saying at this time. It may assist if I quote from a letter that was received on Friday by the coal board:

"The Union's proposal takes account of the Board's own suggestions when we met with ACAS. This would provide for all matters relating to the future of Collieries/Units to be dealt with in accordance with the procedures operating prior to 6th March 1984."

It went on to say that the NUM accepted in principle the third party review. How can the Secretary of State stand at the Dispatch Box and mislead the House on this issue?

Mr. Walker: In all the wordings that have been used and in all the negotiations on an agenda that have taken place, the NUM has totally refused under any circumstances to consider the closure of uneconomic pits. [Interruption.] That is absolutely true. Had the NUM wished, it could have agreed to an agenda which would have dealt with the issue last week, and it could have done so in negotiations.

Mr. Hardy: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, I am associated with NACODS. Will he clear up the point that I raised in an intervention when my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) was speaking? NACODS does not see how the agreement which the Secretary of State has accepted, and which he referred to this afternoon, can hold water, given the demands now being placed on the NUM. Will he now answer the question that Mr. Spanton did not answer this morning?

Mr. Walker: NACODS was told clearly this morning by Mr. Spanton that the agreement with NACODS applied totally and completely, and Mr. Spanton made it clear at the same meeting that if the NUM wished to accept it, it could have a settlement today or tomorrow — [Interruption.]—and, therefore, there is no question of the NACODS agreement being other than available to NACODS and being available to the NUM. The whole House knows that when the NACODS negotiation was completed, it was the perfect basis for the NUM to come to a settlement, but throughout it has resisted doing that, and that remains the position today.

Mr. Orme: With or without a written undertaking? Is the Secretary of State saying, in effect, that the coal board still wants a written undertaking?

Mr. Walker: I am saying that during the course of last week—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."]—the NUM was offered an agenda as a result of which that could have been discussed, but it refused it. It was offered that agenda without a written agreement, but it refused to have it. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] That is the answer to the right hon. Gentleman's question.

Mr. Orme: Will the Secretary of State now answer the question that was put this morning? Do the Government still insist on a written undertaking, apart from accepting the NACODS agreement?

Mr. Walker: I am saying that last week — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Walker: I am answering the right hon. Gentleman. My answer is that not only this morning, but before this morning, the NUM was offered an agenda, through the TUC, which it refused to accept.

Mr. Kinnock: Now answer the question.

Mr. Walker: The more that the NUM refuses to accept any such reasonable proposal, the more one can suspect that when it comes to a negotiation—[Interruption.]—in the same way that it always has, it will stick to its present position.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) was heard in silence.

Mr. Walker: I repeat, in relation to NACODS, that that agreement is available and has always been available to the NUM, but the Labour party has always failed to give it any support. Had it done so, there might have been a settlement long ago.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): If that is so, will the Secretary of State confirm that negotiations can take place without any written affirmations beforehand? Will he give that assurance?

Mr. Walker: I give the assurance that what is required is an agreed agenda for such discussions. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman consults the TUC about its unsuccessful attempt to get an agreed agenda.

It is important to understand the history of this dispute, which has done so much damage to miners and mining communities in the past 10 months. First, it was a dispute without a ballot, and those who were balloted were against it. Secondly, the speech of the right hon. Member for Salford, East today contained not one word of criticism of Mr. Scargill or the way in which he has conducted the dispute. One of the reasons why the dispute has gone on so long is this second failure of the Labour party. At no stage did the Labour party ever condemn the manner in which the mob was used to try to put an end to the dispute.

The use of the mob has been an important factor in the dispute. When one third of Britain's coalfields balloted to continue to work, the mob was organised to close those pits, but it failed. It was then mobilised to try to close the steel industry—first at Llanwern, then at Ravenscraig—but again it failed. Then, at Orgreave, a massive mob tried for 11 days to close one cokeworks to show that the mob could succeed, but once again it failed.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): The Secretary of State seems keen to talk about failure and the way in which history will view the dispute. How will history reflect on a Government who said last year that they intended to save £275 million in so-called losses by the NCB and have spent £5·5 billion in 11 months trying to achieve that? Does he agree that it will be clear in the history books that the aim was to destroy the NUM, not to save money?

Mr. Walker: It is a remarkable way to try to destroy the NUM by offering a £3 billion investment programme, a massive pay increase, a guarantee of no compulsory redundancies and the best early retirement provisions of any industry in the country. The person who has done most damage to the coal industry is the leader of the NUM. He has conducted a campaign that has divided mining communities and the union from top to bottom, with an £8,000 loss of wages for every miner, and destroyed markets for the industry. History will show that no one has done more damage to the miners than Mr. Scargill. The tragedy is that throughout the dispute the Labour party has apparently given him every support.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Will the Secretary of State return to the crucial issue of the debate rather than rehashing his old speeches? Does he admit that the agendas to which he referred required a written agreement? If not, is he now saying that negotiations can take place without a written agreement and that everything can be discussed without preconditions?

Mr. Walker: Last week the TUC approached the NCB to try to get negotiations started. In the first instance, the NCB said that if the TUC could persuade the NUM to come forward with the wording for an agenda that would include discussions on the crucial issue of the dispute it would carefully consider those proposals. The TUC, however, had to come back and say that it could not get any such proposal for an agenda in writing from the NUM. The NCB then put into writing its suggestion for the item on the agenda to deal with that problem. The NCB has heard nothing from the TUC since, but so far as we know the NUM has not agreed that that should be the No. 1 item on the agenda. That is why no talks took place last week.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): I am sure that the Secretary of State does not wish to deceive the House. I was present at the meeting with the TUC. The right hon. Gentleman's resumé is quite different from what actually happened. The question at issue was that of economic pits. The NUM said that it would meet without preconditions and it has set an agenda, with which I shall deal in winding up the debate.

Mr. Walker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for confirming that there was an opportunity to have the crucial issue of the dispute on the agenda but that the NUM refused. He has confirmed exactly what I said. That shows that the Opposition's attitude is utterly bogus. Throughout last week, the NCB and the TUC patiently tried to get talks started again but the NUM refused, as it has done since last March, to move an inch on the fundamental issue of the strike. Until it does so, there can be no settlement.

Mr. Kinnock: A week ago last Thursday, when the NUM national executive committee was meeting, the NCB issued a press statement saying that it required undertakings in writing. That changed the whole course of events the week before last, as everyone clearly recalls. Is the Secretary of State now saying that during the discussions between the NCB and the TUC last week the NCB at any time conveyed to the TUC that it was withdrawing the request, requirement or demand for a written undertaking about uneconomic pits or anything else? If that is so, the news was certainly not received by the TUC or anyone else.

Mr. Walker: It was certainly received by the TUC because the TUC received an item which, if the NUM agreed to it as the No. I item on the agenda — [Interruption.] Hon. Members cannot dodge this. Last week the NCB made an offer that something should be the No. 1 item on the agenda. The NUM, as always, said no and will probably continue to say no. If the NUM continues to say no on that issue, there can be no agreement because, as the whole House knows and as the Leader of the Opposition belatedly admitted last week, the reality is that pits always have been closed for economic reasons.

The whole purpose of this battle has been to have an issue upon which there could be no settlement. That is the issue that Mr. Scargill has kept to the fore throughout the dispute. The reality is that as a result the mining industry has lost considerable markets. Pit faces have been lost at pits that had a good future, and £700 million of investment that could have gone into the industry last year has not been able to go into the industry due to the dispute. What is now on offer is a programme for the coal industry that is better than anything that has been offered since nationalisation.

I should like to say a word, too, about the alternative of keeping a pit open when it is very uneconomic, in order to keep to the Scargill demand that the pit remains open until the last tonne of coal is extracted, a demand that he has repeated at rally after rally and meeting after meeting. If anybody believes that that provides a good future for mining communities, every miner knows that he is wrong. That is why, during 11 years of Labour Government, 330 pits were closed by Labour Governments. If we closed pits at the rate the Labour Government closed them, there would be no pits left in five years. In reality, during the whole of the strike there has been on offer an investment programme and, for the first time, a positive programme for communities that have to face pit closure.

In its amendment, the alliance suggests that more money should be put into the enterprise company to assist mining communities that face pit closure. That is the first time that the coal board has created such an instrument. When it originally financed it, it found that the number of potential inquiries was encouraging and felt that it would quickly get through its initial capital. The capital was then doubled to £10 million. At the time of making that announcement, the NCB made it clear that when further resources were required, they would become available. The company has now appointed a chairman and a chief executive and is dealing with many inquiries already. I assure the leader of the Social Democratic party, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), that there will be no lack of financial and management support for the enterprise company to see that a much better, more positive approach to the problem is made as opposed to the absurd approach of saying that every uneconomic pit should not close.

Therefore, I wish to say to the House that throughout the past 10 months we have had a miners' leader who, in seven negotiations, has made only one boast—that he has not moved an inch. He has rejected a decent proposal put forward by ACAS. He has rejected, and will not accept, the proposal negotiated by NACODS. As a result of his action, miners' families, mining communities and the future of the industry have been put in jeopardy, and the tragedy of the dispute is that the Labour party leadership has never had the guts to say so. We saw the way in which its party conference was dominated by Mr. Scargill. We have seen the way in which the Leader of the Opposition has always refused to demand that a ballot take place. We have seen the actions of the spokesman for energy—the right hon. Member for Salford, East—and the only reason why he could never be successful in any of his talks was that he could never budge Arthur Scargill an inch. The sooner there is a negotiated settlement on the best terms since nationalisation, the better for the industry and the better for miners.

4.34 pm

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): The Secretary of State for Energy completely misled the House during his speech. I have before me a copy of the letter from the National Union of Mineworkers, signed by Peter Heathfield, the general secretary, and sent to Mr. Spanton on Friday morning last week. Proposals were put forward for negotiations as required by the board. The second proposal was about the future of collieries and units. The letter states:

> "The Union's proposal takes account of the Board's own suggestions when we met with ACAS. This would provide for all matters relating to the future of Collieries/Units to be dealt with".

In the concluding paragraphs of the letter, Mr. Heathfield stated:

> "I find your refusal to resume negotiations without preconditions extremely disappointing. Should the Board change its mind, however, and decide that it does want to see a settlement of this dispute, I reiterate that the Union's National Executive Committee is available for talks at any time."

That is the present situation. The Secretary of State misled the House about the negotiations.

I believe that the strike is a Government-inspired, political strike, and since the start has been the subject of intensive Government political activity. The House will remember that in October 1983 the NUM decided on an overtime ban, when one third of its men were to be adversely affected by reduced earnings. The overtime ban had major objectives — to save the pits, pay decent wages and employ more people by cutting out overtime. After 17 weeks, the NCB had lost 6·5 million tonnes of production—a loss of sales equivalent, at only £30 a tonne, to nearly £200 million. Therefore, the overtime ban was biting. The industry was still working, and not many miners were suffering, and that was galling to the NCB.

That was when MacGregor decided to announce a cutback of 4 million tonnes of coal output in March 1984, threatening the life of 20 pits and 20,000 jobs. At the time there were 50 million tonnes of coal in stock. With those massive bastions of reserves behind them, the Government decided to take on the miners. If that was not the reasoning, why did not MacGregor cut back on coal imports and opencast coal mining? He could easily have brought supply into line with demand by those means. We import 5 million tonnes of coal, and opencast production is 15 million tonnes. There was no need for a confrontation, but the NCB and the Government wished and willed it.

The board and the Government, especially the Department of Energy, would have been in cahoots from the start. Moves of this kind and magnitude are not made without officials being involved and Ministers being informed. Therefore, I believe that there was political involvement from the start. MacGregor could have avoided the strike, but did he really want to? The Government were fully aware of what was happening. If they wanted to take on the miners, to wreak revenge for 1974 and to blunt the spearhead of the most progressive united industrial union in Britain, now was the time. By so doing, they could tame the whole trade union movement in Britain.

That is the Government's political goal. With a massive majority in Parliament and noting that they had secured an increased white collar union vote in 1983, the Government thought that they had better strike while the going was good. It had not gone unnoticed that it took MacGregor 13 weeks to bring the steel workers to heel. He always regarded the steel unions with contempt. He saw them as a disparate multiplicity of steel unions lacking the pronounced progressive leadership of the NUM. Therefore, the Government recognised that the battle against the miners, the strongest, most coherent union in the country, might take more time. Well, it has. It has taken longer than anticipated and has been much more costly than the Government thought it would be.

The Government and the NCB chose the time, with ample parliamentary Sessions left in which to do the job. But they never realised what a political and diplomatic disaster MacGregor would be, and that their whole strategy would face ruin because of the ultimate in public relations stupidity by their appointee. After the faltering and stammering television appearances by the NCB's new spokesman, and seeing the NCB's industrial relations department collapsing in ruins with so many men steeped in industrial relations experience sacked or opting for premature retirement, the Government then decided to take over the reins completely. There is now no doubt about the dominating role of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Energy in this dispute.

They have made it clear that this is a fight to the death, irrespective of cost. The Prime Minister's reputation was at stake, and as my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) said, this is her national Falklands crisis. All the Cabinet has come to heel—anti-miners to a man. While there are wets, renegers and rebellions on Third world aid, students' grants, abolition of the GLC or monetarism versus unemployment, there are no splits on this issue. This is a Government-decreed highly politically motivated strike.

At no time in the last 11 months has a miner received unemployment benefit, but because of the politics of this dispute and the Government's determination to win at all costs, neither have many hundreds of workers who have been laid off as a consequence of the strike. I am referring to all outside contractors, canteen workers, apprentices and redundant coal miners. Contractors from AMCO, Thyssen, Cementation Mining, Mathew Hall and various other firms have been denied unemployment benefit, but their case for disqualification is non-existent, although they have suffered all this time. I believe that their benefit has been denied in an attempt to influence the dispute.

If the 700 contractors in Yorkshire—and there are 238 AMCO workers in the Barnsley area alone—returned to work through being denied benefit and starved back to work, that would inflate the return-to-work figures. I suspect that there has been some collusion between the Department of Employment, the DHSS and the NCB.

This is also an unnecessary extension of poverty, social distress and unhappiness among their families. These people are not coal miners and are not involved in the dispute. They work in supportive industries. They have been caught up in the strike and affected by it, yet have been no part of the cause. As long ago as 1926, it was decided that outside contractors to the mining industry were at a separate place of employment, even though they worked at the same pits as the miners. They were paid unemployment benefit during strikes by miners. This umpire's decision was reaffirmed in 1964 in commissioner's case R(U)23/64 which also gave authority for payment. Two other cases relating to the present dispute were reaffirmed in a commissioner's decision from Wales. Therefore, there is overwhelming authority for the view that outside contractors should be paid unemployment benefit. There seems to be no reason other than bias against everyone even only remotely involved in the dispute.

None of the outside contractors, canteen workers and apprentices has yet been paid in Yorkshire. It could take up to two years and much waste of administrative time, unnecessary cost and widespread social distress before every case is dealt with. That is indefensible and is absolutely unnecessary. Only a political decision can rectify it.

The same applies to redundant, now unemployed, coal miners. These men were actually declared redundant before 6 March 1984. They have played no part in the strike. They are on the dole, and were before the strike began. They are not involved in the dispute in any way, yet for 11 months they have been cruelly deprived of unemployment benefit. Again, this is an unnecessary extension of social distress and misery in the mining communities. It gives an impression to everyone in every pit village in Britain that the Government are purposely depriving these men of their benefit and are forcing the NUM in every coalfield to contest every case before tribunals. It adds credence to the overall view that the Government have told the officers of those tribunals to bend the interpretation of the law against those who are pleading for justice.

The denial of unemployment benefit to redundant miners has been grossly unfair from the start. That benefit should now be paid. These men have been callously denied their rights, as a result of which much poverty has been needlessly caused. This is another cruel example of the Government's policy of determining the level of social misery in the strike-torn areas.

Over the last 11 months, a number of men have been arrested for being involved in picket-line incidents. Scores of them, having been charged by the police, have eventually been acquitted. In the meantime, they have been photographed and fingerprinted, and those stains on their character have been kept on police files. The Home Secretary knows that on 10 December last year, I presented the case to him. On 28 December he sent me an interim reply stating that he would ask the chief constable of Nottinghamshire for a report. Last Thursday I again asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman for an assurance that everyone acquitted of offences—the Attorney-General has said that today there are 1,169—would have their records cleansed, including the erasure of all fingerprints and photographs from their records.

I asked for that assurance last Thursday on the Floor of the House, but it was not given. Is that not political? Is it not political that wives and families should be tormented and that the men themselves should be besmirched with guilt for all that time, even though they have been declared innocent? It is up to the Home Secretary to request chief constables to send for the men concerned so that they can witness the erasure of photographs and fingerprints from their records.

[Mr. Roy Mason]

In addition, these men must not have their jobs put at risk or their future impaired when the strike is over. If there is to be an amnesty, and there will have to be, they must be considered.

At the beginning of my speech I referred to the talks. Last Friday, on 1 February, the secretary of the NUM, Mr. Peter Heathfield, said of the future of collieries and units:

"The Union's proposal takes account of the Board's own suggestions when we met with ACAS. This would provide for all matters relating to the future of Collieries/Units to be dealt with".

One cannot get a wider interpretation of that to deal with the future of pits, irrespective of what they are or how they are defined. The letter continued:

"I find your refusal to resume negotiations without preconditions extremely disappointing".

The Times of the following day stated:

"For the first time since talks began last spring the Board yesterday admitted that it had broken off the discussions and it laid down terms for any resumption of negotiations".

The phrase, "the board yesterday admitted for the first time" is another clear sign that since last November, when MacGregor got lost in his plastic bag, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Energy have now taken over. They are determining the words which come from the NCB and the conditions on which negotiations will take place.

To meet with no preconditions seems fair and reasonable to all fair-thinking people, but not to the Government and the NCB. They now want a surrender document before talks can begin. This is political interference at the highest level. The Government are now refusing to talk, and, irrespective of the cost to the nation or the misery to thousands of miners and their families, they want to see the men, frustrated and bitter, starved back to work. That is the Government's political goal. What of industrial relations thereafter? The Government could not care a damn. That is another reason why the dispute is political, and has been for the Government since it began. Even Peter McNestry, the general secretary of NACODS, while representing middle management of the mining industry, declared on 26 January 1985:

"It has become a political strike. It is clear now that she is involved in running the Coal Board's business. She countermanded an arrangement between senior Director Ned Smith and the NUM. She has total involvement and she's out to destroy the NUM."

They too believe, without a shadow of doubt, that it is a Government-motivated political strike.

What about the cost of the strike? Last week the Prime Minister refused to answer my question about the cost to Government Departments and nationalised industries, and fobbed it on to the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who referred to a reply that was four months out of date. It is now revealed that the stoppage is estimated to have cost £5·2 billion. The cost to the coal industry so far is estimated at £952 million. The bill for the electricity industry is £719 million. It is calculated that about £271 million has been lost in income tax payments and that a further £47 million has been lost in social security costs. The cost of extra policing is estimated at £189 million, and the loss to the British Steel Corporation at approximately £190 million. The cost of the balance of payments, which has risen to £347 million a month, hurts the Government most. The cumulative cost is running at about £2·5 billion. That is because of the additional imports of oil and coal.

The Government and the country are paying an extremely heavy price for this war of attrition. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his famous remark that the costs of the strike were a worthwhile investment for the nation — another fine example of the Government's intentions—the stoppage was only five months old. It has now dragged on for more than 11 months. Privately, officials and civil servants are conceding that the Government's borrowing in 1984-85 is likely to burst through their set target. That has already dented the Chancellor's strategy, which means that it has eroded a considerable chunk of the cash that he was banking on for tax cuts in the Budget. That was the reason for his hesitancy in his speech last week during the debate on the economy. The falling pound, in which the strike is a major factor, has also put the Government's inflation objective increasingly at risk, not to mention the unquantifiable effects on business confidence, investment plans and expansion in businesses, most of which will never be recouped.

Never before has so much been lost and so much placed at risk in industry and commerce to stifle and eventually to cripple the strength of the miners and trade unionism in Britain. The union has offered to talk with no pre-conditions. Throughout the nation that will be seen to be fair and just. It is only because the Government and their puppet MacGregor have decreed that this is a political fight to slay trade unionism and trade union rights that the strike has not been settled. The Government have sown bitterness in the land, and in reaping it there will be more militancy.

Most of my people do not want to see that, but the politics of the Government is forcing them to rethink their industrial and political postures, which will be to the severe detriment of all our industrial relations and democratic procedures. Democracy will count for naught, and dictatorship versus anarchy will start to prevail. That may be the price we have to pay for the Government's political strike.

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): Since I was elected to the House, I have learned that one cannot repeat anything too often. During previous debates in November 1983 and June 1984, I said that it was an honour to be the Member of Parliament for Britain's largest mining constituency —Sherwood. Today I feel humble but full of pride to be the hon. Member whose constituents have been to hell and back a hundred times, indeed a thousand times, because they believe in democracy, in the form of holding a ballot.

What Lord Stockton said about miners during his maiden speech in another place described Nottinghamshire men to a tee. They are honourable, working men who put their jobs, families and country before anyone's political dogma. They are lackeys of no one, and are working today because they considered that the National Coal Board's offer was a fair and reasonable package.

The House is aware of the catalogue of cowardly, brutish attacks on working miners, but the scum also attack their wives and children when those miners are underground. Many from outside Nottinghamshire have had to seek refuge, and they have settled happily in our mining villages of Sherwood. Their protection and ours has been made possible only by the positive actions taken by the chief constable of Nottinghamshire and his men, who stopped the thuggery in its tracks.

Nottinghamshire holds no truck with the allegations against its police. We do not need a committee set up by the National Council for Civil Liberties—the Huckfields of the European Parliament—or a call for an inquiry from our mangled-minded, Left-wing colleagues in this House. We live there and see the dawn unfold every day for ourselves.

Scargill, after lying through his teeth for 11 months about winning the strike, is now bragging that he has cost the country £5,000 million. He should read his history books and pay heed to the fate of his predecessors who also tried to hold the country to ransom. The only difference between Scargill's stormtroopers and his Nazi counterparts is that his wear steel over their toes by courtesy of the board, instead of on their heads—all the better for putting the boot in.

During the past months, inquiring people have asked how such a great union, known for its democracy, solidarity and fraternity, could be hijacked by those whose only interest was certainly not that of their members. Mining is physically exhausting work, and men who have completed their shift underground are only too ready to go home. But those who were part of a programmed conspiracy to run the union were like rugby players who fall foul of the referee—they have an early bath so that they are ready to go into a conclave to plan their next move of destruction. That position no longer exists in Nottinghamshire, because once the sheep's clothing was removed from their former leaders, the working miners could see whose interests were being served, and when democratic elections were held, the wolves were, without exception, shown the door.

Mr. Nellist: The hon. Gentleman has referred several times to the hijacking of the NUM. Will he comment on the direct role played by Mr. David Hart, a close adviser to the Prime Minister, who on four occasions in August met miners in Nottinghamshire to set up the NUM's so-called national working miners' committee? If the hon. Gentleman is interested in a hijacking of the union, it has been a Conservative hijacking of the miners in Nottinghamshire.

Mr. Stewart: That intervention is not worthy of comment, because I would not be allowed to use the words necessary to describe it in the House.

The new leaders are now responding to their members' wishes, and covet favours from no one, except to be allowed to participate in running the industry for the well-being of their members and the country. Whatever the settlement, the success of the coal industry will not be found in Hobart house, or from those who shout loudest in the House. It rests with the board's 10 area directors and 180 pit managers, who must be allowed to manage with the full confidence and co-operation of their work force.

Yesterday's thinking on how to resolve industrial strife has gone for good in Nottinghamshire, and what I have outlined is already taking place. There is no going back. If our model were adopted by the other coalfields, there would be no need for the intervention of third parties, whose only role would be to fudge management decisions. Talk of forming a breakaway union is utter rubbish, and has been noised abroad only by the undemocratic national union to try once more to discredit those who would not toe the party line. The loyalty of the Nottinghamshire NUM members to their national affiliated union is total. I speak of loyalty. Does the House know what loyalty means in cash terms to every Nottinghamshire miner? It means the loss of £20 a week so that production bonuses from their efforts can be given to their colleagues in loss-making coalfields. That has continued for many years, and it represents real loyalty.

Perhaps, after working continually for 11 months, the north Nottinghamshire miners might be recognised by a visit from the chairman of the coal board. With Scargill's threat of expulsion they have prepared for the worst, and find contemptible his cry that the area executive should hold a ballot before leaving the union. A ballot, indeed — after he has denied one to his members for 11 months. Expulsion has now been postponed because, at long last, Scargill accepts that he is dealing with real men in Nottinghamshire who will not break.

Mr. Terry Patchett (Barnsley, East): The hon. Gentleman refers to bonuses and the loss of earnings. Is he aware that those bonuses were established after the Nottinghamshire miners went against the results of a national ballot?

Mr. Stewart: What of this man Scargill — [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] — who has brought misery to thousands of people, condoned violence, wrecked his union and driven 23,000 Nottinghamshire miners to withdraw their political levies from the Labour party? Will he do the honourable thing and take a fourth trip to Moscow and stay there, or will he ask his members for a vote of confidence through a ballot? The answer to both questions is no, because, in the Prime Minister's word, he is frit.

Let us forget Scargill. Let us remember only the working miners of Nottinghamshire and elsewhere. With such men, the coal industry's future is secure. We shall see coal production as we have never seen it before; a return from investment such as we have never seen before; and, therefore, wages paid such as we have never seen before. With that will come hope for the unemployed as industry takes advantage of competitive energy costs. That is no dream. It is a practical reality, and the working miners of Nottinghamshire have shown the way.

5.3 pm

Mr. Michael McGuire (Makerfield): What the debate has shown so far is that the Government's hands are not clean. That is the principal reason why, after a dispute that has lasted for 11 months and impoverished many areas of the country, they have not thought fit to debate the matter.
